OPENING STATEMENT OF HON. ORRIN G. HATCH, A. U.S. SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF UTAH, CHAIRMAN, SUBCOMMITTEE ON THE CONSTITUTION

Senator HATCH. Ladies and gentlemen, this marks the first in a series of eight scheduled hearings on the Voting Rights Act. We are privileged to have with us today an outstanding group of witnesses. As has always been the case on this subcommittee, it will be a balanced group of witnesses as well.

As a member of this body who is still in his first term, I was not present when Congress last considered the voting rights issue in 1975. However, I must observe that I have never before seen an important issue that has been the subject of so much misunderstanding and misconception as the Voting Rights Act. Whatever one's perspective on this legislation, I hope that the hearings to be conducted by this subcommittee will be helpful in defining what precisely are the issues in the forthcoming debate.

To start this process, let me clarify some of the matters that do not seem to be in widespread controversy. First, there seems to be little disagreement that the provisions of the Voting Rights Act ought to be extended. This is certainly my own view and, I believe, the view of a substantial majority of the Senate.

Clearly, the Voting Rights Act has been successful in providing effective voting rights to all citizens, irrespective of race or color. In virtually every jurisdiction in which the special preclearance provisions of the act have applied, there have been significant increases in the percentage of minority individuals registering and voting. The 15th amendment guarantee against the abridgement of voting rights on the basis of race or color has largely been fulfilled by the Voting Rights Act. It ought not to be dismantled.

Second, there seems to be little disagreement about the specific forms of voting rights protection established by the Voting Rights Act. In particular, I detect little support for the elimination of the preclearance provisions of section 5 of the Voting Rights Act.

While none of us should fail to recognize the substantial transformation in our federal system effected by the Voting Rights Act, neither should any of us fail to recognize the extraordinary circumstances that existed in many of the jurisdictions required to preclear prior to the act. As the Supreme Court has noted, the very constitutionality of the Voting Rights Act has always rested upon the recognition of these extraordinary circumstances. The preclearance procedure ought to be maintained.

Third, there seems to be little disagreement that the preclearance requirement ought to be limited to so-called "covered" jurisdictions. And let us frankly recognize that most of them are in the southern part of our country.

To extend coverage nationally could have no effect other than to dilute the basic coverage of the Voting Rights Act. To extend coverage nationally would also be to call into constitutional question the act by applying the preclearance requirement to jurisdictions in which there have never been the extraordinary circumstances of race that existed in the "covered" jurisdictions. The present limited scope of "preclearance" to the "covered" jurisdictions ought to be maintained.

Finally, let me say that there seems to be little disagreement about any of the other protections of the Voting Rights Act. The abolition of the poll tax, the elimination of literacy tests, and other discriminatory voting devices, the strictures upon residency requirements, the provisions for Federal voting examiners and marshals, and the prohibition of coercion and fraud in relationship to the ballot box should all be maintained intact.

Having said all this, what then is the debate all about? How significant is this debate? In my view, the debate beginning in the Senate today will focus upon a proposed change in the act that involves one of the most important constitutional issues ever to come before this body. Involved in this debate will be the most fundamental issues involving the nature of American representative democracy, federalism, civil rights, and the separation of powers.

While the resolution of this debate may not affect the average person's pocketbook this year, and while it will not affect the interest rate on home mortgages, there is no issue, absolutely no issue, that will be considered during this Congress that is more important to defining ourselves as a Nation and in expressing the values of our Constitution.

In short, what is at issue is the easily overlooked change in a few words in section 2 of this act. Section 2 represents the statutory expression of the 15th amendment to the Constitution of the United States of America. It prohibits voting qualifications or practices or procedures which abridge voting rights on account of race or color. Because it is the codification of the Constitution, it applies throughout the country.

Some people have misconstrued this act and have thought that it only applies to certain Southern States, but actually this provision applies to all 50 States. I might add that it applies to not only every State in the Union, but it applies whether or not they must "preclear."

Until now—until the proposed change in section 2 which was adopted last year by the House after virtually no discussion either in committee or on the floor—section 2 was viewed as perhaps the least controversial provision in the Voting Rights Act—that is, up until now, up until the House acted. Indeed, in a recent analysis of the act that I read, prepared by the Library of Congress, section 2 was not even referred to as one of the "major" provisions of the act.

What the proposed change in section 2 would do is to overturn the traditional understanding of the 15th amendment—reiterated less than 2 years ago by the Supreme Court in the Mobile case—that a constitutional violation requires some evidence of an intent or purpose to discriminate.

The proposed language would overturn Mobile and, I might add, overturn the intent requirement, and establish in its place a new test for identifying discrimination, a test never before utilized, that focuses purely upon the "results" of an alleged discriminatory action.

I would ask my colleagues as well as others interested in this debate to consider the implications of discarding the intent standard. By focusing upon the results or the effects of an allegedly discriminatory action rather than upon the motivation for such an action, we are redefining the very concepts of discrimination and civil rights. By focusing primarily upon numbers and statistics rather than upon evidence of some wrongful purpose, the "results" test would transform the 15th amendment and the Voting Rights Act from provisions designed to insure equal access and equal opportunity in the electoral process to provisions designed to insure equal outcome and equal success.

Such an objective, the objective of racial balance on elected, representative bodies, is inconsistent with every value of our Constitution. As the Court stated in Mobile in rejecting the proposition expressed in the proposed change in section 2, "The right to equal participation in the electoral process does not protect any 'political group,' however defined, from electoral defeat."

In short, what the "results" test would do is to establish the concept of "proportional representation by race" as the standard by which courts evaluate electoral and voting decisions, as well as decisions of municipal organization and structure, by communities throughout the Nation.

No, it probably will not result overnight in city councils, and county commissions, and State legislatures, and school boards across the Nation reflecting racial proportions in their jurisdictions. That is too simplistic a notion.

Rather, what the "results" standard will do is to establish the "proportional representation" standard as one by which the Federal Government and the courts assess the constitutional validity of every municipal system, every redistricting plan, every electoral and voting requirement, and every alternation of those systems, plans, and requirements. Whether or not there is proportional representation by race or whether or not proportional representation is promoted by these policies will become the legal filter through which they are judged.

As in the city of Mobile, never mind that there was no discriminatory purpose behind their establishment, and never mind that there were legitimate, entirely nonracial justifications for such policies. As in the city of Mobile, efforts will be made to dismantle entirely the structures of self-government enacted by citizens across the country.

As the Court observed in the Mobile case, the dissenting opinion, which expressed the case for the "results" test, "would discard fixed principles of equal protection in favor of a judicial inventiveness that would go far toward making this court a superlegislature."

The notion of "proportional representation by race" is not a specter that any Member of this Congress has pulled out of a hat. Apart from the fact that the "results" test can have no other meaning by its very terms, the House report on their version of the Voting Rights Act concedes that evidence of proportional representation "would be highly relevant" in establishing a section 2 violation.

In addition, we see many civil rights leaders stating rather explicitly that proportional representation is their goal. Dr. Willie Gibson, president of the South Carolina NAACP, for example, has stated that, "Unless we see a redistricting plan in South Carolina that has the possibility of blacks being elected in proportion to their population, we will push hard for alternative plans."

In addition, the Supreme Court has been forthright in its characterization of the "results" or "effects" standard as one designed to promote proportional representation by race. To refer to the Mobile case again, the Court observed, "The theory of the dissenting opinion appears to be that every political group, or at least every such group that is in the minority, has a Federal constitutional right to elect candidates in proportion to its numbers . . . the equal protection clause of the 14th amendment does not require proportional representation as an imperative of political organization."

Before I conclude, let me make an observation about a so-called disclaimer provision in section 2 that we will all be hearing a great deal about during these hearings. This provision, it has been suggested, disclaims the idea that lack of proportional representation constitutes a section 2 or 15th amendment violation. That is pure and unadulterated "smokescreen."

Rather, what the language following the "results" test in section 2 says is that lack of "proportional representation" "in and of itself" is not a violation. It then proceeds to describe merely a few factors that, in conjunction with the absence of proportional representation, will consummate a violation.

These factors include the existence of at-large electoral systems, racial bloc voting, a history of discrimination, majority vote requirements, prohibitions on single-shot voting, and numbered posts. Other factors that have been suggested by the civil rights community or that have been used by the Justice Department in the past include disparate racial registration figures, history of English-only ballots, the maldistribution of services in racially definable neighborhoods, staggered electoral terms, impediments to third party voting, numbers of minority registration officials, "inconvenient" registration hours, reregistration requirements, registration purging requirements, et cetera, et cetera, et cetera, ad infinitum.

In other words, given the lack of proportional representation, any of these factors which the House report calls "objective" factors of discrimination will suffice to complete a Voting Rights Act violation. Given the absence of proportional representation, virtually any jurisdiction in the country will be vulnerable to a section 2 suit. Indeed, the Court in Mobile rejected a similar attempt to disclaim the charge of proportional representation by calling it "illusory" and resting upon "gauzy sociological considerations having no constitutional basis."

The most immediate objective of the section 2 standard is the elimination of at-large systems of voting throughout the country. Never mind the fact that this would require the elimination of a system of government freely chosen by the citizens of two-thirds of the municipalities across the country. Never mind that the at-large system of municipal government was established in most communities throughout the Nation as a result of the progressive reforms of the 1910's and 1920's, and that they had nothing whatsoever to do with racial considerations. Never mind that the case against at-large systems of municipal government rests upon the objectionable and offensive premise that only blacks can represent blacks and that only whites can represent whites, and that the influence of blacks is maximized when they are concentrated in electorally safe and comfortable political ghettos.

The concept of racial quotas that the results test would bring to the Constitution and to the Voting Rights Act is totally at odds with everything that the Constitution has been directed at since the Reconstruction amendments, Brown v. Board of Education, and the Civil Rights Act of 1964. It is at odds with the notion that Representatives owe their allegiance to individual citizens, not to racial or ethnic blocs. It is at odds with the most fundamental ideas of federalism and local self-government. Indeed, the very term "discriminatory results" is purest Orwellianism in radically transforming the concept of discrimination from a decisionmaking process into an end or an outcome in and of itself.

I challenge anyone who suggests that the consensus in civil rights in this country was built on this theory of civil rights. I do not believe that you can find 1 person in 100 in Boston, Baltimore, or Cleveland, black or white, who would define discrimination in this manner.

Finally, I would like to address one misconception of the traditional intent standard that seems to have been generated by some proponents of the results standard. In short, there is not and there never has been any requirement of a "smoking gun" or a confession of discrimination under the intent standard. It has always been able to be proved by circumstantial and indirect evidence, before Mobile, during Mobile, and after Mobile.

Intent has always been something that could be inferred from the factual events surrounding an alleged act of discrimination. The Supreme Court has stated this in black and white, time after time after time. Intent has, in fact, been proved time after time after time, without a "smoking gun" and without a confession of intent.

Ladies and gentlemen, I apologize for what is really a somewhat longer opening statement than I normally deliver. This is a complex issue, however, and one of paramount importance. I hope that those in the media who are with us today will recognize the importance of this issue and ask difficult questions of me and of the other Senators, both those who favor the present standard and those who wish to alter it.

Whatever your views on the merits of this change, I hope that you will recognize its significance. Whatever the outcome of this debate, I hope that we will not be able to say a decade from now that no one really appreciated at the time what section 2 was all about.

We are talking here about a change in the concept of voting rights so radical and so inconsistent, in my opinion, with the traditional ideas of equal protection, that it deserves the greatest national debate. I intend to encourage that in whatever way I can as chairman of this subcommittee.

I welcome all of our witnesses here today, whatever their views on this and other matters. In addition to the issue on section 2, I will look forward to testimony during the course of these hearings on the so-called bailout issue. In my estimation, that will be the other major focus of discussion on the Voting Rights Act.

VOTING RIGHTS ACT OF 1965

Public Law 91-285

PUBLIC LAW 89-110, 89TH CONGRESS, S. 1564,
AUGUST 6, 1965

AN ACT To enforce the fifteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and for other purposes

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act shall be known as the "Voting Rights Act of 1965".

TITLE I—VOTING RIGHTS

Public Law 94-73

SEC. 2. No voting qualification or prerequisite to voting, or standard, practice, or procedure shall be imposed or applied by any State or political subdivision to deny or abridge the right of any citizen of the United States to vote on account of race or color, or in contravention of the guarantees set forth in section 4(f)(2).

Public Law 94-73

SEC. 3. (a) Whenever the Attorney General or an aggrieved person institutes a proceeding under any statute to enforce the voting guarantees of the fourteenth or fifteenth amendment in any State or political subdivision the court shall authorize the appointment of Federal examiners by the United States Civil Service Commission in accordance with section 6 to serve for such period of time and for such political subdivisions as the court shall determine is appropriate to enforce the voting guarantees of the fourteenth or fifteenth amendment (1) as part of any interlocutory order if the court determines that the appointment of such examiners is necessary to enforce such voting guarantees or (2) as part of any final judgment if the court finds that violations of the fourteenth or fifteenth amendment justifying equitable relief have occurred in such State or subdivision: Provided, That the court need not authorize the appointment of examiners if any incidents of denial or abridgement of the right to vote on account of race or color, or in contravention of the guarantees set forth in section 4(f)(2), (1) have been few in number and have been promptly and effectively corrected by State or local action, (2) the continuing effect of such incidents has been eliminated, and (3) there is no reasonable probability of their recurrence in the future.

Public Law 94-73

(b) If in a proceeding instituted by the Attorney General or an aggrieved person under any statute to enforce the voting guarantees of the fourteenth or fifteenth amendment in any State or political subdivision the court finds that a test or device has been used for the purpose or with the effect of denying or abridging the right of any citizen of the United States to vote on account of race or color, or in contravention of the guarantees set forth in section 4(f)(2), it shall suspend the use of tests and devices in such State or political subdivisions as the court shall determine is appropriate and for such period as it deems necessary.

Public Law 93-373

(c) If any proceeding instituted by the Attorney General or an aggrieved person under any statute to enforce the voting guarantees of the fourteenth or fifteenth amendment in any State or political subdivision the court finds that violations of the fourteenth or fifteenth amendment justifying equitable relief have occurred within the territory of such State or political subdivision, the court, in addition to such relief as it may grant, shall retain jurisdiction for such period as it may deem appropriate and during such period no voting qualification or prerequisite to voting, or standard, practice, or procedure with respect to voting different from that in force or effect at the time the proceeding was commenced shall be enforced unless and until the court finds that such qualification, prerequisite, standard, practice, or procedure does not have the purpose and will not have the effect of denying or abridging the right to vote on account of race or color, or in contravention of the guarantees set forth in section 4(f)(2): Provided, That such qualification, prerequisite, standard, practice, or procedure may be enforced if the qualification, prerequisite, standard, practice, or procedure has been submitted by the chief legal officer or other appropriate official of such State or subdivision to the Attorney General and the Attorney General has not interposed an objection within sixty days after such submission, except that neither the court's finding nor the Attorney General's failure to object shall bar a subsequent action to enjoin enforcement of such qualification, prerequisite, standard, practice, or procedure.

Public Law 91-285

SEC. 4. (a) To assure that the right of citizens of the United States to vote is not denied or abridged on account of race or color, no citizen shall be denied the right to vote in any Federal, State, or local election because of his failure to comply with any test or device in any State with respect to which the determinations have been made under the first two sentences of subsection (b) or in any political subdivision with respect to which such determinations have been made as a separate unit, unless the United States District Court for the District of Columbia in an action for a declaratory judgment brought by such State or subdivision against the United States has determined that no such test or device has been used during the seventeen years preceding the filing of the action for the purpose or with the effect of denying or abridging the right to vote on account of race or color: Provided, That no such declaratory judgment shall issue with respect to any plaintiff for a period of seventeen years after the entry of a final judgment of any court of the United States, other than the denial of a declaratory judgment under this section, whether entered prior to or after the enactment of this Act, determining that denials or abridgments of the right to vote on account of race or color through the use of such tests or devices have occurred anywhere in the territory of such plaintiff. No citizen shall be denied the right to vote in any Federal, State, or local election because of his failure to comply with any test or device in any State with respect to which the determinations have been made under the third sentence of subsection (b) of this section or in any political subdivision with respect to which such determinations have been made as a separate unit, unless the United States District Court for the District of Columbia in an action for a declaratory judgment brought by such State or subdivision against the United States has determined that no such test or device has been used during the ten years preceding the filing of the action for the purpose or with the effect of denying or abridging the right to vote on account of race or color, or in contravention of the guarantees set forth in section 4(f)(2): Provided, That no such declaratory judgment shall issue with respect to any plaintiff for a period of ten years after the entry of a final judgment of any court of the United States, other than the denial of a declaratory judgment under this section, whether entered prior to or after the enactment of this paragraph, determining that denials or abridgments of the right to vote on account of race or color, or in contravention of the guarantees set forth in section 4(f)(2) through the use of tests or devices have occurred anywhere in the territory of such plaintiff.

An action pursuant to this subsection shall be heard and determined by a court of three judges in accordance with the provisions of section 2284 of title 28 of the United States Code and any appeal shall lie to the Supreme Court. The court shall retain jurisdiction of any action pursuant to this subsection for five years after judgment and shall reopen the action upon motion of the Attorney General alleging that a test or device has been used for the purpose or with the effect of denying or abridging the right to vote on account of race or color, or in contravention of the guarantees set forth in section 4(f)(2).

Public Law 94-73

If the Attorney General determines that he has no reason to believe that any such test or device has been used during the seventeen years preceding the filing of an action under the first sentence of this subsection for the purpose or with the effect of denying or abridging the right to vote on account of race or color, he shall consent to the entry of such judgment.

If the Attorney General determines that he has no reason to believe that any such test or device has been used during the ten years preceding the filing of an action under the second sentence of this subsection for the purpose or with the effect of denying or abridging the right to vote on account of race or color, or in contravention of the guarantees set forth in section 4(f)(2) he shall consent to the entry of such judgment.

(b) The provisions of subsection (a) shall apply in any State or in any political subdivision of a State which (1) the Attorney General determines maintained on November 1, 1964, any test or device, and with respect to which (2) the Director of the Census determines that less than 50 per centum of the persons of voting age residing therein were registered on November 1, 1964, or that less than 50 per centum of such persons voted in the presidential election of November 1964. On and after August 6, 1970, in addition to any State or political subdivision of a State determined to be subject to subsection (a) pursuant to the previous sentence, the provisions of subsection (a) shall apply in any State or any political subdivision of a State which (i) the Attorney General determines maintained on November 1, 1968, any test or device, and with respect to which (ii) the Director of the Census determines that less than 50 per centum of the persons of voting age residing therein were registered on November 1, 1968, or that less than 50 per centum of such persons voted in the presidential election of November 1968.

On and after August 6, 1975, in addition to any State or political subdivision of a State determined to be subject to subsection (a) pursuant to the previous two sentences, the provisions of subsection (a) shall apply in any State or any political subdivision of a State which (i) the Attorney General determines maintained on November 1, 1972, any test or device, and with respect to which (ii) the Director of the Census determines that less than 50 per centum of the citizens of voting age were registered on November 1, 1972, or that less than 50 per centum of such persons voted in the Presidential election of November 1972. Public Law 94-73

A determination or certification of the Attorney General or of the Director of the Census under this section or under section 6 or section 13 shall not be reviewable in any court and shall be effective upon publication in the Federal Register.

(c) The phrase "test or device" shall mean any requirement that a person as a prerequisite for voting or registration for voting (1) demonstrate the ability to read, write, understand, or interpret any matter, (2) demonstrate any educational achievement or his knowledge of any particular subject, (3) possess good moral character, or (4) prove his qualifications by the voucher of registered voters or members of any other class.

(d) For purposes of this section no State or political subdivision shall be determined to have engaged in the use of tests or devices for the purpose or with the effect of denying or abridging the right to vote on account of race or color, or in contravention of the guarantees set forth in section 4(f)(2) if (1) incidents of such use have been few in number and have been promptly and effectively corrected by State or local action, (2) the continuing effect of such incidents has been eliminated, and (3) there is no reasonable probability of their recurrence in the future. Public Law 94-73

(e)(1) Congress hereby declares that to secure the rights under the fourteenth amendment of persons educated in American-flag schools in which the predominant classroom language was other than English, it is necessary to prohibit the States from conditioning the right to vote of such persons on ability to read, write, understand, or interpret any matter in the English language.

(2) No person who demonstrates that he has successfully completed the sixth primary grade in a public school in, or a private school accredited by, any State or territory, the District of Columbia, or the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico in which the predominant classroom language was other than English, shall be denied the right to vote in any Federal, State, or local election because of his inability to read, write, understand, or interpret any matter in the English language, except that in States in which State law provides that a different level of education is presumptive of literacy, he shall demonstrate that he has successfully completed an equivalent level of education in a public school in, or a private school accredited by, any State or territory, the District of Columbia, or the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico in which the predominant classroom language was other than English.

(f)(1) The Congress finds that voting discrimination against citizens of language minorities is pervasive and national in scope. Such minority citizens are from environments in which the dominant language is other than English. In addition they have been denied equal educational opportunities by State and local governments, resulting in severe disabilities and continuing illiteracy in the English language. The Congress further finds that, where State and local officials conduct elections only in English, language minority citizens are excluded from participating in the electoral process. In many areas of the country, this exclusion is aggravated by acts of physical, economic, and political intimidation. The Congress declares that, in order to enforce the guarantees of the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments to the United States Constitution, it is necessary to eliminate such discrimination by prohibiting English-only elections, and by prescribing other remedial devices.

(2) No voting qualification or prerequisite to voting, or standard, practice, or procedure shall be imposed or applied by any State or political subdivision to deny or abridge the right of any citizen of the United States to vote because he is a member of a language minority group.

(3) In addition to the meaning given the term under section 4(c), the term "test or device" shall also mean any practice or requirement by which any State or political subdivision provided any registration or voting notices, forms, instructions, assistance, or other materials or information relating to the electoral process, including ballots, only in the English language, where the Director of the Census determines that more than five per centum of the citizens of voting age residing in such State or political subdivision are members of a single language minority. With respect to section 4(b), the term "test or device", as defined in this subsection, shall be employed only in making the determinations under the third sentence of that subsection.

(4) Whenever any State or political subdivision subject to the prohibitions of the second sentence of section 4(a) provides any registration or voting notices, forms, instructions, assistance, or other materials or information relating to the electoral process, including ballots, it shall provide them in the language of the applicable language minority group as well as in the English language: Provided, That where the language of the applicable minority group is oral or unwritten, the State or political subdivision is only required to furnish oral instructions, assistance, or other information relating to registration and voting.

SEC. 5. Whenever a State or political subdivision with respect to which the prohibitions set forth in section 4(a) based upon determinations made under the first sentence of section 4(b) are in effect shall enact or seek to administer any voting qualification or prerequisite to voting, or standard, practice, or procedure with respect to voting different from that in force or effect on November 1, 1964, or whenever a State or political subdivision with respect to which the prohibitions set forth in section 4(a) based upon determinations made under the second sentence of section 4(b) are in effect shall enact or seek to administer any voting qualification or prerequisite to voting, or standard, practice, or procedure with respect to voting different from that in force or effect on November 1, 1968, or whenever a State or political subdivision with respect to which the prohibitions set forth in section 4(a) based upon determinations made under the third sentence of section 4(b) are in effect shall enact or seek to administer any voting qualifications or prerequisite to voting, or standard, practice, or procedure with respect to voting different from that in force or effect on November 1, 1972, such State or subdivision may institute an action in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia for a declaratory judgment that such qualification, prerequisite, standard, practice, or procedure does not have the purpose and will not have the effect of denying or abridging the right to vote on account of race or color, or in contravention of the guarantees set forth in section 4(f)(2), and unless and until the court enters such judgment no person shall be denied the right to vote for failure to comply with such qualification, prerequisite, standard, practice, or procedure: Provided, That such qualification, prerequisite, standard, practice, or procedure may be enforced without such proceeding if the qualification, prerequisite, standard, practice, or procedure has been submitted by the chief legal officer or other appropriate official of such State or subdivision to the Attorney General and the Attorney General has not interposed an objection within sixty days after such submission, or upon good cause shown, to facilitate an expedited approval within sixty days after such submission, the Attorney General has affirmatively indicated that such objection will not be made. Neither an affirmative indication by the Attorney General that no objection will be made, nor the Attorney General's failure to object, nor a declaratory judgment entered under this section shall bar a subsequent action to enjoin enforcement of such qualification, prerequisite, standard, practice, or procedure. In the event the Attorney General affirmatively indicates that no objection will be made within the sixty-day period following receipt of a submission, the Attorney General may reserve the right to reexamine the submission if additional information comes to his attention during the remainder of the sixty-day period which would otherwise require objection in accordance with this section. Any action under this section shall be heard and determined by a court of three judges in accordance with the provisions of section 2284 of title 28 of the United States Code and any appeal shall lie to the Supreme Court.

SEC. 6. Whenever (a) a court has authorized the appointment of examiners pursuant to the provisions of section 3(a), or (b) unless a declaratory judgment has been rendered under section 4(a), the Attorney General certifies with respect to any political subdivision named in, or included within the scope of, determinations made under section 4(b) that (1) he has received complaints in writing from twenty or more residents of such political subdivision alleging that they have been denied the right to vote under color of law on account of race or color, or in contravention of the guarantees set forth in section 4 (f)(2), and that he believes such complaints to be meritorious, or (2) that in his judgment (considering, among other factors, whether the ratio of nonwhite persons to white persons registered to vote within such subdivision appears to him to be reasonably attributable to violations of the fourteenth or fifteenth amendment or whether substantial evidence exists that bona fide efforts are being made within such subdivision to comply with the fourteenth or fifteenth amendment), the appointment of examiners is otherwise necessary to enforce the guarantees of the fourteenth or fifteenth amendment, the Civil Service Commission shall appoint as many examiners for such subdivision as it may deem appropriate to prepare and maintain lists of persons eligible to vote in Federal, State, and local elections. Such examiners, hearing officers provided for in section 9(a), and other persons deemed necessary by the Commission to carry out the provisions and purposes of this Act shall be appointed, compensated, and separated without regard to the provisions of any statute administered by the Civil Service Commission, and service under this Act shall not be considered employment for the purposes of any statute administered by the Civil Service Commission, except the provisions of section 9 of the Act of August 2, 1939, as amended (5 U.S.C. 118i), prohibiting partisan political activity: Provided, That the Commission is authorized, after consulting the head of the appropriate department or agency, to designate suitable persons in the official service of the United States, with their consent, to serve in these positions. Examiners and hearing officers shall have the power to administer oaths.

SEC. 7. (a) The examiners for each political subdivision shall, at such places as the Civil Service Commission shall by regulation designate, examine applicants concerning their qualifications for voting. An application to an examiner shall be in such form as the Commission may require and shall contain allegations that the applicant is not otherwise registered to vote.

(b) Any person whom the examiner finds, in accordance with instructions received under section 9(b), to have the qualifications prescribed by State law not inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States shall promptly be placed on a list of eligible voters. A challenge to such listing may be made in accordance with section 9(a) and shall not be the basis for a prosecution under section 12 of this Act. The examiner shall certify and transmit such list, and any supplements as appropriate, at least once a month, to the offices of the appropriate election officials, with copies to the Attorney General and the attorney general of the State, and any such lists and supplements thereto transmitted during the month shall be available for public inspection on the last business day of the month and in any event not later than the forty-fifth day prior to any election. The appropriate State or local election official shall place such names on the official voting list. Any person whose name appears on the examiner's list shall be entitled and allowed to vote in the election district of his residence unless and until the appropriate election officials shall have been notified that such person has been removed from such list in accordance with subsection (d): Provided, That no person shall be entitled to vote in any election by virtue of this Act unless his name shall have been certified and transmitted on such a list to the offices of the appropriate election officials at least forty-five days prior to such election.

(c) The examiner shall issue to each person whose name appears on such a list a certificate evidencing his eligibility to vote.

(d) A person whose name appears on such a list shall be removed therefrom by an examiner if (1) such person has been successfully challenged in accordance with the procedure prescribed in section 9, or (2) he has been determined by an examiner to have lost his eligibility to vote under State law not inconsistent with the Constitution and the laws of the United States.

SEC. 8. Whenever an examiner is serving under this Act in any political subdivision, the Civil Service Commission may assign, at the request of the Attorney General, one or more persons, who may be officers of the United States, (1) to enter and attend at any place for holding an election in such subdivision for the purpose of observing whether persons who are entitled to vote are being permitted to vote, and (2) to enter and attend at any place for tabulating the votes cast at any election held in such subdivision for the purpose of observing whether votes cast by persons entitled to vote are being properly tabulated. Such persons so assigned shall report to an examiner appointed for such political subdivision, to the Attorney General, and if the appointment of examiners has been authorized pursuant to section 3(a), to the court.

SEC. 9. (a) Any challenge to a listing on an eligibility list prepared by an examiner shall be heard and determined by a hearing officer appointed by and responsible to the Civil Service Commission and under such rules as the Commission shall by regulation prescribe. Such challenge shall be entertained only if filed at such office within the State as the Civil Service Commission shall by regulation designate, and within ten days after the listing of the challenged person is made available for public inspection, and if supported by (1) the affidavits of at least two persons having personal knowledge of the facts constituting grounds for the challenge, and (2) a certification that a copy of the challenge and affidavits have been served by mail or in person upon the person challenged at his place of residence set out in the application. Such challenge shall be determined within fifteen days after it has been filed. A petition for review of the decision of the hearing officer may be filed in the United States court of appeals for the circuit in which the person challenged resides within fifteen days after service of such decision by mail on the person petitioning for review but no decision or a hearing officer shall be reversed unless clearly erroneous. Any person listed shall be entitled and allowed to vote pending final determination by the hearing officer and by the court.

(b) The times, places, procedures, and form for application and listing pursuant to this Act and removals from the eligibility lists shall be prescribed by regulations promulgated by the Civil Service Commission and the Commission shall, after consultation with the Attorney General, instruct examiners concerning applicable State law not inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States with respect to (1) the qualifications required for listing, and (2) loss of eligibility to vote.

(c) Upon the request of the applicant or the challenger or on its own motion the Civil Service Commission shall have the power to require by subpoena the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of documentary evidence relating to any matter pending before it under the authority of this section. In case of contumacy or refusal to obey a subpoena, any district court of the United States or the United States court of any territory or possession, or the District Court of the United States for the District of Columbia, within the jurisdiction of which said person guilty of contumacy or refusal to obey is found or resides or is domiciled or transacts business, or has appointed an agent for receipt of service or process, upon application by the Attorney General of the United States shall have jurisdiction to issue to such person an order requiring such person to appear before the Commission or a hearing officer, there to produce pertinent, relevant, and nonprivileged documentary evidence if so ordered, or there to give testimony touching the matter under investigation; and any failure to obey such order of the court may be punished by said court as a contempt thereof.

SEC. 10. (a) The Congress finds that the requirement of the payment of a poll tax as a precondition to voting (i) precludes persons of limited means from voting or imposes unreasonable financial hardship upon such persons as a precondition to their exercise of the franchise, (ii) does not bear a reasonable relationship to any legitimate State interest in the conduct of elections, and (iii) in some areas has the purpose or effect of denying persons the right to vote because of race or color. Upon the basis of these findings, Congress declares that the constitutional right of citizens to vote is denied or abridged in some areas by the requirement of the payment of a poll tax as a precondition to voting. Public Law 94-73

(b) In the exercise of the powers of Congress under section 5 of the fourteenth amendment, section 2 of the fifteenth amendment and section 2 of the twenty-fourth amendment, the Attorney General is authorized and directed to institute forthwith in the name of the United States such actions, including actions against States or political subdivisions, for declaratory judgment or injunctive relief against the enforcement of any requirement of the payment of a poll tax as a precondition to voting, or substitute therefor enacted after November 1, 1964, as will be necessary to implement the declaration of subsection (a) and the purposes of this section.

(c) The district courts of the United States shall have jurisdiction of such actions which shall be heard and determined by a court of three judges in accordance with the provisions of section 2284 of title 28 of the United States Code and any appeal shall lie to the Supreme Court. It shall be the duty of the judges designated to hear the case to assign the case for hearing at the earliest practicable date, to participate in the hearing and determination thereof, and to cause the case to be in every way expedited.

SEC. 11. (a) No person acting under color of law shall fail or refuse to permit any person to vote who is entitled to vote under any provision of this Act or is otherwise qualified to vote, or willfully fail or refuse to tabulate, count, and report such person's vote.

(b) No person, whether acting under color of law or otherwise, shall intimidate, threaten, or coerce, or attempt to intimidate, threaten, or coerce any person for voting or attempting to vote, or intimidate, threaten, or coerce, or attempt to intimidate, threaten, or coerce any person for urging or aiding any person to vote or attempt to vote, or intimidate, threaten, or coerce any person for exercising any powers or duties under section 3(a), 6, 8, 9, 10, or 12(e).

(c) Whoever knowingly or willfully gives false information as to his name, address, or period of residence in the voting district for the purpose of establishing his eligibility to register or vote, or conspires with another individual for the purpose of encouraging his false registration to vote or illegal voting, or pays or offers to pay or accepts payment either for registration to vote or for voting shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both: Provided, however, That this provision shall be applicable only to general, special, or primary elections held solely or in part for the purpose of selecting or electing any candidate for the office of President, Vice President, presidential elector, Member of the United States Senate, Member of the United States House of Representatives, Delegate from the District of Columbia, Guam, or the Virgin Islands, or Resident Commissioner of the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico.

(d) Whoever, in any matter within the jurisdiction of an examiner or hearing officer knowingly and willfully falsifies or conceals a material fact, or makes any false, fictitious, or fraudulent statements or representations, or makes or uses any false writing or document knowing the same to contain any false, fictitious, or fraudulent statement or entry, shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.

(e)(1) Whoever votes more than once in an election referred to in paragraph (2) shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.

(2) The prohibition of this subsection applies with respect to any general, special, or primary election held solely or in part for the purpose of selecting or electing any candidate for the office of President, Vice President, presidential elector, Member of the United States Senate, Member of the United States House of Representatives, Delegate from the District of Columbia, Guam, or the Virgin Islands, or Resident Commissioner of the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico.

(3) As used in this subsection, the term "votes more than once" does not include the casting of an additional ballot if all prior ballots of that voter were invalidated, nor does it include the voting in two jurisdictions under section 202 of this Act, to the extent two ballots are not cast for an election to the same candidacy or office.

SEC. 12. (a) Whoever shall deprive or attempt to deprive any person of any right secured by section 2, 3, 4, 5, 7, or 10 or shall violate section 11(a), shall be fined not more than $5,000, or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.

(b) Whoever, within a year following an election in a political subdivision in which an examiner has been appointed (1) destroys, defaces, mutilates, or otherwise alters the marking of a paper ballot which has been cast in such election, or (2) alters any official record of voting in such election tabulated from a voting machine or otherwise, shall be fined not more than $5,000, or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.

(c) Whoever conspires to violate the provisions of subsection (a) or (b) of this section, or interferes with any right secured by section 2, 3, 4, 5, 7, 10, or 11(a) shall be fined not more than $5,000, or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.

(d) Whenever any person has engaged or there are reasonable grounds to believe that any person is about to engage in any act or practice prohibited by section 2, 3, 4, 5, 7, 10, 11, or subsection (b) of this section, the Attorney General may institute for the United States, or in the name of the United States, an action for preventive relief, including an application for a temporary or permanent injunction, restraining order, or other order, and including an order directed to the State and State or local election officials to require them (1) to permit persons listed under this Act to vote and (2) to count such votes.

(e) Whenever in any political subdivision in which there are examiners appointed pursuant to this Act any persons allege to such an examiner within forty-eight hours after the closing of the polls that notwithstanding (1) their listing under this Act or registration by an appropriate election official and (2) their eligiblity to vote, they have not been permitted to vote in such election, the examiner shall forthwith notify the Attorney General if such allegations in his opinion appear to be well founded. Upon receipt of such notification the Attorney General may forthwith file with the district court an application for an order providing for the marking, casting, and counting of the ballots of such persons and requiring the inclusion of their votes in the total vote before the results of such election shall be deemed final and any force or effect given thereto. The district court shall hear and determine such matters immediately after the filing of such application. The remedy provided in this subsection shall not preclude any remedy available under State or Federal law.

(f) The district courts of the United States shall have jurisdiction of proceedings instituted pursuant to this section and shall exercise the same without regard to whether a person asserting rights under the provisions of this Act shall have exhausted any administrative or other remedies that may be provided by law.

SEC. 13. Listing procedures shall be terminated in any political subdivision of any State (a) with respect to examiners appointed pursuant to clause (b) of section 6 whenever the Attorney General notifies the Civil Service Commission, or whenever the District Court for the District of Columbia determines in an action for declaratory judgment brought by any political subdivision with respect to which the Director of the Census has determined that more than 50 per centum of the nonwhite persons of voting age residing therein are registered to vote, (1) that all persons listed by an examiner for such subdivision have been placed on the appropriate voting registration roll, and (2) that there is no longer reasonable cause to believe that persons will be deprived of or denied the right to vote on account of race or color, or in contravention of the guarantees set forth in section 4(f)(2) in such subdivision, and (b), with respect to examiners appointed pursuant to section 3(a), upon order of the authorizing court. A political subdivision may petition the Attorney General for the termination of listing procedures under clause (a) of this section, and may petition the Attorney General to request the Director of the Census to take such survey or census as may be appropriate for the making of the determination provided for in this section. The District Court for the District of Columbia shall have jurisdiction to require such survey or census to be made by the Director of the Census and it shall require him to do so if it deems the Attorney General's refusal to request such survey or census to be arbitrary or unreasonable.

SEC. 14. (a) All cases of criminal contempt arising under the provisions of this Act shall be governed by section 151 of the Civil Rights Act of 1957 (42 U.S.C. 1995).

(b) No court other than the District Court for the District of Columbia or a court of appeals in any proceeding under section 9 shall have jurisdiction to issue any declaratory judgment pursuant to section 4 or section 5 or any restraining order or temporary or permanent injunction against the execution or enforcement of any provision of this Act or any action of any Federal officer or employee pursuant hereto.

(c)(1) The terms "vote" or "voting" shall include all action necessary to make a vote effective in any primary, special, or general election, including, but not limited to, registration, listing pursuant to this Act, or other action required by law prerequisite to voting, casting a ballot, and having such a ballot counted properly and included in the appropriate totals of votes cast with respect to candidates for public or party office and propositions for which votes are received in an election.

(2) The term "political subdivision" shall mean any county or parish, except that where registration for voting is not conducted under the supervision of a county or parish, the term shall include any other subdivision of a State which conducts registration for voting.

(3) The term "language minorities" or "language minority group" means persons who are American Indian, Asian American, Alaskan Natives or of Spanish heritage. Public Law 94-73

(d) In any action for a declaratory judgment brought pursuant to section 4 or section 5 or this Act, subpenas for witnesses who are required to attend the District Court for the District of Columbia may be served in any judicial district of the United States: Provided, That no writ of subpena shall issue for witnesses without the District of Columbia at a greater distance than one hundred miles from the place of holding court without the permission of the District Court for the District of Columbia being first had upon proper application and cause shown.

(e) In any action or proceeding to enforce the voting guarantees of the fourteenth or fifteenth amendment, the court, in its discretion, may allow the prevailing party, other than the United States, a reasonable attorney's fee as part of the costs. Public Law 94-73

SEC. 15. Section 2004 of the Revised Statutes (42 U.S.C. 1971), as amended by section 131 of the Civil Rights Act of 1957 (71 Stat. 637), and amended by section 601 of the Civil Rights Act of 1960 (74 Stat. 90), and as further amended by section 101 of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 (78 Stat. 241), is further amended as follows:

SEC. 16. The Attorney General and the Secretary of Defense, jointly, shall make a full and complete study to determine whether, under the laws or practices of any State or States, there are preconditions to voting, which might tend to result in discrimination against citizens serving in the Armed Forces of the United States seeking to vote. Such officials shall, jointly, make a report to the Congress not later than June 30, 1966, containing the results of such study, together with a list of any States in which such preconditions exist, and shall include in such report such recommendations for legislation as they deem advisable to prevent discrimination in voting against citizens serving in the Armed Forces of the United States.

SEC. 17. Nothing in this Act shall be construed to deny, impair, or otherwise adversely affect the right to vote of any person registered to vote under the law of any State or political subdivision.

SEC. 18. There are hereby authorized to be appropriated such sums as are necessary to carry out the provisions of this Act.

SEC. 19. If any provision of this Act or the application thereof to any person or circumstances is held invalid, the remainder of the Act and the application of the provision to other persons not similarly situated or to other circumstances shall not be affected thereby.

TITLE II—SUPPLEMENTAL PROVISIONS

APPLICATION OF PROHIBITION TO OTHER STATES

SEC. 201. (a) No citizen shall be denied, because of his failure to comply with any test or device, the right to vote in any Federal, State, or local election conducted in any State or political subdivision of a State.

(b) As used in this section, the term "test or device" means any requirement that a person as a prerequisite for voting or registration for voting (1) demonstrate the ability to read, write, understand, or interpret any matter, (2) demonstrate any educational achievement or his knowledge of any particular subject, (3) possess good moral character, or (4) prove his qualifications by the voucher of registered voters or members of any other class.

RESIDENCE REQUIREMENTS FOR VOTING

Public Law 91-285

SEC. 202. (a) The Congress hereby finds that the imposition and application of the durational residency requirement as a precondition to voting for the offices of President and Vice President, and the lack of sufficient opportunities for absentee registration and absentee balloting in presidential elections—

(1) denies or abridges the inherent constitutional right of citizens to vote for their President and Vice President;

(2) denies or abridges the inherent constitutional right of citizens to enjoy their free movement across State lines;

(3) denies or abridges the privileges and immunities guaranteed to the citizens of each State under article IV, section 2, clause 1, of the Constitution;

(4) in some instances has the impermissible purpose or effect of denying citizens the right to vote for such officers because of the way they may vote;

(5) has the effect of denying to citizens the equality of civil rights, and due process and equal protection of the laws that are guaranteed to them under the fourteenth amendment; and

(6) does not bear a reasonable relationship to any compelling State interest in the conduct of presidential elections.

(b) Upon the basis of these findings, Congress declares that in order to secure and protect the above-stated rights of citizens under the Constitution, to enable citizens to better obtain the enjoyment of such rights, and to enforce the guarantees of the fourteenth amendment, it is necessary (1) to completely abolish the durational residency requirement as a precondition to voting for President and Vice President, and (2) to establish nationwide, uniform standards relative to absentee registration and absentee balloting in presidential elections.

(c) No citizen of the United States who is otherwise qualified to vote in any election for President and Vice President shall be denied the right to vote for electors for President and Vice President, or for President and Vice President, in such election because of the failure of such citizen to comply with any durational residency requirement of such State or political subdivision; nor shall any citizen of the United States be denied the right to vote for electors for President and Vice President, or for President and Vice President, in such election because of the failure of such citizen to be physically present in such State or political subdivision at the time of such election, if such citizen shall have complied with the requirements prescribed by the law of such State or political subdivision providing for the casting of absentee ballots in such election.

(d) For the purposes of this section, each State shall provide by law for the registration or other means of qualification of all duly qualified residents of such State who apply, not later than thirty days immediately prior to any presidential election, for registration or qualification to vote for the choice of electors for President and Vice President or for President and Vice President in such election; and each State shall provide by law for the casting of absentee ballots for the choice of electors for President and Vice President, or for President and Vice President, by all duly qualified residents of such State who may be absent from their election district or unit in such State on the day such election is held and who have applied therefor not later than seven days immediately prior to such election and have returned such ballots to the appropriate election official of such State not later than the time of closing of the polls in such State on the day of such election.

(e) If any citizen of the United States who is otherwise qualified to vote in any State or political subdivision in any election for President and Vice President has begun residence in such State or political subdivision after the thirtieth day next preceding such election and, for that reason, does not satisfy the registration requirements of such State or political subdivision he shall be allowed to vote for the choice of electors for President and Vice President, or for President and Vice President. in such election, (1) in person in the State or political subdivision in which he resided immediately prior to his removal if he had satisfied, as of the date of his change of residence, the requirements to vote in that State or political subdivision, or) by absentee ballot in the State or political subdivision in which he resided immediately prior to his removal if he satisfies, but for his nonresident status and the reason for his absence, the requirements for absentee voting in that State or political subdivision..

(f) No citizen of the United States who is otherwise qualified to vote by absentee ballot in any State or political subdivision in any election for President and Vice President shall be denied the right to vote for the choice of electors for President and Vice President, or for President and Vice President, in such election because of any requirement of registration that does not include a provision for absentee registration.

(g) Nothing in this section shall prevent any State or political subdivision from adopting less restrictive voting practices than those that are prescribed herein.

(h) The term "State" as used in this section includes each of the several States and the District of Columbia.

(i) The provisions of section 11(c) shall apply to false registration, and other fraudulent acts and conspiracies, committed under this section.

BILINGUAL ELECTION REQUIREMENTS

SEC. 203. (a) The Congress finds that, through the use of various practices and procedures, citizens of language minorities have been effectively excluded from participation in the electoral process. Among other factors, the denial of the right to vote of such minority group citizens is ordinarily directly related to the unequal educational opportunities afforded them, resulting in high illiteracy and low voting participation. The Congress declares that, in order to enforce the guarantees of the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments to the United States Constitution, it is necessary to eliminate such discrimination by prohibiting these practices, and by prescribing other remedial devices.

(b) Prior to August 6, 1985, no State or political subdivision shall provide registration or voting notices, forms, instructions, assistance, or other materials or information relating to the electoral process, including ballots, only in the English language if the Director of the Census determines (i) that more than 5 percent · ·e citizens of voting age of such State or political su ·

sion are members of a single language minority and (ii) that the illiteracy rate of such persons as a group is higher than the national illiteracy rate: Provided, That the prohibitions of this subsection shall not apply in any political subdivision which has less than five percent voting age citizens of each language minority which comprises over five percent of the statewide population of voting age citizens. For purposes of this subsection, illiteracy means the failure to complete the fifth primary grade. The determinations of the Director of the Census under this subsection shall be effective upon publication in the Federal Register and shall not be subject to review in any court.

(c) Whenever any State or political subdivision subject to the prohibition of subsection (b) of this section provides any registration or voting notices, forms, instructions, assistance, or other materials or information relating to the electoral process, including ballots, it shall provide them in the language of the applicable minority group as well as in the English language: Provided, That where the language of the applicable minority group is oral or unwritten or in the case of Alaskan natives, if the predominant language is historically unwritten, the State or political subdivision is only required to furnish oral instructions, assistance, or other information relating to registration and voting.

(d) Any State or political subdivision subject to the prohibition of subsection (b) of this section, which seeks to provide English-only registration or voting materials or information, including ballots, may file an action against the United States in the United States District Court for a declaratory judgment permitting such provision. The court shall grant the requested relief if it determines that the illiteracy rate of the applicable language minority group within the State or political subdivision is equal to or less than the national illiteracy rate.

(e) For purposes of this section, the term "language minorities" or "language minority group" means persons who are American Indian, Asian American, Alaskan Natives, or of Spanish heritage.

JUDICIAL RELIEF

SEC. 204. Whenever the Attorney General has reason to believe that a State or political subdivision (a) has enacted or is seeking to administer any test or device as a prerequisite to voting in violation of the prohibition contained in section 201, or (b) undertakes to deny the right to vote in any election in violation of section 202, or 203, he may institute for the United States, or in the name of the United States, an action in a district court of the United States, in accordance with sections 1391 through 1393 of title 28, United States Code, for a restraining order, a preliminary or permanent injunction, or such other order as he deems appropriate. (7) by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(b)(1) Upon the filing of a complaint in an action brought under subsection (a) of this section, notice of the action shall be published in newspapers of general circulation in the jurisdiction of the appropriate district court for three consecutive weeks, and the complaint shall, to the extent practicable, be served on all interested persons. In the event that no judge in the district is available to hear and determine the action, the chief judge of the district, or the acting chief judge, as the case may be, shall certify this fact to the chief judge of the circuit (or in his absence, the acting chief judge) who shall then designate a district or circuit judge of the circuit to hear and determine the action.

Senator HATCH. Senator Thurmond?

OPENING STATEMENT OF HON. STROM THURMOND, A U.S. SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF SOUTH CAROLINA, CHAIRMAN, COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY

Senator THURMOND. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Chairman, I am pleased to be here today as the Subcommittee on the Constitution begins hearings on the Voting Rights Act. I am confident that these hearings will be most beneficial in helping the Senate provide full and vigorous protection of the right to vote in this Nation. Few issues before the Judiciary Committee this session will match this issue in importance, and I am sure that this subcommittee will fulfill its duty to the full Senate and to the American people by establishing a complete and fair record on all of the vital issues before us.

This morning I want to make one point emphatically clear. I support, have supported, and will continue to support the right of every eligible voter in this country to have free, equal, and unhindered access to the ballot box, to cast his or her vote in all local, State, and national elections. This right to vote is the foundation of our democratic system of government and must be fully, fairly, and vigorously protected for all citizens.

Throughout my years of public service I have unyieldingly sought to protect the right to vote. Over 30 years ago as Governor, I personally led the fight in South Carolina to eliminate the poll tax, which I felt constituted a hindrance to some of our citizens in their attempt to exercise their right to vote. My fight to eliminate this barrier to the voting rights of the poor and less privileged preceded Federal efforts to eliminate poll taxes by 17 years. My first successful campaign for the U.S. Senate depended on a write-in effort, and my whole campaign was an attempt to increase voter turn-out and to educate voters on voting procedure, so that the wishes of the electorate could not be frustrated by political bosses or by technicalities.

On the national level, I have also advocated an expansion of the right to vote. Less than 4 years ago, I joined with Senators Kennedy and Mathias, who are here with us today, and with Delegate Fauntroy, to gain congressional approval of the proposed constitutional amendment to give the District of Columbia voting representatives in Congress. Despite criticism of my position, I voted for this measure, because I felt that all people in this Nation should be treated equally and fairly, especially when voting is at issue.

Because I have always valued the right to vote and have acted on that principle, I want to dispel any notion that I might be sympathetic to an attempt to diminish in any way the fair access of citizens to the ballot box. I support full, fair, and equal protection of the right to vote, and I will strenuously oppose any effort to attack the guarantee of this fundamental right.

In the past, I have questioned certain provisions of the Voting Rights Act, but that position must not be interpreted as opposition to the right to vote itself. At the time the act was proposed and later modified, I felt that some of the mechanisms incorporated in the legislation were unconstitutional. I considered it my responsibility to point out those deficiencies to my colleagues in the Senate and to the American people. Although the Supreme Court did not concur with my assessment, some of my views were supported by the late Justice Hugo Black, a man universally remembered for his commitment to individual rights under the Constitution. While there should be a reasonable discussion of the best way to implement and protect the right to vote, there should be no mistake about my position. I believe the right to vote should be fully, fairly, and vigorously defended.

As we attempt to protect voting rights, we must be sure that our approach is reasonable and fair. I have suggested that all provisions of the Voting Rights Act be applied nationwide, not in an attempt to destroy the act but because I believe that a statute must be applied equally to all citizens of this Nation in order to ensure true equal protection under the law. I do not see how you can apply a law to some people in this country and not apply it to all others.

However, if there is not sufficient sentiment for a nationwide extension, then I believe that the approach suggested by President Reagan is fair and reasonable. The act would be extended, and those jurisdictions which clearly are not discriminating would be allowed to escape selective punitive treatment for the first time in almost two decades. Such an approach should address discrimination and the opportunity for bailout at each level—State, county, and city—and each jurisdiction should be held responsible for its own actions.

As we begin our inquiry into the issues surrounding a third extension of the Voting Rights Act, this subcommittee now faces issues which are very different from the concerns about equal access to the ballot box which originally prompted the Voting Rights Act 17 years ago. The House-proposed amendment to section 2 of the act introduces the possibility of a widespread restructuring of our electoral system to facilitate proportional representation on the basis of race or ethnic background. This radical addition to the Voting Rights Act would shift the focus of the law from a question of access to the ballot box to a question of results or outcome of the electoral process. This proposal is dramatic and has profound implications for the fundamental structure and assumptions of our system of government.

Simply stated, we must examine during the course of these hearings whether the individual should remain the basis of political representation in this country or whether we should take a major and perhaps irreversible step toward the adoption of groups as the primary units of our political system. The draftsmen of our Constitution chose the individual as the primary unit of our representative democracy to avoid the dangers of severe conflict and polarization which are inherent in any system which tends to formally establish factions within a society.

I am particularly concerned, as all Americans should be, that the groups for which electoral results would be mandated by this change in section 2 would be defined by racial or ethnic classifications, classifications which are objectionable under a color-blind Constitution. Certainly, this change in the law, which would override the U.S. Supreme Court decision in the Mobile case, requires an in-depth analysis which, in my opinion, has heretofore not been fully undertaken in either body of the Congress.

Of course, before we can address the issue of what needs to be done to ensure that discrimination in voting is eradicated, we must clearly define the concept of discrimination in the area of voting rights. The Voting Rights Act was passed almost two decades ago with the purpose of removing impediments to the right of access to registration and voting. If that original intent is to be carried out, as it should be, then we must concentrate our efforts on eliminating any practices which truly hinder access to the ballot box.

However, some would have us define discrimination as something other than inhibitions on registering and voting. They would define discrimination in terms of the results of elections. For these people, the key words are not "equal access to the ballot box" but "effective political power" or "access to the ballot process." These terms have recently been created or in part borrowed from other types of cases which address the rights of persons as individuals.

Removed from their original context of individual rights, these phrases have taken a giant leap to now signify a theory of political representation which requires us to move along a path which measures success by comparing the representation of a group in elective bodies with the proportion of that group in the general population. From those who would apply this theory of discrimination we should seek to find out why they believe that the adoption of this approach will not encourage or take us closer to mandated proportional representation by race or ethnic group, a position which is being openly advocated by some in our society today.

Another crucial issue we face is the problem of finding a fair way for political jurisdictions which clearly are not engaged in discrimination to free themselves of the admittedly unequal treatment under section 5 preclearance. The preclearance mechanism was set up as a temporary method to correct so-called extraordinary circumstances in certain parts of the Nation. While the law appears to provide an opportunity to bailout for those covered jurisdictions, in reality the law itself has always precluded such an opportunity for bailout for the vast majority of covered jurisdictions. Fundamental fairness requires that these jurisdictions be treated in a reasonable manner, and public policy should dictate a bailout system which offers incentive for compliance with the law.

In conclusion, I want to restate my personal commitment to the right to vote and my support for a full, fair, and equal legislative guarantee of access to the ballot box. I also want to restate my determination to explore fully the new issues concerning both the use of election outcomes as the standard of proof for the realization of voting rights and the need for a fair and effective bailout for those jurisdictions which have been subjected to selective application of the law for the past 17 years. Such a serious inquiry is necessary, and I commend you, Mr. Chairman, for taking the leadership in insuring a full and complete discussion of all of the vital issues before us.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator HATCH. Thank you, Senator Thurmond.

Senator Grassley?

STATEMENT OF HON. CHARLES E. GRASSLEY, A U.S. SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF IOWA

Senator GRASSLEY. Mr. Chairman, I only want to emphasize one paragraph of my statement which I will later insert in the record.

On December 15, I submitted a bill on the Voting Rights Act which I thought reflected many of the President's positions as set forth in his announcement of November 6. Although this bill is not one from the administration, I consider my bill as a vehicle to proffer the position of the administration before this subcommittee. I believe the position of President Reagan will be a good point of reference for myself and the other members of this subcommittee while we evaluate the testimony presented during these hearings.

Because I revere our federalism, I feel it is necessary to insure the ability of the States to pass laws concerning their citizens. Therefore, although I emphasize that I am not bound by the provisions of my bill, I must admit a predilection to retaining the intent test in section 2 and formulating a reasonable release mechanism for preclearance.

So it is with great interest that I anticipate emphatic and scholarly testimony on these pieces of legislation and await voting for extension of the Voting Rights Act.

That is all I have.

Senator HATCH. Thank you.

PREPARED STATEMENT OF HON. CHARLES E. GRASSLEY

I join Senators Hatch and Thurmond in welcoming the witnesses and beginning what I hope will be very significant and illuminating hearings.

The right to vote is fundamental and preservative of all other rights. The right to vote knows no political affiliation. In a democracy the government must protect, encourage and enhance that right for its citizens. Consequently, the Voting Rights Act is one of the most important civil rights bills enacted by Congress. The Voting Rights Act has had tremendous impact both substantively and symbolically across the country and especially in the states covered by the special provisions. The number of minorities participating in the policial process has seen a very favorable increase.

On December 15, I submitted a bill on the Voting Rights Act which I thought reflected many of the Presidents positions as set forth in his announcement of November 6. Although not an administration bill, I consider my bill as a vehicle to proffer the position of the administration before this subcommittee. I believe the position of President Reagan will be a good point of reference for myself and the other members of this subcommittee while we evaluate the testimony presented during these hearings. Because I revere our federalism, I feel it is necessary to insure the ability of the States to pass laws concerning their citizens. Therefore, although I emphasize that I am not bound by the provisions of my bill, I must admit a predilection to retaining the intent test in section 2 and formulating a reasonable release mechanism for preclearance. So, it is with great interest I anticipate emphatic and scholarly testimony.

PREPARED STATEMENT OF SENATOR ROBERT DOLE

MR. CHAIRMAN. THE SUBCOMMITTEE ON THE CONSTITUTION IS BEGINNING HEARINGS TODAY ON ONE OF THE MOST EFFECTIVE PIECES OF CIVIL RIGHTS LEGISLATION EVER PASSED BY THE CONGRESS, LEGISLATION WHICH PROTECTS THE MOST FUNDAMENTAL OF CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHTS, THE RIGHT TO VOTE. KEY PROVISIONS OF THIS LEGISLATION ARE SCHEDULED TO EXPIRE LATER THIS YEAR AND THUS, WE MUST DECIDE: '"SHOULD THE ACT BE EXTENDED? AND IF SO, FOR HOW LONG AND IN WHAT MANNER?"

I AM SURE THAT THERE IS NOT A PERSON IN THIS ROOM WHO WOULD NOT LIKE TO BE ABLE TO TELL US THAT THE ACT IS NO LONGER NEEDED, THAT DISCRIMINATION NO LONGER EXISTS. UNFORTUNATELY, HOWEVER, I BELIEVE THAT THE CONTINUED NEED FOR THE ACT HAS ALREADY BEEN PERSUASIVELY DEMONSTRATED. AS A CONSEQUENCE, I SUPPORT THE ACT'S EXTENSION, AND I BELIEVE THAT THE VAST MAJORITY OF MY COLLEAGUES IN THE SENATE SHARE THIS VIEW.

I ALSO BELIEVE, HOWEVER, THAT SIGNIFICANT ISSUES HAVE BEEN RAISED CONCERNING THE MANNER IN WHICH THE ACT SHOULD BE EXTENDED, AND WHETHER OTHER AMENDMENTS TO THE ACT SHOULD ALSO BE MADE. IN CONSIDERING THESE ISSUES, WE MUST BE EVER MINDFUL OF OUR DUTY TO ENSURE THAT THE VOTING RIGHTS OF OUR CITIZENS SHALL IN NO

WAY BE DENIED OR ABRIDGED. HOWEVER, I THINK IT IS IMPORTANT THAT WE NOT LET OUR ZEALOUS EFFORTS TO ENSURE THIS GUARANTEE, RESULT IN AN IMPOSITION OF STANDARDS WHICH ARE IMPOSSIBLE TO MEET, OR IN REQUIRING THAT THE SINS OF THE PAST MAY NEVER BE ATONED.

IT IS WITH THESE GENERAL THOUGHTS THAT I APPROACH THE SUBJECT OF TODAY'S HEARINGS. MR. CHAIRMAN, IN THE THOROUGH MANNER TYPICAL OF YOU AND YOUR STAFF, YOU HAVE COMPILED A LIST OF WITNESSES REPRESENTING A BROAD SPECTRUM OF VIEWS ON THIS ISSUE, EVERY ONE OF WHOM IS WELL QUALIFIED TO ELOQUENTLY AND PERSUASIVELY ARTICULATE THE INTERESTS WHICH HE OR SHE REPRESENTS. I LOOK FORWARD TO REVIEWING THE STATEMENTS OF EACH OF THESE WITNESSES, AND I THANK ALL OF THEM IN ADVANCE FOR COMING HERE TO SHARE WITH US THEIR VIEWS.

PREPARED STATEMENT OF SENATOR JOSEPH R. BIDEN, JR.

With the elimination of the poll tax, residency requirements, and literacy tests, the most egregious aspects of discrimination against American minority voters have been eliminated. However, discriminatory changes in election systems can still deny or abridge minority voting . Therefore, the Voting Rights Act should be extended.

I am a co-sponsor of S. 1992 because I believe strongly that it is necessary to extend the Voting Rights Act requirement for preclearance for certain jurisdictions. Ten years in the future, in 1992, when the amended bill would allow all states to change their election laws without automatic scrutiny by the federal government, hopefully there will be no need for its provisions. Such is not the case in 1982, however. The country still needs the provisions of the Voting Rights Act and it must be extended.

Although S. 1992 is not perfect it is presently the only effective vehicle available to extend all the provisons of the present Voting Rights Act - an act which I believe is critical for this country.

Senator HATCH. Senator Mathias and Senator Specter? I understand you are going to testify, Senator Mathias. Do you have any comments, Senator Specter?

Senator SPECTER. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I have no statement.

Senator HATCH. Thank you.

Senator MATHIAS. Mr. Chairman, I do have just one question, however, that I think would be helpful to many people in the room. It is my understanding that you have added 2 days of testimony to the previous schedule that had been planned for January 13.

Senator HATCH. We have changed the dates on which the hearings will be held. I do not think we have added to the total number of hearings.

Senator MATHIAS. I am a little confused.

Senator HATCH. As I understand it, we have the same total number of days.

Senator MATHIAS. We lost 2 days, the 13th and the 20th.

Senator HATCH. No, we lost only 1 day which we will pick up later. But we will have the same number of days of hearings. My goal is to finish at exactly the same time as we had previously planned.

Senator MATHIAS. I understand that, and I applaud that. I had been informed that you had added the 1st and the 12th as dates.

Senator HATCH. I do not think so. The dates are the 27th—today—28th, 1st, 2d, 4th, 11th, 12th, 24th, and 25th of February. By February 25 we will have concluded our hearings, and hopefully we will be able to mark up this bill in the subcommittee shortly thereafter. That has been my goal from the beginning. I intend to maintain that schedule, barring any unforeseen contingencies.

Senator MATHIAS. But the schedule as you have announced it is now the schedule?

Senator HATCH. As far as I am concerned, that is the schedule, unless there is some unforeseen occurrence that would cause me to alter it.

At this time, we will call upon the Attorney General of the United States, William French Smith.

We are very pleased to have you here, General Smith, and we will look forward to your testimony at this time.

STATEMENT OF HON. WILLIAM FRENCH SMITH, U.S. ATTORNEY GENERAL, DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

Attorney General SMITH. Thank you, Mr. Chairman and members of the subcommittee. I am grateful for the opportunity to appear before this subcommittee to present the administration's views regarding proposed amendments to the Voting Rights Act of 1965.

There is perhaps no more important piece of legislation to come before this Congress than the one now being considered. As President Reagan has so often emphasized, the right to vote is "the most sacred right of free men and women." It rightfully claims this lofty status because it is, in point of fact, preservative of all other rights.

Senator HATCH. Excuse me, Mr. Attorney General.

Can the people in the back hear the Attorney General?

Could you pull the microphone a little bit closer, General Smith?

Attorney General SMITH. Certainly.

The people of America recognized as much in 1870 by their adoption of the 15th amendment to the Constitution. Since then they have supported efforts to expand the franchise and to secure its exercise free from force, fraud, and unlawful discrimination.

By means of constitutional amendment, legislative enactment, and judicial rulings over many decades, the country has demonstrated its continuing commitment to the truths that all men are created equal and that governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed. It is these ideals that must guide the deliberations of this subcommittee and the full Senate today and in the weeks ahead as they carefully consider the matter at hand.

The Voting Rights Act unmistakably stands as the centerpiece of those legal protections that guard against denials or abridgements of the right to vote. Enacted in 1965 because some States and localities sought to prevent blacks from exercising this most precious right, the act opened a new chapter in the struggle to achieve real equality for racial minorities.

The act's principal purpose was to provide badly needed enforcement tools for carrying into effect the guarantee of the 15th amendment that no one shall be deprived of the right to vote on account of race.

The present act contains both permanent and temporary provisions. The permanent provisions, which apply nationwide, include section 2 of the statute, which generally forbids electoral devices and procedures that deny or abridge the right to vote because of race, color, or, since 1975, membership in a language minority group.

The temporary or special provisions of the act, which include sections 4 and 5, are directed against only a small number of States and some subdivisions in other States. Located primarily in the South, these jurisdictions were historically associated with efforts to deny full political equality to blacks.

The special provisions required these covered jurisdictions to submit for preclearance by the U.S. Attorney General or the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia all changes in electoral practices or procedures. Such changes are allowed to go into effect only after the submitting jurisdiction satisfies the Attorney General or the district court that the revisions have neither the purpose nor the effect of denying or abridging the right to vote on account of race or membership in a language minority group.

The special provisions also included a so-called bailout mechanism, whereby a covered jurisdiction could, after a certain number of years, apply to remove itself from special coverage on a showing that no prohibited test or device had been used during a set period. At the time of its original enactment, the act set this period at 5 years.

In 1970 Congress reviewed the then 5-year history of the act and found sufficient evidence of continued racial discrimination in voting in the selected jurisdictions to warrant an extension of the preclearance provisions for another 5 years.

In 1975 Congress again revisited the issue, extended the preclearance provisions for another 7 years, until August 1982, and brought within their coverage for 10 years additional jurisdictions, in both the North and the South, having sizable language minorities.

Today the question is once again before Congress: Should these special provisions be extended yet a third time? In the administration's view, the answer to that question must be in the affirmative.

Measured by almost any yardstick, the results of the act are impressive. Literacy tests, poll taxes, and similar devices which led to the original Voting Rights Act have been effectively eliminated. Minorities, especially blacks in the South, have made dramatic gains in voter registration and election to public office.

For example, the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights estimates in 1965 that only 6.4 percent of eligible blacks were registered to vote in Mississippi. By 1976 that figure had reached 67.4 percent. Similarly, in South Carolina minority voter registration since 1965 has increased from 34.3 percent at the time the act was passed to 55.8 percent in 1980. In the South as a whole, black voter registration in 1976 was estimated to be nearly 60 percent. Moreover, the number of black elected officials in the South has increased dramatically, from fewer than 100 in 1965 to more than 2,000 in 1980. Louisiana and Mississippi, for example, rank among the top four States in the Nation in the number of black elected officials, and the Georgia State Assembly has the highest number of black members in the country.

Notable gains have also been achieved in a number of covered jurisdictions having sizable Hispanic populations. In Texas, voter registration among Hispanics has increased by two-thirds in recent years and the number elected to public office has increased by 30 percent since 1976. Even more dramatic is the case of Arizona, where Hispanics constitute 16.2 percent of the population and 13.2 percent of all elected officials.

These encouraging statistics are but a quantitative measure of a significant qualitative change for the better, especially in the South, since the Voting Rights Act became law almost 17 years ago. There is no doubt whatsoever that the act has contributed greatly toward the creation of a truly nondiscriminatory political and social environment.

Heartening as this news is, it is offset by the sad truth that racial discrimination in the electoral process still exists in certain covered jurisdictions. The Justice Department's enforcement experience in this area still demonstrates that some political jurisdictions in the country have made insufficient progress and that continued Federal oversight of those jurisdictions is necessary. There is thus no question that the special provisions of the Voting Rights Act should be extended for an additional period.

As the Senate considers the merits of the various legislative proposals before it, its deliberations should, in my view, be guided by four fundamental principles.

The first and plainly most important consideration is that the right to vote not be denied or abridged on account of race or membership in a language minority group. That principle is sacrosanct and must not be compromised in any way.

Second, it is imperative that we not lose sight of the fact that, while the Voting Rights Act was enacted in part as a prophylactic safeguard against racial discrimination in certain jurisdictions having a history of discrimination in voting, it had another and more critical purpose as well, which was forward-looking and constructive in nature.

That purpose was to encourage States and localities to bring blacks and other racial minorities into the mainstream of American political life. In revisiting the statute in 1982, the emphasis should be placed on the positive objectives of the legislation rather than dwelling on the chapter that led to passage of the act 17 years ago.

Third, even while deliberating on an extension of the act's special provisions, due recognition must be given to the very real progress made since the Voting Rights Act was enacted. This is not 1965, and the racial problems of that year are not, thankfully, those of 1982.

The march toward full equality in the electoral process continues. While we cannot disregard the distance yet to be traveled, we should also credit the milestones that have been met, not the least of which are the impressive gains in minority registration and representation to which I have just referred. Americans of all races can take pride in the fact that many jurisdictions against whom the act's special provisions are directed have made dramatic and lasting strides to correct past abuses.

Fourth, in the same breath that we speak of an extension of the act, we must also underscore its exceptional character. It vests extraordinary powers in the National Government over matters that, consistent with the principles of federalism, have traditionally rested within the province of States and local control.

Moreover, it establishes a dual pattern of enforcement, whereby some parts of the country are subjected to more stringent legal obligations than other areas. Based on the evidentiary record before it, Congress felt in 1965 that there was good and sufficient reason, which indeed there was, for differential treatment.

Even so, the Supreme Court, in sustaining the constitutionality of the act, took care to note the temporary nature of the special provisions, the fact that particular jurisdictions had been found by Congress to have violated their constitutional obligations, and the fact that these jurisdictions would be given an opportunity to get out from under the act's special burdens.

With these principles in mind, we at the Department of Justice, in response to a request that President Reagan made of me on June 15, 1981, undertook a comprehensive assessment of the act's history to date, extant or likely abuses of voting rights that may require special scrutiny, the adequacy of the Department's powers under the act, the desirability of making any changes in the existing legislation, and the feasibility of extending the act's coverage to voting rights infringements not now covered by the act.

As one element of this review, I and members of my staff met personally with a number of civil rights groups and other organizations, Members of Congress and their staffs, Governors, and other State and local representatives.

The results of our study can be simply stated. The Voting Rights Act of 1965 has worked well, but the need for its special protection continues. The President has therefore endorsed an extension of the act in its present form for a period of 10 years. This is longer than any previous extension voted by Congress.

At the same time, the President pointed out, and our analysis of the history of enforcement under the act confirms, covered States or political subdivisions should have the opportunity to demonstrate that they have indeed removed past practices of racial discrimination from their electoral processes and have been in compliance with the law for many years.

Accordingly, if the Senate were to include in the act a provision allowing such governmental units to bail out prior to the expiration of the 10-year extension we are recommending, the administration would support such a modification. In this connection, there are now pending before this subcommittee two bills that would amend the current bailout provision in section 4 of the act to release jurisdictions from the preclearance requirements upon meeting specified criteria.

The Department will certainly work with this subcommittee in the weeks ahead to seek to devise from the various alternatives under consideration a workable and fair bailout provision to be included in the Senate bill.

On another point relevant to extension, let me say a few words about the bilingual election provisions of the act. The bilingual protections of sections 4 and 203 were added in 1975 to secure the right to vote for those citizens who are not fluent in the English language.

In our meetings with various groups last summer, we heard numerous expressions of support for the bilingual provisions. Citizens whose first language is not English have been afforded by these provisions the opportunity to participate effectively in the election process.

Our limited experience since 1975 indicates that the bilingual procedures have, by and large, worked well. As a result, we believe that Congress should place the bilingual provisions on the same footing as the special coverage provisions, uniformly extending the section 4 bailout eligibility date to 1992 and also similarly extending section 203.

In addressing the question of extending the life of the act to August 1992, let me make clear that only the special coverage of section 4 requires congressional attention, since only that coverage would be subject to termination in August of this year. Section 2 of the act is permanent legislation, and no action by Congress is needed to continue its protections.

The House has passed legislation that would dramatically change section 2 of the Voting Rights Act to permit proof of a violation based solely on election results. This change in the act's permanent provision runs counter to a Supreme Court ruling handed down in 1980.

As the plurality decision in City of Mobile v. Bolden—466 U.S. 55 (1980)—made clear, section 2 of the Voting Rights Act, like the 15th amendment, currently prohibits all States and local governments, both North and South, from employing any voting practice or procedure designed or purposefully maintained to discriminate on the basis of race or color. Proof that the challenged election practice was intended to discriminate against a racial minority is essential to a claim under both the 15th amendment and section 2 of the Voting Rights Act.

The proposed replacement of a results or effects test for the existing intent standard in section 2 effectively imposes upon the entire country a legal test that since 1965 Congress has seen fit to apply only to certain jurisdictions that had been demonstrably derelict in their failure to protect minority voting rights and, even then, only as to voting changes adopted by those jurisdictions.

No evidence was presented either in testimony before the House committee or in the House floor debates that there have been voting rights violations throughout the country so as to justify nationwide application of an effects test. So major an amendment should not be endorsed by Congress without compelling and demonstrable reasons for doing so. The inclusion in section 2 of such a test would call into question the validity of State and local election laws and systems that have long been in existence, not just in the South, but in all of America. Any move by Congress in this direction should not be taken without full appreciation of all its ramifications.

In particular, under a nationwide effects test, any voting law or procedure in the country which produces election results that fail to mirror the population makeup in a particular community would be vulnerable to legal challenge under section 2.

Historic political systems incorporating at-large elections and multimember districts, which had never before been questioned under either the act or the Constitution, would suddenly be subject to attack. So, too, would be many redistricting and reapportionment plans.

Nor would the reach of an amended section 2 be limited to statewide legislative elections; it would apply as well to local elections such as those involving school boards and city and county governmental offices, and it would apply to existing voting practices and procedures of longstanding application as certainly as to the most recent voting change.

To entertain this kind of amendment to the act's permanent provisions is inevitably to invite years of extended litigation, leaving in doubt the validity of longstanding State and local election laws in the interim and inviting the Federal courts, on no more than a finding of disproportionate election results, to restructure governmental systems that have been in place for decades.

That prospect cannot be lightly dismissed. The Voting Rights Act in its present form has, by all accounts, worked extremely well. Its provisions have been subjected to the most meticulous judicial scrutiny in almost every context imaginable. Its reach and coverage are now well defined and generally understood.

In my meetings last summer with various civil rights groups, they were unwavering in their praise of the existing legislation as one of the most effective statutes ever passed by Congress. They, too, expressed concern that amendments would generate yet another prolonged period of disruptive and unsettling litigation. Their strongly held view at that time was: "If it is not broken, don't fix it." There is much commonsense to that admonition.

Mr. Chairman, the Voting Rights Act has opened up access to our political process for millions of minority citizens. It has proven to be impressively effective, but the job is not yet finished. Consequently, a straight 10-year extension of the act is required to insure continued Federal protection of the cherished right to vote, as guaranteed by the 15th amendment.

In conclusion, I want to make clear that the administration will support any strong voting rights bill approved by the Senate, including either a straight 10-year extension of the current Voting Rights Act or a 10-year version of the House bill, provided it is modified so that it reflects the principles I have outlined in my testimony.

Thank you.

Senator HATCH. Thank you, Mr. Attorney General.

Can you summarize for this subcommittee the major differences between the administration's position on extension of the Voting Rights Act and the House-passed legislation?

Attorney General SMITH. Of course, the principal difference is section 2, which is the one I have just mentioned. Another difference, of course, is that the House bill is in perpetuity. We are recommending an extension of the act, as is, for 10 years. And, of course, there is the bailout provision.

With respect to that provision, as I have indicated in my testimony, we will be very happy to work with this subcommittee to work out a bailout provision that is fair and reasonable, and which would be acceptable to the President.

Section 2, I think, as has been said, is a very dramatic extension of the effects test, now only in section 5, nationwide. It is dramatic in another sense, and that is that it not only deals with changes in election laws and practices, as does section 5, but it also deals with existing election situations, practices, and procedures. That is a very dramatic change.

As I have stated in my testimony, this result has been arrived at in the House bill without any case having been made, so far as we can tell, of a need for that extension.

When section 5 was debated in 1965, a very compelling case was made for the dramatic change in the law, a dramatic intrusion of the Federal Government into State and local practices, which was very much warranted under the circumstances as then developed in extensive hearings before the Congress.

In this case, a change, which is also dramatic, has been made without any such case having been made. So far as I know, no evil has been pointed to which is needed to be corrected. Therefore, I would certainly urge this subcommittee to take a very strong look at what in fact this change in section 2 would accomplish and weigh that against whatever evil is intended to be corrected by that extensive change.

Senator HATCH. Do you consider this proposed change a radical change from present law?

Attorney General SMITH. It is certainly a very dramatic change. I think one could make a case that it is as dramatic, in a way, as some of the provisions in section 5.

Everybody recognizes that section 5, when it was passed, was designed to make a much needed correction to a problem that existed in the covered States. Here, however, we are extending it nationwide.

As a matter of fact, I think it is very interesting that when the House considered the extension of section 5 nationwide and rejected that, which would include of course the preclearance provisions, it determined at that point that that would not be a wise step to take.

As a matter of fact, in the House report rejecting the extension of section 5 nationwide, the following statements are made, which I think are very, very applicable to the proposed extension of the effects test nationwide. The House report says, "Without a precise showing of need, the expansion of section 5 coverage to include all counties, States, and local jurisdictions in the country seems arbitrary and wasteful, especially at a time when there is much concern about excessive governmental intrusion into State and local matters." I am now reading from the House report on the House bill.

It goes on to say, "In the absence of a detailed showing of need, serious constitutional questions are raised about applying this uncommon exercise of congressional power to the country as a whole.

"The United States Supreme Court, in South Carolina v. Katzenbach and City of Rome v. United States, upheld the constitutionality of section 5 precisely because it was tailored to address a specific problem about which Congress had amassed detailed evidence in its hearing record."

And again, "Nationwide preclearance would raise serious administrative burdens for the Department of Justice, especially since it must process all submissions within 60 to 120 days."

In this case, if section 2 were amended as proposed, instead of the Department of Justice, it would be the Federal judiciary that would be intruding itself in who knows how many State and local governmental situations, and all, as I say, without any showing, that I have seen, that there is a need for such a dramatic change. This is the basic reason that the administration has taken the position it has taken with respect to the change from the intents test to the effects test in section 2.

Senator HATCH. It is frequently claimed that the Mobile decision was a sharp departure from earlier interpretations of section 2 and the 15th amendment. By this line of argument, all that results proponents are doing is restoring the status quo that existed prior to Mobile. What is your view on this assertion frequently made by those who are proposing the dramatic effects test?

Attorney General SMITH. There has been a substantial misunderstanding of the law in this respect. The Mobile case did not change the law. As a matter of fact, the Mobile case was the first U.S. Supreme Court case to pass on section 2. That was the law as enunciated.

The misunderstanding seems to be that somehow section 2 in the past has been applied with an effects test. That is not the case. There may be one or two cases where the effects test was utilized under section 2, but to say——

Senator HATCH. Would those be lower court cases?

Attorney General SMITH. Lower court cases.

Senator HATCH. I see.

Attorney General SMITH. One or two. However, there has been so much misunderstanding, as indicated by a Washington Post editorial the day before yesterday, which made that contention that Mobile reversed the prior law and therefore Mobile, in turn, should be reversed to reinstate what went on before. It then cited two cases to establish what the pre-Mobile law had been. Both of those cases did not involve section 2 at all, and both of them, properly analyzed, involved an intent test.

Actually, it really does not require much more than a reading of the statute itself. When Congress passed this act in 1965, it very clearly expressed an intents test in section 2 and it very clearly expressed an effects test in section 5. If Congress at that time had intended to put an effects test in section 2, it could just as clearly have done so there as it did in section 5, but it chose not to do so.

As a matter of fact, the legislative history of that section shows that Senator Dirksen commented to the effect that section 2 was intended in effect to paraphrase the 15th amendment. Of course the 15th amendment, as we all know, has an intents test, as does the 14th amendment. As a matter of fact, the 14th amendment, under which so much progress has been made in the civil rights area, has always had an intents test. That really is the rule, not the exception, in this area.

Senator HATCH. I might mention that in the Mobile case the Supreme Court asserts in their ruling that there was no prior case that established the effects test.

Attorney General SMITH. Justice Stewart very well analyzed the law as it existed prior to the Mobile case and came to exactly the same conclusion—namely, that there has not been an effects test under section 2 at any time.

Senator HATCH. That is right.

How does the intents standard in the 15th amendment satisfy the objectives of that amendment, in your viewpoint?

Attorney General SMITH. I am afraid I do not understand the question.

Senator HATCH. Let me restate it. How does the intents standard, as you have described it, as applicable in the past and under Mobile satisfy the objectives of the 15th amendment in your view?

Attorney General SMITH. As I have said, as with the 14th amendment, I think that the protection of the right to vote has been extremely well established under the law as it exists now throughout the country.

It is true that with respect to the covered States there was a specific problem that needed to be addressed there, and it was to meet that problem that the effects test was put into section 5, and I think it is certainly doing its job there, although, as I have said in my statement, a good deal more needs to be done.

Senator HATCH. OK. To what extent is it necessary that section 2 continue to track the constitutional requirements of the 15th amendment? Do you see any constitutional problems in Congress altering the section 2 standard by statutorily overturning Mobile? Apparently that is what the intent of the proposed changes in section 2 is: To overturn a constitutionally based Supreme Court case, which seems somewhat ironic to me.

Attorney General SMITH. I think that if carried to its logical conclusion, proportional representation or, put another way, quotas, would be the end result. As a matter of fact, if you consider that applying the effects test the way it would be applied under the House change, the only ultimate logical result could be proportional representation, and I do not see how anyone could seriously advocate that as an ultimate result.

Senator HATCH. Or as a constitutional principle.

Attorney General SMITH. It certainly is contrary to any of our basic principles of government.

Also underlying all of this is sort of an implication that blacks will only vote for black candidates and whites will only vote for white candidates. That of course is not true. One of the best examples of that is the city of Los Angeles, where a black mayor of course was elected with many white votes.

I think the concept, the idea, or the institutionalizing of a system which would be based upon the premise that blacks are going to vote for black candidates and whites are going to vote for white candidates is a very unfortunate scheme.

Senator HATCH. In the Mobile case, Justice Stewart had this to say: "The answer to the appellee's argument is that, as the district court expressly found, their freedom to vote has not been denied or abridged by anyone," which is what you are saying. "The 15th amendment does not entail the right to have negro candidates elected, and neither Smith v. Allwright nor Terry v. Adams contains any implication to the contrary. The 15th amendment prohibits only purposeful discriminatory denial or abridgement by government of the freedom to vote on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude." That is the position I think I understand you to be taking.

Attorney General SMITH. Certainly with that change, the emphasis is not on protecting the right to vote; the emphasis is on election results.

Senator HATCH. Are your concerns about the results test allayed by the disclaimer provision in section 2 of the House bill which states expressly that, "The fact that members of a minority group have not been elected in numbers equal to that group's proportion of the population shall not, in and of itself, constitute a violation"?

Attorney General SMITH. No, I do not think that that proviso would prevent the ultimate result of proportional representation. The way that proviso is now stated, it would in effect require—that is, section 2 would require that a system be put into place which would produce proportional representation.

Then—and this is where the proviso would come into effect—that system being in place, if in fact, for whatever reason, the blacks, let us say, did not put up a candidate, so that for that reason all of the members of a city council were white, then the proviso would come into play and say that is not a violation of section 2.

But that is quite a different thing from saying that that proviso would prevent a system producing proportional representation from coming into effect, because it would not. I think that proviso would have only that very limited application.

Senator HATCH. Do you agree with the Court, in Mobile and in the recent Feeney case, that discriminatory purpose "implies more than intent as awareness of consequences" and that it requires that a decisionmaker selected or reaffirmed a particular course of action, at least in part, because of its adverse effects upon an identifiable group?

Attorney General SMITH. Would you restate that question?

Senator HATCH. Let me do it again. Do you agree with the Court in Mobile and in the recent Feeney case that discriminatory purpose implies "more than intent as awareness of consequences" and that it requires that a decisionmaker "selected or reaffirmed" a particular course of action, at least in part, "because of" its adverse effects upon an identifiable group?

Attorney General SMITH. I am afraid I would have to see that one in writing and probably give you a written answer to it.

Senator HATCH. All right, we will submit that in writing to you and perhaps get a written answer back.

We agree with the discussion of "discriminatory purpose" in Justice Stewart's opinion in Mobile v. Bolden, 446 U.S. 55 (1980) and in the opinion for the Court in Personnel Administrator v. Feener, 442 U.S. 256 (1979). I would note also that in both cases the Court made it quite clear that evidence of effects or results is relevant to the ultimate question of discriminatory purpose.

Senator HATCH. Senator Kennedy?

Senator KENNEDY. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

I, along with Senator Mathias, had sponsored the legislation which is cosponsored now by 59 Members of the U.S. Senate, which is basically the House-passed bill. I had intended to make a comment on it in support of that legislation and will welcome the opportunity to do so.

I do not want to interfere with the Attorney General's time, but I either want to make sure that my statement is included in its entirety at an appropriate place in the record or otherwise have the opportunity to make that presentation during the course of the hearings.

We have many distinguished men and women who have traveled many miles and who have come here to testify, so I will accommodate the Chair on this issue, but I want to have assurances that we are going to have an opportunity, as we do in other committees, to make sure that we are able to have our statements included in their entirety.

Senator HATCH. If the Senator would yield, as soon as the Attorney General has finished, I plan on calling on Senator Mathias, then the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, and then the distinguished Senator from Ohio. We have you right on order, but of course we wanted the first witness to be the administration.

Senator KENNEDY. I want to just make sure that the statement be in the record.

Senator HATCH. Of course. If you prefer to just put it in the record, we will do it that way.

Senator KENNEDY. General, I want to welcome you here before the committee again. I heard your comments on the Voting Rights Act stated with such assuredness about your understanding of what the legislative history was in the development of that legislation here this morning.

As someone who was involved with that legislation, I must say that that is not my understanding of the legislative history, but I think during the course of the hearings we will hear testimony on that and also about the 15th and 14th amendments.

General, you are, I think, an extremely experienced lawyer, and I know that you are serving the President well, but I must say that you appear here before this subcommittee when there really is a very significant crisis of confidence in this administration in its commitment to the millions of people of this country—the majority who are women and the minority whose skins are not white.

I think in the kinds of assurances that you are giving to this subcommittee about the commitment of the administration in terms of full voting rights for the citizens of the Nation has to be viewed against a background where the administration has attempted to give encouragement to those who are committed to the concept of segregated schools by providing tax exemptions to them; against a background where the administration has fired the head of the Civil Rights Commission, a distinguished Republican who had served with great distinction in a previous Republican Cabinet; against a background where the administration nominated someone for the EEOC, which is an instrument of any administration to help assure that discrimination will not exist against minorities and against women in our society, who was completely unqualified and who had to be withdrawn by the administration itself; and against a track record which the Lawyers Committee on Civil Rights, made up of some of the most distinguished Republican and Democratic lawyers in this country, who have given tirelessly of themselves and volunteered to share the central concern of the people of this country for full voting rights for citizens of the Nation—the Lawyers Committee for Civil Rights evaluation of the record of this administration on voting rights is very negative; and I quote—"Although there has not been a complete abdication of Voting Rights Act enforcement, as evidenced by several objections, Justice Department voting rights enforcement has been increasingly marked by political interference and significant retreat from strict enforcement of the act."

When you look around this country you see that the heaviest burden of the administration's economic policy have fallen upon minority youths, where unemployment is virtually 42 to 45 percent. Given all these concerns, how can a significant group of Americans, whose skin is not white, let alone the majority of Americans, who care very deeply about what this country represents and what it is all about, have very much confidence that these alterations and changes that you are suggesting to us here today in terms of voting rights are really going to fulfill what I believe has been the national commitment, decided a number of years ago, to have a tough but fair voting rights statute that gives meaningful protection to all the citizens of this country that they were not going to be denied the right to vote?

Attorney General SMITH. Senator Kennedy, it is the injection of this kind of political rhetoric into a situation like this which makes it very difficult to analyze and diagnose a piece of legislation——

Senator KENNEDY. Do you want to take the statement piece by piece?

Senator HATCH. Why do you not let him answer the question, Senator?

Attorney General SMITH. I think we are talking here about section 2.

Senator KENNEDY. I thought we were talking about voting rights.

Attorney General SMITH. I do not think here it would be appropriate for me to go through step by step and rebut all of the statements that you have made, because that is not what, as I understand it, this arena is all about.

Some of the things that you stated are misstatements, particularly the one about tax exemptions for schools that discriminate.

Senator KENNEDY. Well, do you want to explain it then, General?

Attorney General SMITH. No, I do not think this is the time or the place——

Senator KENNEDY. If you are going to say that I have misstated——

Attorney General SMITH. Well, you have misstated——

Senator HATCH. Mr. Kennedy, let us let the Attorney General answer the question. Let him finish. You have just accused the administration of some things which he states are inaccurate. Let him finish showing you how inaccurate they are.

Senator KENNEDY. All right.

Attorney General SMITH. As a matter of fact, I do not see any point in my making a counter political speech in response, because I do not think that is what I am here for.

Senator HATCH. It might be a very good idea, Mr. Attorney General. [Laughter.]

Attorney General SMITH. It is certainly very much needed; there is no question about that.

Senator HATCH. I agee with you.

Attorney General SMITH. Because it is this kind of approach to problems that makes it very difficult to focus on what we are really talking about here. The amendment to section 2 is just bad legislation.

I yield not an inch to Senator Kennedy in my abhorrence of discrimination in any form. Nor do I yield to anyone else in that respect. And I think my record makes that very clear.

What we are talking about here is good versus bad legislation, and bad legislation is not made good through general, broad, political, rhetorical attacks. You can only legislate properly when you look at specifically what you are doing, and I think that is what this hearing is supposed to be all about.

There are so many other areas, too, where there have been just major distortions of the positions that the administration has taken, and so much so that you have to sort of pierce all of that cloud and persiflage and badinage in order to get down to the issues that we are really addressing.

Here, the issue I am addressing is whether the amendment to section 2 is good or bad. I think it is bad legislation for the reasons that I have stated, and it seems to me that in order to be constructive before this committee, those are the issues that we should be talking about.

As a matter of fact, I might say too that the President does not have a discriminatory bone in his body. He has never taken any action in his entire life——

[Laughter.]

Senator HATCH. We are going to have order in this room, or I will have the room cleared.

I agree with the Attorney General. This is too important a constitutional issue to have more heat than light. If we are going to discuss it, we are going to discuss it both on the legal principles and on fairness principles.

I am not going to tolerate any sneering or snide comments and remarks from either side in this issue. Let us understand that this is an important issue.

Senators Kennedy and Mathias have sponsored a bill that they consider to be extremely important. Some disagree with that bill. The principal representative of this administration has disagreed mightily here. We are going to show respect for him and, I might add, for the President of the United States, who I, too, know not to have a discriminatory bone in his body.

I resent some of the things that have been written and some of the things that have been said to distort the issues involved here. I think it is time to start talking about the real issues and not trying to make this into an emotional camouflage game.

If there is a side supporting this bill that can be presented, it is going to be presented. If there is a side opposing this bill, it, too, will be presented. Both sides will be given their opportunities. But I refuse to have any more outbursts of this kind from either side of this issue. It is an important issue, and both sides have important points to make. As long as I am chairman, both sides are going to be able to make those points without interruption. We are going to show respect for the Attorney General of the United States—Senators, participants, and audience.

Mr. Attorney General?

Senator MATHIAS. Mr. Chairman, just by way of correcting the record, the bill has not just been introduced by Senator Kennedy and myself. In fact, I am happy to be able to advise the subcommittee this morning that there are 62 Members of the Senate sponsoring the bill. The distinguished Senator from New Mexico, Mr. Schmitt, has become the 62d cosponsor. So it is not just the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Maryland.

Senator HATCH. Senator Mathias, we list Senator Kennedy and yourself as the principal cosponsors. I would like to see 100 percent of the Senators sponsor a bill to extend the Voting Rights Act. But as you all know, the issue of this bill as the appropriate method of achieving that goal is not yet over.

Senator Kennedy?

Senator KENNEDY. Thank you.

General, you have mentioned in your testimony that you met in the course of the summer with a number of the civil rights groups, and, as I understand from your testimony on page 12, "they were unwavering of their praise of the existing legislation."

Can you tell me whether there is any civil rights group that is going to be supporting the administration's position as stated here before this subcommittee, and if so, which one?

Attorney General SMITH. Senator Kennedy, I can say that every civil rights group representative that I talked to in the spring, summer, and fall subscribed to exactly the position that the President is taking.

Part of our process in examining the history and the operation of the Voting Rights Act was to discuss this with groups across the spectrum. We talked at length to the various types of groups that I mentioned in my statement here. During that process I suggested various options, because this was the function that I had been assigned—how the act could be improved upon.

Without any exception that I can remember, the responses were that the Civil Rights Act is a crown jewel, it is one of the most successful pieces of legislation ever, "Don't change it; it should be extended as is."

I would suggest a change possibly in the preclearance provisions that would make some sense.

The response uniformly was, "Don't change it; section 5 is the Civil Rights Act—section 5 is the Civil Rights Act; it has been a highly successful piece of legislation as is; don't change it."

The answer to your question is a categorical yes.

Senator KENNEDY. We will have a chance to listen to many of those whom you met with. I happened to meet with them, and they uniformly expressed to me the importance of voting rights, but they uniformly expressed to me that they had expressed to you that there were going to have to be changes in section 2.

They can testify and will testify at the correct time, but if that was not the case and it was as you stated, then I think that is a matter of some significance. If it is as I stated, I think that is a matter of significance. We will have a chance to listen to them.

Attorney General SMITH. The focus was almost entirely on section 5.

Senator KENNEDY. Rather than my trying to anticipate what they said, we will have a chance to listen to them.

Attorney General SMITH. There might have been some reference to section 2, but if there were, I do not remember it. And have in mind, this was before the House bill was debated or passed.

After the House bill was passed, I can understand why their position would change. That is perfectly understandable. If I were they, my position would change too.

Senator KENNEDY. Why, if you were they—if you were representing the minorities, why would your position have changed? I think that is a very good point. Why would your position have changed?

Attorney General SMITH. Why would my position have changed?

Senator KENNEDY. Yes. You just stated that if you were the minorities, after the House-passed bill, your position would have changed on section 2 as well. Now, why?

Attorney General SMITH. Because I think as advocates, that would be the position probably to take at that point.

Senator KENNEDY. What kind of advocates?

Attorney General SMITH. As advocates, obviously.

Senator KENNEDY. Advocates of what?

Attorney General SMITH. Advocates of their particular position.

Senator KENNEDY. Of what position? Of minorities participating in the voting rights process of this country?

Attorney General SMITH. In negotiating with respect to legislation. That is perfectly understandable. There is nothing unusual about that.

I want to emphasize that I was talking about a time in the spring and summer, before the House bill was passed or before it was significantly debated, and these were the conversations that we had, and they were almost uniformly that the existing Voting Rights Act, as such, should be extended as such.

Senator KENNEDY. General, if the Senate were to accept the House-passed bill and present it to the President of the United States, would he sign it?

Attorney General SMITH. There is no way I can answer that, Senator. As a matter of fact——

Senator KENNEDY. You cannot give us assurance that a piece of legislation given strong bipartisan support—389 Members of the House of Representatives, the handful that opposed it—of which 62 Members of the Senate of the United States have indicated their support——

Attorney General SMITH. All of that is irrelevant to my response.

Senator KENNEDY. You cannot give us assurance that if we pass that——

Attorney General SMITH. There is no way that I could, or the President could, tell you what he will do until the bill hits his desk.

Senator KENNEDY. What is your recommendation?

Attorney General SMITH. I do not have a recommendation at this point. I do not make recommendations on hypothetical situations.

Senator KENNEDY. Do you think that is a hypothetical situation—that the bill that passed so overwhelmingly in the House of Representatives might be on the President's desk?

Attorney General SMITH. It certainly is hypothetical at this point.

Senator KENNEDY. I remember when you testified before this committee that you said, "It is up to the Congress to make the decision on voting rights." Now, if we were to make the decision on voting rights——

Attorney General SMITH. Of course it is up to Congress.

Senator KENNEDY. If I could finish, if I could finish.

Mr. Chairman, if I could finish my question?

Senator HATCH. Who is stopping you?

Senator KENNEDY. Well, I was interrupted.

Attorney General SMITH. It must have been a camera.

Senator KENNEDY. I thought we were given the assurance that this was going to be an issue that was going to be decided by the Congress of the United States. I think I can find those words in your earlier testimony before this committee, when we inquired of you during the confirmation process about what the position would be.

But do I understand now that, on the basis of this hearing this morning—and I think this is important for all Americans to understand—you are not prepared to give the assurance to the American people that if we pass legislation, which now has 62 Members of the United States and has passed the House overwhelmingly, your recommendation as the Attorney General of the United States would not be to urge the President to support it?

Attorney General SMITH. I am not taking any position on that question whatever, Senator, and it is a perfectly logical, reasonable position to take, that I would not advise the President with respect to anything that has not yet been done.

I would say with respect to those 62 Senators, I certainly hope that they do listen to what goes on in these hearings and understand what the issues are that are being presented here, and will come to their conclusion after the testimony is all in, instead of before.

Senator KENNEDY. I have no other questions at this time, Mr. Chairman.

Senator HATCH. I appreciate that, Senator Kennedy.

Senator Thurmond?

Senator THURMOND. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Attorney General, in your statement you refer to the occurrence of dramatic gains and a significant qualitative change for the better in covered jurisdictions. You also point out that some political jurisdictions in the country have made insufficient progress and that continued Federal oversight of those jurisdictions is necessary.

I have three questions on this point. I might just ask them all and let you answer them. Do the exceptional conditions that were found to exist in the South in 1965 continue today? Are the conditions today the same as those in 1965? And are they widespread now?

Attorney General SMITH. The situation certainly is not the same as it was in 1965. A great deal of progress has been made, as I stated in my opening statement. Nevertheless, our experience shows that there are still sufficient reasons remaining for this act to be extended and to continue to operate as it has in the past for another number of years.

Senator THURMOND. With regard to the criteria for bailout found in S. 1992, the bill introduced by Senator Mathias, Senator Kennedy, and others, I would like your observations on several factual points. Does your Department encourage the settlement of cases brought pursuant to the Voting Rights Act?

Attorney General SMITH. Well, we always try to reach settlements, if that is possible, to avoid litigation.

Senator THURMOND. Should the law penalize parties for seeking to settle cases or consent to decrees without regard to the motivation for such settlements?

Attorney General SMITH. Usually no.

Senator THURMOND. Under the terms of the act, what is required to have Federal examiners appointed, and who appoints them?

Attorney General SMITH. The Federal examiners are appointed by the Office of Personnel Management upon a determination either by a court or by the Attorney General that there has been a reasonable showing made that this would be a desirable thing to do.

Senator THURMOND. Has the Department ever interposed an objection to a voting change and later withdrawn the objection?

Attorney General SMITH. Yes.

Senator THURMOND. Mr. Attorney General, you have offered to have your Department work with the subcommittee to devise a workable and fair bailout. We of course would appreciate your wise counsel. Would you give us your thoughts as to the concepts of a workable and fair bailout?

Attorney General SMITH. As I indicated in my opening statement, we think it is appropriate that, on a proper showing, a State or a covered jurisdiction should be able to bailout—that is, a proper showing extending over a significant number of years. We will be most happy to work with the subcommittee, as I indicated, in developing a fair and workable bailout provision.

Senator THURMOND. We would appreciate it if you would work with this subcommittee on a reasonable bailout provision.

I will defer other questions for the moment. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator HATCH. Senator Metzenbaum, did you intend to question the Attorney General, at this time?

Senator METZENBAUM. Please.

Senator HATCH. All right, that will be fine.

Senator METZENBAUM. General, I did not hear all of your testimony, but I have read through most of it, and I think the issue comes down to the matter of whether we use a results test or whether we require the proof of intent.

You were a very successful practicing attorney and a very pragmatic one therefore. As I sit here, I wonder why, putting aside the legalisms, putting aside all the legal nuances—you know and I know as former practicing lawyers that proving intent is so unbelievably difficult. If this act is to have the real effect that it should and that you claim the administration wants it to have, under those circumstances, and forgetting about the legalisms, I have difficulty in understanding why the administration is not on the side of the overwhelming majority of the House and obviously the overwhelming majority of the Senate on this issue. That is what is confounding me as I sit here—since I do not know why.

Attorney General SMITH. Senator, first of all, that is a surprising approach to intent when you consider the fact that the standard of proof under both the 14th amendment and the 15th amendment is just exactly that—intent. Some of the most dramatic advances in the civil rights area have been accomplished under the 14th amendment, with the standard of proof being intent.

Furthermore, in terms of what intent consists of, the Supreme Court and other courts have long since held that the standard of proof required for intent in civil rights areas is substantially less than in other situations. As has been pointed out, there is no need to show a smoking gun; indirect evidence is acceptable; so also is circumstantial evidence.

On top of all of that, what has been referred to as effects—the so-called Zimmer criteria—are themselves a large element in the establishment of intent.

So it seems rather strange to me at this point to say that intent has not served its purpose as a test, because it has. We are going beyond that. That is not the only question.

It seems to me that when you are talking about the change in section 2, you are talking about a good deal more than the question of intent; you are talking about what this would ultimately produce if that section is applied as its language would indicate that it should be applied, and that is ultimately proportional representation. I do not see how anybody can really subscribe to that as a test under our system of democracy.

Senator METZENBAUM. I do not think anybody does that.

Attorney General SMITH. We are talking about election results, not the right to vote, when you get into that area.

Senator METZENBAUM. You can have many other ways of proving effect rather than merely the election results. If there are no candidates for example, that is certainly a different kind of situation.

Representative Caldwell Butler of Virginia, certainly an able legal scholar, firmly opposed the House bill, but he candidly admitted that Bolden actually requires a smoking gun. In the House report Representative Butler wrote: "The intent test defined by the Court is a stringent standard which requires that a smoking gun test must be shown to successfully prove voting discrimination." He was an opponent of the bill, and he indicated that you do need the smoking gun.

With respect to the point that you make on the 14th and 15th amendments—some of the interpretation that you allude to come at an earlier point in our history and has been much changed by the Supreme Court. But again, that gets us into the legalisms.

I am asking you why an administration which has said publicly—and you very publicly, indicate strong commitment to effective civil rights legislation, civil rights support, and voting rights support—why, in view of the fact that all of the civil rights groups concerned with this legislation now are on the side of the 62 of us in the Senate and the 389 Members in the House, does the administration, under those circumstances, find it necessary to come here and really make the issue of proof that much more difficult? Because you are of course the administration, and in view of your commitment to the same end, why then does the administration not join with us and the civil rights groups who so much want to eliminate the intent requirement of the law?

Attorney General SMITH. Senator, first with respect to the smoking gun, I have a high respect for Caldwell Butler. However, the Court decisions themselves are very specific, saying that a smoking gun is not required in this case, in proving intent under circumstances such as this. I think that is very clear.

Senator HATCH. Would the Attorney General yield on that point?

Attorney General SMITH. Certainly.

Senator HATCH. I think that the Arlington Heights case makes it clear that no smoking gun is needed and that is the principal case to address this point.

Attorney General SMITH. That is right.

Senator HATCH. It says, "Determining whether invidious discriminatory purpose was a motivating factor demands a sensitive inquiry into such circumstantial and direct evidence as may be available." Among the specific considerations that it mentions are the historical background of an action, the sequence of events leading to a decision, the existence of departures from normal procedures, legislative history, the impact of a decision upon minority groups, et cetera, et cetera, et cetera.

Senator METZENBAUM. I respect what the Chair is saying, but I do want to point out that in the Bolden case the Court specifically rejected the use of circumstantial evidence, and that you have a totally different posture.

Senator HATCH. That is not true.

Attorney General SMITH. I think the law is settled in this area.

Senator METZENBAUM. If you would excuse me——

Senator HATCH. But that is not true, Senator.

Senator METZENBAUM. This Senator thinks he is a pretty good lawyer and has great respect for the Attorney General as a lawyer and for the chairman of this subcommittee, but this Senator wants his questioning to go only to the point of why, if the administration has the same goal we all share—to have an effective Voting Rights Act—why not join with all the civil rights groups, 62 Senators, 389 House Members and let's put this show on the road.

Attorney General SMITH. Senator, I am sorry you were not here earlier, but I would like to answer that question. As I have said before, I yield to no man as far as my abhorrence of discrimination is concerned. The easy thing to do here would be to do just exactly what you are proposing; that would be the easy thing to do; it would be the popular, happy thing to do. I think our function is to do more than that; it is to analyze whether this is good or bad legislation.

I want to point out, as I did earlier before you were here, that the extension nationwide of the effects test now confined to the covered States under section 5 is a very dramatic change. It not only is extended nationwide, it also, as distinguished from section 5, applies not only to changes in the election law and practices, it applies to existing situations, which means—now you can agree with this construction or not, but at least it is a reasonable construction of what the change in section 2 would do.

That is, with respect to any elected district, from school board, to water district, to county, to State—any one of those that did not mirror the racial makeup of their constituency would be subject to instant attack under section 2 as changed. You have to admit, that is a dramatic change.

What is the reason for the change? When section 5, a very intrusive measure, was passed in 1965, there was an extensive record which developed problems that needed to be corrected and extensive hearings in Congress. Those hearings produced evidence which made it very clear that extreme measures were necessary to correct that situation.

In this case, despite the fact that we have, in a very real sense, an act which is as dramatic as section 5, as I have just indicated, there has been no record whatever, that I know of, made to show that such a dramatic action has to be taken. Nobody has pointed to an evil elsewhere in the country that requires such a change as is being proposed here.

I say, in those circumstances, without any showing of an evil that needs to be corrected, with a change which is as dramatic as this one could be—proportional representation—I am sure there will be plenty here, a number of witnesses, who will say that is not what this will do, but that is certainly a reasonable construction of what it might do.

Any change that is that dramatic needs some kind of a record, some kind of evidence, or proof, or testimony, that there is an evil out there that needs that kind of remedy to correct. You know that as a lawyer; I know it as a lawyer. You do not come up with remedies to nonexistent problems.

True, I am sure, there will be cases here and there where a showing could be made, but this is a very dramatic, extensive change. And I want to read this again, because I think it is significant.

You will recall that in the House one of the options that was considered there was extending section 5 nationwide. The House considered that proposal and rejected it. Three of the five reasons they rejected that are as follows:

> Without a precise showing of need, the expansion of section 5 coverage to include all counties, States, and local jurisdictions in the country seems arbitrary and wasteful, especially at a time when there is much concern about excessive Government intrusion into State or local matters.

This is the House report on the House bill.

> Second, in the absence of a detailed showing of need, serious constitutional questions are raised about applying this uncommon exercise of congressional power to the country as a whole. The United States Supreme Court, in South Carolina v. Katzenbach and City of Rome, upheld the constitutionality of section 5 precisely because it was tailored to address a specific problem about which Congress has amassed detailed evidence in its hearing record.

And,

> Five, nationwide preclearance would raise serious administrative burdens for the Department of Justice, especially since it must process all submissions * * *

And so on, in this case, instead of the Department of Justice it would be the judiciary.

Now, as I say, the easy thing to do would be what you are suggesting. That would be the easy thing for the President to do, to get in line. We do not look upon it as being that kind of a process. We think that when we are dealing with very serious legislation of this kind, we should analyze it objectively, follow it all the way through to its ultimate conclusion, and then determine whether it is good or bad. That is why the administration is taking the position that it is taking.

Senator METZENBAUM. General, sometimes I find myself in the minority. Sometimes I question in those instances, .. it is a vast majority on the opposite side, whether my position has validity. In this instance, not one of the civil rights groups in the country is on the side of the administration. Only 6 percent of the Members of the House who voted are on the side of the administration, and I would not doubt that by the time this comes to a vote, there would not be a much higher percentage of the Members of the Senate on the side of the administration.

The Nation is facing unbelievable economic challenges. We have tremendous problems overseas. There is no more basic right to Americans than the right to vote. And we who run for public office have concluded that it would be fair not to have the intent test. I know the President also runs for public office, but under those circumstances I wonder whether the administration could not see fit to reevaluate its position and give its time to much more important issues from the standpoint of the economy but certainly not much more important issues from the standpoint of the viability of our Democratic process.

I would strongly urge you to think again, reevaluate, put aside the legalistic approach, and think of the fact that maybe in this instance the administration has erred.

Mr. Chairman, I think it would be unfair for me to take further time. If I have additional questions, I will submit them in writing.

Senator HATCH. Thank you very much, Senator Metzenbaum.

Attorney General SMITH. Senator, if I could just say, it sounds to me as though you are urging us to do this irrespective of whether it is good or bad legislation. It does not seem to me that that is the appropriate approach.

Senator METZENBAUM. No, I do not think I am saying that. I am saying that maybe, even maybe in this instance, you might——

Attorney General SMITH. Even if it is bad legislation?

Senator METZENBAUM. No. Maybe you might have erred. You know, the question of good or bad with respect to legislation is a matter of subjective judgment, and I am saying that it is entirely possible that we who are legislators, even the President, and the Attorney General of the United States could err, and if they erred, it would be a good time to change positions, particularly in view of the fact that there were so many on the opposite side of the issue in this connection.

Attorney General SMITH. I appreciate your thoughts.

Senator HATCH. You never know. Maybe we here in the Congress occasionally err, too. This prospect seems to be supported when we look at all the past legislation, some of which has brought the country on its knees.

I might suggest a further reason why you may very well have decided to analyze this thoroughly is that we do have a separation of powers doctrine, and the executive branch has an obligation to uphold the law and Constitution of this great country. The conclusion to which your analysis has ultimately brought you, may not correspond with the so-called numbers in Congress, which are, of course, subject to change as people start to understand the import of your message.

Senator Grassley?

Senator GRASSLEY. Mr. Attorney General, in regard to bailout, when do you think a State should be allowed to bail out? Should it be when all the political subdivisions have postured themselves so that they can qualify for bailout, or should it be any time before that?

Attorney General SMITH. At this point, Senator Grassley, we have expressed a desire and willingness to work with this subcommittee developing an appropriate bailout provision. It is a very complicated subject. Each of the provisions is related to the others. I do not think it would be particularly helpful for me at this point to try to take a position on any particular aspect of it.

Senator HATCH. Can the administration help us with that though? If there is going to be a bailout provision, it has to be fair, and it has to be right. It would be very helpful if we could have some assistance from the administration.

Attorney General SMITH. Yes.

Senator GRASSLEY. You have really two issues on the bailout, as I see it: One, whether States can bail out, regardless of whether all of their political subdivisions have or not; and, two, under what basis can States and/or political subdivisions bail out, and what conditions must be met to satisfy that bailout? So you are speaking in regard to both points; the administration does not have at this point any recommendations for us?

Attorney General SMITH. No, but as I said, we would certainly be glad to work with the subcommittee.

Senator GRASSLEY. OK. I had better state my position, that I feel as Senator Hatch does on that point as well.

I know that you have used most of your time, and the questions have dealt with, the intent provisions of the legislation. My intent is not to put you in the same position as in your response to Senator Kennedy, in which you feel you cannot state a position on recommending to the President now on hypothetical questions, but you have expressed so much opposition to the intent provisions. You still have not said the extent to which, if the House intent provisions were in there, that would be weighty on the subject of a veto or on the point of approval.

Let me ask it this way: Is the administration opposed to the effects provisions of the law, as they are in the House bill? You said all but that.

Attorney General SMITH. As I stated in my testimony, we think that the change from intents to effects is not a desirable change.

Senator GRASSLEY. Can you say that that would be a reason for the President to veto a bailout?

Attorney General SMITH. I could not comment on that.

Senator GRASSLEY. OK.

Attorney General SMITH. There is no way for the President to take a position until the bill is actually on his desk.

Senator GRASSLEY. OK. Then I would only ask you as a lawyer, in your consideration of this whole issue, whether or not you know of any standard that lies somewhere between an intent and effects test?

Attorney General SMITH. One thing I guess should be pointed out is the fact that the effects make up a good deal of what constitutes intent—the various elements that go into establishing or proving intent. Certainly, effects is one of those elements and a very significant element.

The intents test, as we discussed here a little while ago, is, in the civil rights area, less of a test than it is in other areas. Of course, we have intent throughout our criminal law and a host of other areas. In the area of civil rights, intent can be established by circumstantial evidence, indirect evidence—something less than the so-called smoking gun.

Senator GRASSLEY. Last, the provisions of the language portions of the existing legislation—you have no recommendations for change in those provisions of the existing law, except for the extension of the period of time?

Attorney General SMITH. The administration's position is in favor of the straight extension of the act as it is now for 10 years, with the proviso with respect to bailout.

Senator GRASSLEY. Thank you.

Senator HATCH. Senator Mathias?

Senator MATHIAS. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

General, let me join with the other members of the committee in welcoming you here today. I am happy to have your advice and counsel.

I think it is worth the kind of attention that you have obviously given it, and although there has been some reference to political rhetoric here this morning, I hope I will not be accused of being partisan if I point out that this is a bill that has been closely associated with Republican Members of the Congress. It is a bipartisan bill of course, but there is a Republican imprimatur on it, and my thoughts particularly go to a very great Member of the Congress, the late William McCulloch of Ohio, who was the ranking minority member of the House Judiciary Committee for many years.

Representative McCulloch was particularly the champion of the voting rights bill. He made it a cause in which he devoted himself with a great deal of passion. I recall in the original enactment, when I was serving with him on the House Judiciary Committee in 1965 and some of the subsequent extension of the act, Representative McCulloch was a champion and one who was particularly successful in embodying the principles that he believed in this particular legislation.

I was glad that you raised the question of legislative history, because I think that is a form of guidance. My own recollections are now some 17 years old, and we can sometimes stray in our memories as to what did occur 17 years ago. But the legislative record is important.

Sitting in your chair at that time was Nicholas Katzenbach. The committee worked very closely with Attorney General Katzenbach, as I am confident we will work closely with you in this procedure.

As a part of the legislative history, there was a question asked. Actually, it was in this committee on the Senate side. The question was asked by Hiram Fong, our much beloved colleague from Hawaii.

In responding to Senator Fong, Attorney General Katzenbach said, "I had thought of the word 'procedure' as including any kind of practice of that kind if its purpose or effect was to deny or abridge the right to vote on account of race or color." That would comport with my own memory, however faulty that may be, that we were dealing with effect. I wondered if your research had given you any opportunity to comment on that.

Attorney General SMITH. Senator Mathias, there is no question about the fact that the legislative history dealt a great deal with purpose and effect at that time, because that was the change that was being instituted through section 5. Section 5 does now have an effects test; there is no question about that.

I have not personally reviewed the legislative history myself, but I am sure that there is a great deal that would deal with the question of effect as it applied to section 5, because that at that time was a rather dramatic change. That is quite a different thing from effects as far as section 2 is concerned. Section 2 is just a completely different section and a different approach.

Congress at that time, according to Senator Dirksen, intended that section 2 would really be a paraphrase of the 15th amendment. Of course the 15th amendment, as with the 14th amendment, has always had an intents test. I might say that Justice Stewart, in the Mobile case, analyzed this history really quite well.

Senator METZENBAUM. Would the Senator from Maryland yield for 1 minute?

Senator MATHIAS. I would be happy to, but——

Senator METZENBAUM. I will not ask any questions or anything.

Senator MATHIAS. Certainly.

Senator METZENBAUM. In the interests of time—and I am concerned about moving this matter forward—the Senator from Ohio will not make an oral statement but asks the chairman to put his statement in the record Senator HATCH. We will be happy to put it in the record immediately following the statement of Senator Kennedy.

Senator METZENBAUM. Certainly. I do not wish to interrupt the Attorney General. I thank the Senator from Maryland, and I thank the Attorney General.

Senator MATHIAS. I believe, with deference to the Attorney General's research on this subject, that Hiram Fong's question did refer specifically to section 2.

Attorney General SMITH. I could not comment on that without seeing it.

Senator MATHIAS. The then-Attorney General's answer referred specifically to section 2.

Attorney General SMITH. If that were the case—as I say, Senator, I cannot comment on it without having seen it—it would be a rather dramatic result if anybody intended at that time to include an intents test in section 2 and did not do so. All you have to do is read the statute to see that when Congress intended to put an effects test in, they did so, and they did so in section 5, but they did not do so in section 2.

It is really not even necessary to look at the legislative history in a very real sense, because it is clear that when Congress wanted an effects test, it said so, and it did so in section 5. In those days it would not have been a matter of sloppy draftsmanship.

Senator MATHIAS. Not with Bill McCulloch around, it would not be sloppy draftsmanship.

Attorney General SMITH. So if somebody has some evidence that section 2 ever intended to use the effects test, it is something that escapes me, except, as I say, for one or two cases that may have come to that conclusion—lower court cases.

Senator MATHIAS. I think the Supreme Court was aware of Attorney General Katzenbach's views. In the Allen case, in reference to section 2, they quoted Attorney General Katzenbach, with apparent approval.

Attorney General SMITH. I believe that was a section 5 case.

Senator MATHIAS. Of course you are right about that; it was a section 5 case; but as we all know, the Court, like Members of the Senate and perhaps even Members of the Cabinet, strayed a little from the strict purview of the case to comment on section 2, and that was the point at which the Court referred to the Katzenbach opinion. I was interested in your comments on the Mobile case.

Attorney General SMITH. I have been calling it the Mobile case too. I think it is the Mobile case.

Senator MATHIAS. Mobile.

Senator HATCH. I think Mobile gets accused of enough things. [Laughter.]

Senator MATHIAS. If we call it the Bolden case, then we avoid that.

You said—and I would agree with you—that the law has worked well. I personally think it is the most important of that great series of steps that the Nation took in enacting civil rights legislation. You say that the Supreme Court did not change the law, and I am not going to debate that question with you. The Court, except in its reference to section 2 in the Allen case, really had not said very much about it, had it?

Attorney General SMITH. About section 2?

Senator MATHIAS. Yes.

Attorney General SMITH. There have not been many cases under section 2. As a matter of fact, the Mobile case is of course the first one that reached the Supreme Court. You can always make an argument to the contrary—we lawyers always can—but I think it is very clear to say that the Mobile case really did not change the law. The law had, in essence, been that way and would have been that way, just through a reading of the statute itself.

The idea of changing Mobile back—there is a question as to what do you change it back to. There has always been an intents test under section 2, as I say, starting with the language of the statute itself.

I might also say this: I want to emphasize, too, Senator, that we subscribe to your views with respect to the importance of the Voting Rights Act. It is a little difficult to be able to express an opinion on the merits of this particular change without having somehow, particularly in a political arena, this being converted into opposition to the Voting Rights Act itself, which it clearly is not.

Senator MATHIAS. I hold no such view. I think the President made it clear just as recently as last night that he was for an extension of the act.

Senator HATCH. Senator Mathias, would you yield on the point you are making here? I think what you were talking about relates back to those days when they originally debated this matter. When they talked about purpose and effect, they were talking about effect in the context of the Gomillion case, in which there was a gerrymander that managed to eliminate 99 percent of the minority citizens from a municipality. That was the effect of discrimination that Mr. Katzenbach was talking about. There was a clear inference of purpose during that debate. Intent was used solely to describe voting statutes and such that were discriminatory on their face. In other words, both intent and effect were used in the 1965 debate to refer to what we presently think of as intent.

I think you are right, Mr. Attorney General, that when they were talking about effects basically, it was in that context and also in the context of section 5. Nobody, but nobody, in my opinion, has made a good case that under the 14th and 15th amendments we should change the purpose or intents standard that has always applied to that amendment. The best case made, for preserving present law to date, has been made in Mobile v. Bolden.

Attorney General SMITH. Nobody has yet made a persuasive case, I do not think, that there was anything other than the intents test under section 2 from the time it was passed. Mobile merely confirmed that; it did not change anything.

Senator MATHIAS. Let me come back to that, if I may. When the chairman says "what they were saying in those days," I find it a little bit difficult to cope with the fact that what he really means is "what we were saying in those days."

I had been a city attorney, and as a city attorney I had to cope with some of these civil rights questions. Any city attorney worth his salt is not going to allow his mayor or his board of aldermen to be caught with a visible intent to discriminate. So you have to deal with results. That is what leads me to the conclusion that I have reached in connection with this legislation. I have been there.

Attorney General SMITH. Senator, actually, as I said before, effects, in a good many cases, makes up a large part of intent, not all of it. The Supreme Court, again in Mobile, made that very clear, that proving intent does not require going into somebody's mind in this area. In this area it can be established through indirect testimony—circumstantial evidence.

Senator MATHIAS. But much more difficult. I do not see this as a punitive kind of statute. It seems to me this is a remedial statute. It merely tries to identify a condition, which the American people find unacceptable, and to remedy that condition.

Attorney General SMITH. But Senator, once again—I do not think you were here when I was discussing this with Senator Metzenbaum—you have to look much beyond intent and effect to see what ultimately this change would do. It can be argued either way. You can say that it ultimately has to end up in proportional representation, or you can say it is something less than that. In any case, that is certainly a reasonable conclusion.

That means that this statute is now spread across the entire United States, and yet there has not been any showing at all that there is an evil out there needed to be corrected in those uncovered States which would warrant this kind of an extreme measure. You can call it extreme; I should not call it extreme, certainly extensive, certainly dramatic in a sense, if you do look upon this as a possible approval of political quotas or mirroring of the racial makeup of a constituency or as proportional representation. That is a pretty dramatic thing if that is even a possible interpretation of this statute.

Senator MATHIAS. It is not certainly an interpretation with me. In my own experience, I carried the city of Baltimore in the last election, a city which is predominantly a black city. I carried the black precincts of that city, so you know that could not be my motivation.

Attorney General SMITH. If this is not the ultimate result, what is the ultimate result? What is the purpose of having an effects test if it is not ultimately going to do that? If you have an effects test, certainly a reasonable construction of this statute as it is now worded is that if an elected entity—school board or whatever—does not reflect or mirror the racial makeup of that constituency, it is in violation of this statute? If it does not do that, what does it do?

Senator MATHIAS. It seems to me you look at the results of some municipal action, State action, or whatever unit you are dealing with and see how it excludes citizens from the electoral process, not how the citizens act within that process.

Attorney General SMITH. We are not talking about the covered States, we are talking about the uncovered States. What is the evil out there that this amendment is trying to correct? Where has the case been made that this kind of a change is necessary nationwide in order to correct? Covered States, obviously—hence the President's position. Where has the case been made that this kind of a change in the statute is needed nationwide? We have not seen it.

Senator MATHIAS. I think that, of course, is one of the very subjects that we are here to discuss. The case was made in the extended hearings before the House committee——

Attorney General SMITH. Not on the uncovered section.

Senator MATHIAS. The case I am sure will be made here.

One of the instructive documents on this very subject is the brief filed in the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit in the case of Lodge v. Buxton on appeal from the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of Georgia.

In the brief filed by the Department of Justice there is a long reference to the colloquy between Senator Fong and Attorney General Katzenbach. They quote Attorney General Katzenbach as I just have, but the brief goes on to say that:

> Attorney General Katzenbach's testimony on other provisions of the act shows that his use of the purpose or effects standard to describe the prohibition was not a casual, unconsidered response to a question directed toward the issue of coverage. In a response to inquiries at the hearings before the Senate and the House, Attorney General Katzenbach stated time and again that the purpose or effect standard of proof imposed by sections 4 and 5 merely shifted the burden to the covered jurisdictions to show that their past practices or proposed changes did not violate the 15th amendment * * *

And so forth. But it is an interesting discussion of this very point.

Attorney General SMITH. Section 5.

Senator HATCH. Mr. Attorney General and Senator Mathias, would you both yield to me for a second?

You know, the Buxton case is a perfect illustration why you do not need the effects test. If it is so difficult to prove intent, then I would like to ask my distinguished colleague from Maryland why two major voting rights cases—the Escambia County and the Lodge v. Buxton cases have been decided since the Mobile case, both of which have found adequate evidence to satisfy the intents standard as defined by Mobile? In both cases a violation was established under presently existing law. It is obviously not difficult to prove intent. It certainly is not an impossible standard by any stretch of the imagination.

I might also add that Mr. Katzenbach, when being questioned by Senator Kennedy, said, "If I could have the attention of the Senator from North Carolina"—he was referring to Senator Ervin at the time—"that observation is not correct, because you have to go back to the all-inclusive section in this bill, which is section 2. It says that no voting qualification or procedure shall be imposed or applied to deny or abridge the right to vote on account of race or color. That is a restatement, in effect, of the 15th amendment."

Completely apart from the fact that the Voting Rights Act has been an effective tool for combating voter discrimination under the present standard, it seems to me that it is debatable whether or not an appropriate standard would be fashioned on the basis of what facilitates successful prosecutions. My gosh, that certainly is not our system of jurisprudence in this country. Elimination of the "beyond a reasonable doubt" standard in criminal cases, for example, would certainly facilitate convictions, but it would fly in the face of everything that we have ever believed in as far as constitutional criminal law is concerned.

My position is that we have chosen not to do away with the "beyond a reasonable doubt" standard in criminal cases because there are competing values. If I understand you correctly, Mr. Attorney General, you are saying that there are competing values, that the 15th amendment requires an intents standard—Mobile as well as other cases, has established that—and we can prove these cases by using an intents standard.

When we talk about criminal cases, the Government has the burden of proving intent beyond a reasonable doubt. This is true in every State and for the Federal Government. In civil cases intent is proven by a preponderance of the evidence.

Under the present law, prior to the House bill, you could prove intent by a mere preponderance of the evidence, not by the criminal case standard of "beyond a reasonable doubt". The proof of intent would involve the examination by the court of direct or indirect evidence, circumstantial evidence, or otherwise, including evidence of effects or disparate impact.

Do you disagree with that analysis?

Attorney General SMITH. No, I think that generally states it.

Senator HATCH. The Lodge case, as well as the Escambia County case, is a perfect illustration of why we shouldn't be altering the 15th amendment standard in section 2.

Senator MATHIAS. You will have prevailing, overwhelming reason by the time we get to February 25.

Senator HATCH. We will have to have.

Senator MATHIAS. General, I think we could go on for a long time. I find this a very instructive colloquy. But we do have a lot of witnesses who are waiting, so I will hold at this point.

Senator HATCH. Senator Specter?

Senator SPECTER. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Attorney General, there is room for wide-ranging debate when you talk about legislative history or whether the Mobile case changed or did not change the prior law, and what the smoking gun theory really requires, but I was very interested in your comments about the language of the amendment itself.

My question is, What in the language of the amendment, which might be worthwhile reading—the 15th amendment provides, "The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude." What in that language is dispositive or requires intent or motivation, as you read it?

Attorney General SMITH. As a matter of fact, I do not think it is how I read it; it is how the courts have read it. The courts have long since determined that an intents test is necessary under not only the 15th amendment but the 14th as well.

Of course, as I have said before, the fact that there is an intents test there is significant in view of the fact that it is under the 14th amendment that so many advances have been made in the civil rights area.

Senator SPECTER. The question of interpretation is one which can go either way. I thought you had testified that the language itself of the 15th amendment carried with it an intent test on its face.

Attorney General SMITH. No, I do not believe that is what I was talking about.

Senator SPECTER. You were referring only to the issue of the interpretation of the 15th amendment?

Attorney General SMITH. You may be referring to what I said about section 2 versus section 5.

Senator SPECTER. I am about to come to that, but I thought you had said that as well, as to the 15th amendment itself.

Attorney General SMITH. I do not recall referring to the specific language.

Senator SPECTER. All right. With respect to the two sections, section 2 and section 5, is there anything in the language itself of section 2 that requires an intent test as opposed to the language of section 5, which does refer to an effects test?

You have referred to section 5, but section 5 in the operative language has both the language of purpose and the language of effect. It says, in referring to the declaratory judgment in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia, that "such qualification, prerequisite, standard, practice, or procedure does not have the purpose and will not have the effect of denying or abridging the right to vote," et cetera. So that in section 5 it is not really simply an effect test; it talks about motivation and effect.

Attorney General SMITH. Right.

Senator SPECTER. So the language of effect in section 5, in addition to the language of motivation, really does not say anything at all, does it, about whether section 2 would or would not have had language of effect?

Attorney General SMITH. I am not sure I understand that question.

Senator SPECTER. My point is that the language of section 5 does not have merely the language of effect; it has the language of motivation, as well.

Senator HATCH. Would the Senator yield?

Senator SPECTER. Wait just a minute.

Senator HATCH. Yes; but he does not know the language to which you are referring.

Senator SPECTER. Excuse me?

Senator HATCH. Why do you not quote the language to the Attorney General; it says "purpose or effect," whatever that means.

Senator SPECTER. I just did quote the language.

Senator HATCH. Oh, I see.

Senator SPECTER. But I would be glad to quote it again.

Senator HATCH. Would you quote the actual language to the Attorney General?

Senator SPECTER. The language which I just read says, in a long provision, "may institute an action in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia for a declaratory judgment that such qualification, prerequisite, standard, practice, or procedure does not have the purpose and will not have the effect of denying or abridging the right to vote on account of race, color, or in contravention of the guarantees set forth in section 4(f)(2)."

My question is this: Section 5 does not have simply language of effect, which would distinguish it from section 2, which does not have any language at all. So what is there, if anything, in section 2, on its face, which suggests that section 2 looks to an intent test?

Attorney General SMITH. For one thing, the Supreme Court has said it does. For another, it was quite clear, I think, when section 2 was being debated here that it was intended to be a paraphrase of the 15th amendment. The 15th amendment has long been held to require an intent test. I do not think that is the significant aspect, however. The significant aspect of section 2 is that it does not have an effects test.

Senator SPECTER. I quite agree with the conclusion of the Mobile case, and the issue of legislative history is very complex and can go either way on the arguments, as may the smoking gun issue. I was just really probing to see if you had meant that there was something on the face of the language itself which would be dispositive of this issue.

Attorney General SMITH. Only in that section 2 itself does not have an effects test; section 5 does, which certainly demonstrates that at the time this act was considered, Congress well knew the difference between the two and chose to put effects in one section and not in the other.

Senator SPECTER. In section 5, which has language of effect, it also has language of motivation.

Attorney General SMITH. That is right.

Senator SPECTER. One other consideration, Mr. Attorney General—the Senate is wrestling this year with two issues which have some substantial similarities, the Agents Identity Act and the act which we are talking about today. In the Intelligence Identities Protection Act, the debate has raged over whether there should be specific intent shown to establish a basis for conviction of violation of someone who discloses the identity of a CIA agent, for example, or whether reason to know or the so-called negligence standard would be sufficient.

The tradition of the criminal law has been that, in seeking to convict somebody for a crime and impose those sanctions, intent has customarily been required before we imposed that kind of a sanction.

On the civil side, it is not required customarily—intent. On the civil side, it usually turns on the effect on the allegedly wronged party—what the consequence is or what the deprivation is or, to use the word, what the effect is on the injured party.

The administration has taken the position, as I know you have personally, that when it comes to the Intelligence Identities Protection Act, you are not looking for the standard of intent. And that is a criminal case which, as I say, has traditionally required specific intent for conviction. On the act which we are discussing today, your position has been that there ought to be evidence of intent in order to trigger the requirements of the act. I am just wondering if there is not some inconsistency in the approach in these two positions.

Attorney General SMITH. No; I do not think there is any inconsistency at all, because various standards have been used in various statutes; for example, the "reason to believe" in the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act. There are varying standards that have been used throughout our whole legislative scheme, depending upon the particular circumstances, the particular problem that is intended to be met, and so on.

My position here with respect to intent is not necessarily that that is the standard that should be applied. I am saying that that is the standard that has been applied in the past. The Mobile case confirmed that. The Voting Rights Act has been a highly successful act. Without a showing of some need for a change outside of the covered States, which showing has not yet been made so far as I know, I can see no reason to change the standard from what it has been up to now, particularly when to change it could cause very extensive changes in our State and local governmental systems, and when no case has been made to show that such a problem exists or should be corrected in this fashion.

Once again, we have a highly successful statute, and it seems to me that anybody who wants to change it should have a pretty good reason for doing so. We have not seen that reason.

Senator SPECTER. Thank you very much, Mr. Attorney General. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator GRASSLEY [acting chairman]. Our next witness is Senator Mathias.

Senator HATCH. Mr. Attorney General, thank you so much for appearing. We appreciate your testimony, and we appreciate the lengthy time that we have taken away from your busy day. This is an important issue, and we appreciate your according it the attention it deserves.

U.S. Department of Justice

Civil Rights Division

Office of the Assistant Attorney General

Washington, D.C. 20530

January 8, 1982

Honorable Orrin G. Hatch
Chairman, Subcommittee on the Constitution
Committee on the Judiciary
United States Senate
Washington, D.C. 20510

Dear Mr. Chairman:

This is in response to your letter of December 2, 1981, requesting information on enforcement of the Voting Rights Act and an analysis of certain provisions of H.R. 3112, the House-passed bill to amend the Act. Set out below are our answers to your requests for factual information. Our responses to the other questions will be sent to you in the near future.

> 1-3. These items request "[a]ll written regulations and guidelines" regarding "effects," "intent," and "denial or abridgement."

The Department has not issued any guidelines or regulations regarding the above matters. The only guidelines that we have issued under the Voting Rights Act relate to implementation of Section 5 1/ and the bilingual-election requirements of Section Section 203(c). 2/ See Attachments A and B to this letter.

> 4. Describe in full the mechanics of considering a Section 5 application: To whom is it first referred? Under what circumstances is it reviewed by the Chief of the Voting Section? the Assistant Attorney General? the Attorney General?

The Voting Section is the entity within the Civil Rights Division which reviews Section 5 submissions. There follows a description of our current practice.

2/ 28 C.F.R. Part 55.

The Section 5 Unit of the Voting Section is headed by a lawyer (the Director) who supervises the Associate Director and 13 Equal Opportunity Specialists. When a Section 5 submission is received, it is placed on a computerized docketing system and assigned to an Equal Opportunity Specialist. The guidelines for Section 5 submissions indicate the type of information that should be included for various types of voting changes. If a submission is incomplete, the Department writes the jurisdiction and requests more information.

The specialist reviews the information that has been sent and usually contacts members of the local community, including minority groups, to obtain facts that might indicate whether the change is potentially discriminatory. This information is summarized in a memorandum which recommends whether an objection should be entered. If the initial recommendation on a simple, noncontroversial submission is no objection and if, after a review of the memorandum and the underlying information, the Director of the Section 5 Unit agrees, the Voting Section sends a no-objection letter to the jurisdiction. Where no objection is proposed to a change that is complex, controversial or otherwise non-routine, a no-objection response is sent only after review by or consultation with the Section Chief. After a no-objection letter is sent, the jurisdiction is then free to implement the proposed change, with the caveat, provided by the statute, that a failure to object does not bar subsequent judicial action to enjoin enforcement of the change.

If it appears to the Equal Opportunity Specialist that an objection may be warranted, the specialist consults the Director of the Section 5 Unit. If an objection would be appropriate, the specialist prepares a memorandum of decision setting forth the factual basis for the objection, to which the Director adds a legal analysis, and a proposed objection letter is drafted. These documents are reviewed by the Chief of the Voting Section who notes his concurrence or disagreement thereon and forwards them to a Deputy Assistant Attorney General and finally the Assistant Attorney General of the Civil Rights Division, the official to whom the Attorney General's authority for Section 5 enforcement has been delegated. If the Assistant Attorney General concurs with the recommendation to object to the change, he sends the jurisdiction an objection letter detailing the factual and legal basis for the decision and, whenever feasible, indicating possible changes in the proposed voting practice which might alleviate its discriminatory potential. 3/

3/ If the jurisdiction decides to alter its proposed voting change to remove the basis for an objection, it can submit a modified proposal which, being a new change, is then treated as a new submission.

If the Director is uncertain whether an objection is warranted, or if a particular change deserves special attention, the Chief of the Voting Section and, at his discretion, the Assistant Attorney General will review the facts and the law regarding the change. At the discretion of the Assistant Attorney General, questions regarding particular submissions may be raised with the Deputy Attorney General or the Attorney General.

A jurisdiction that receives an objection has the option of filing a declaratory judgment action in the District Court for the District of Columbia, which will hear the matter de novo. Another possible course, if the jurisdiction has further information which it believes substantiates its claim that the proposed change is nondiscriminatory, is for the jurisdiction to ask this Department to reconsider the objection. The jurisdiction can submit this new information by mail or at a conference with Department officials. If the additional information indicates that the proposed change does not have a discriminatory purpose or effect, or if the applicable legal principles have changed since the objection letter was issued, the objection is withdrawn.

The Department has 60 days from the date of receipt of a Section 5 submission to respond to the submission. The response can be that the Department objects to the change, has no objection, will not review the submission (because it is premature, insufficient, or not subject to Section 5), or needs more information before a determination can be made. Our policy is to respond to all submissions within the 60-day period. However, if the Department does not issue any response within the 60-day period, this operates as a "no-objection" response, and the jurisdiction is free to implement the change.

If the Department asks for more information with respect to the initial submission, the 60-day period will not begin to run until the jurisdiction submits the additional information that is necessary to making a determination. 4/ There is no statutory requirement that the covered jurisdiction submit the additional information within any specified period of time. However, a protracted failure to submit this information can be considered a failure by the jurisdiction to satisfy its burden of proof and may serve as the basis for an objection. If the jurisdiction responds by providing some information, but fails to provide enough information before the 60-day period expires to show that the change will not have a discriminatory purpose or effect, this, too, can serve as the basis for an objection.

4/ The Department may make only one such request with the effect of postponing the running of the 60-day period.

5. A discussion of our policy regarding annexations will be supplied in our second reply.

6. A discussion of our policy concerning reapportionment will be provided in our second reply.

7. List all reapportionments pursuant to the 1980 census to which the Department has objected. Describe in detail the basis for such objections with reference to the regulations, guidelines, statutory provisions, and Supreme Court decisions cited above.

The Department has objected to eight reapportionments based on the 1980 Census, involving submissions by jurisdictions in five states. See Attachment C-1. The basis for these objections is stated in the respective objection letters, copies of which are attached (Attachment C-2).

8. The Department's policy concerning institution of voting suits will be discussed in our second reply.

9. List all suits to protect voting rights initiated by the Department since 1975. Describe in detail in each case how the criteria described above were applied.

Since January 1, 1975, we have initiated 52 suits to protect voting rights. Fourteen of these suits alleged unlawful dilution. Thirty involved Section 5 enforcement (either to obtain compliance with an objection or to enjoin enforcement of a change until it is precleared). The remaining suits related to other issues. See Attachment D, for a chronological list of the suits. The criteria for lawsuits will be discussed in our second reply.

10. List all suits for bailout filed under the Act since 1965. Describe the criteria used by the Department in determining whether to consent to bailout. Describe how the Department's actions in each case complied with those criteria.

Sixteen Section 4(a) bailout suits have been brought since 1965. Nine of these resulted in bailout from the special provisions of the Voting Rights Act, all with the consent of the Attorney General (in one case, the suit was later reopened and the jurisdiction recovered). See Attachment E. There have been, over the same period of time, four Section 203(c) bailout suits, one of which resulted in partial bailout. See Attachment F. Criteria for Department action will be discussed in our second reply.

11. Has the Department ever objected to a Section 5 submission because of a finding of discrimination against white voters? If so, describe each such case in detail.

To date, none of the Department's objections to a Section 5 submission has been based on a finding of discrimination against white voters.

12. List all States and political subdivisions to which the Department has assigned federal examiners during the last ten years. Describe in detail the criteria, including written regulations and guidelines, used by the Department in determining whether to assign such examiners.

Section 6 of the Voting Rights Act authorizes the Attorney General to send into covered jurisdictions federal examiners who determine the voting qualifications of prospective voters. For this purpose, examiners have been used in three counties since January 1, 1972, all in Mississippi. See Attachment G.

Examiners are also used to receive complaints during elections where federal observers are present. The use of observers since 1972, by state, is shown in Attachment H.

We will provide criteria for the assignment of federal examiners in our second reply.

13-17. In our second reply, we will respond to the questions concerning operation of the bailout standards of H.R. 3112, Departmental policy regarding settlements, interpretation of certain language contained in H.R. 3112, resource requirements for bailout suits, and venue for bailout litigation. In partial response to Question 13, the jurisdictions covered by Section 4(b) of the Act are listed in the appendix to the Section 5 guidelines, Attachment A. (In addition, two counties--Escambia County, Florida, and Thurston County, Nebraska--are covered by the preclearance provisions of Section 3(c) of the Act, as the result of court orders.)

I hope that this initial response will be useful to you.

Sincerely,

Wm. Bradford Reynolds
Assistant Attorney General
Civil Rights Division

28 CFR Part 51

Procedures for the Administration of Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act of 1965; Revision of Procedures AGENCY: Department of Justice.

ACTION: Final rule.

SUMMARY: Procedures with respect to the administration of Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act of 1965, as amended, the "preclearance" requirement of the Voting Rights Act, were established in 1971. 36 FR 18186 (Sept. 10, 1971), 28 CFR Part 51. As a result of experience under these Procedures, changes mandated by the 1975 Amendments to the Voting Rights Act, and interpretations of Section 5 contained in judicial decisions, it was decided that revisions were required. Proposed revised Procedures were published for comments on March 21, 1980 (45 FR 18880).

EFFECTIVE DATE: January 5, 1981.

FOR FURTHER INFORMATION CONTACT: David H. Hunter, Attorney, Voting Section, Civil Rights Division, Department of Justice, Washington, D.C. 20530, (202) 724-7189.

SUPPLEMENTARY INFORMATION: In response to the March 21, 1980 request, 22 comments were received, including 1 from a Federal agency, 7 from representatives of State governments, 6 from representatives of local governments, 6 from private organizations, 1 from a political science professor, and 1 from a private citizen. (These comments are available for inspection at the Department of Justice.) All comments have been studied carefully, and a number of changes have been made in the Procedures as a result of the comments.

The discussion that follows focuses first on a number of general issues raised by the comments and second on a number of specific topics that were the subject of comments.

Scope. A number of commenters were concerned with issues outside the scope of the Procedures, for example, procedures and substantive standards required by statute, the legal consequences of the absence of preclearance, the Department's litigation policy, the Department's policy under the Freedom of Information Act (for which see 28 CFR 16.9), and the interests of particular jurisdictions.

Formality. To satisfy some commenters would require an increase in the formality of the preclearance process. They advocate, for example, requiring a limitation on telephone communication between Department personnel and submitting authorities, the inclusion of interested individuals and groups in any informal meetings held with submitting authorities, the preparation of transcripts of conferences held under § 51.46, adherence to the rules of evidence in the information gathering process, and increased notice requirements. Because submission of changes to the Attorney General was designed to be an expeditious alternative to declaratory judgement actions brought in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia, we believe the level of formality suggested is not appropriate.

Exercise of discretion. Some commenters sought assurance that the Attorney General would not abuse his discretion. Concern was expressed, for example, with respect to what would constitute "good cause" justifying expedited consideration by the Attorney General (§ 51.32) or with respect to the possibility of the Attorney General's using an unjustified request for additional information (under § 51.35) to extend the 60-day period. Although written procedures can establish standards, they cannot by themselves guarantee reasonableness. To some extent, however, safeguards or alternatives do exist. For instance submitting authorities always have the option of an action for a declaratory judgment (§ 51.1). On the other hand, interested individuals and groups are given the opportunity to participate in the preclearance process by the various notice requirements provided (see "Role of third parties" below) and, although a decision by the Attorney General not to object is not subject to judicial review (§ 51.48), independent actions otherwise available are preserved by the statute.

Misinterpretation. Misinterpretation of the intent of the proposed Procedures may be evidence of a lack of clarity. Where a commenter has failed to discern the intended meaning, we have given close scrutiny to whether that meaning could be more effectively communicated.

Some commenters misinterpreted the Procedures by reading one section in isolation from the remainder or by overlooking the section that addressed a particular issue. For example, one commenter believed that the Attorney General would not consider a change that must be adopted by referendum until after the referendum is held; this commenter failed to note that § 51.20 excepts from the finality requirement measures subject to a referendum requirement.

Role of third parties. Providing an opportunity for interested persons to express their views with respect to a submitted change is an important part of our preclearance procedures. A number of sections have been revised to indicate more clearly the practice of the Attorney General in this regard (see §§ 51.31, 51.35, 51.43, 51.44, 51.45, and 51.47). To summarize, the submitting authority is requested to provide names of minority contacts (§ 51.28(f)) and evidence of publicity and public participation (51.28(e)) and may be requested to publicize a reconsideration request (§ 51.44(c)), and the Attorney General may publicize a submission in some circumstances (§ 51.30(b)). Persons who have commented on a submission or who have requested notification with respect to action taken on a specific submission are sent copies of letters requesting further information (§ 51.35(b)), letters of no objection (§ 51.40(c)), letters of objection (§ 51.43(d)), and letters following reconsiderations of objections (§ 51.47(d)). Such persons are also notified of reconsideration requests (§ 51.44(c)), reconsiderations at the instance of the Attorney General (§ 51.45(b)), and requests for conferences (§ 51.46(c)). Interested individuals and groups registered under § 51.30 are given notice of submissions (§ 51.31), requests for expedited consideration (§ 51.32(c)), additional information requests and receipts of additional information (§ 51.35(d)), objections (§ 51.43(e)), reconsiderations of objections (§§ 51.44(c) and 51.45(b)), and decisions after reconsideration (§ 51.47(e)). The 1971 Procedures had specified that "prompt" notice of submissions be given to registrants (§ 51.16); this was changed in the proposed Procedures (§ 51.31) to "regular" notice. In response to one comment, "weekly" notice, which has been the normal practice, is now specified.

One commenter objected to the maintenance of a registry of interested individuals and groups. Other commenters believe that the present notice system is inadequate. We believe the notice system as revised and described in the Procedures is both necessary and sufficient for the efficient and fair administration of the preclearance program.

Delegation of authority, §§ 51.2(b), 51.3. Two commenters, both representing States, expressed reservations with respect to the delegation of authority from the Attorney General to the Assistant Attorney General, Civil Rights Division, and opposed any delegation below the level of the Assistant Attorney General. As a practical matter, given the volume of Section 5 submissions, such delegation is unavoidable. It should be noted, however, that the Assistant Attorney General is the final decisionmaker when a determination adverse to a submitting authority is made.

Political parties, § 51.7. In response to one query, this section and § 51.21 have been revised to make it clear that a political party can make a submission on its own behalf.

Further clarification of what changes by political parties are subject to Section 5 has not been attempted. § 51.7 delineates in a general way which "political party" changes are covered; where there is uncertainty with respect to the applicability of Section 5, determinations should be made on a case-by-case basis.

Computation of time, § 51.8. Two commenters questioned the clarity and propriety of the method of determining when 60 days have elapsed. The method employed is identical to that of Rule 6(a) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure.

It was suggested that the 60-day period commence with the date of mailing of the submission rather than the date of receipt by the Attorney General, and that the date of the Attorney General's response be the date of receipt by the submitting authority rather than the date of mailing by the Attorney General. Section 5, however, provides for a 60-day period for review by the Attorney General, and it is proper for the Procedures to allow a full 60 days for review by the Attorney General. This would not be the case if delivery time for the submission and delivery time for the decision were counted in the 60-day period. In our view, the full period is necessary for proper administration. See also § 51.32.

Examples of changes, § 51.12. One commenter objected to including, as an example of a change cover by Section 5, a change with respect to vote-counting procedures. Such changes, however, are covered by Section 5. See Allen v. State Board of Elections, 393 U.S. 544, 563–68 (1969). Moreover, the submission requirement does not operate to prevent State and local governments from implementing voting changes which they decide are desirable.

A new subsection k has been added, based on experience since Dougherty County, Board of Education v. White, 439 U.S. 32 (1978), to clarify that governmental regulation of employee political activity is covered by Section 5. Recurrent practices, enabling legislation, and procedural changes, §§ 51.13, 51.14, 51.15. These sections constitute an attempt to clarify what constitutes a change, when a change has occurred, and what the consequences of preclearance of a change are. It is hoped that § 51.13 will result in the reduction of submissions made unnecessarily. For example, a county which always conducts voter registration at extra locations prior to elections does not have to make a submission prior to each election; a submission would be required only when the practice is first instituted or is changed. Sections 51.14 and 51.15 do not require that local implementation of a precleared State requirement of general, noncontingent application be precleared. For example, were a State to lower its voting age from 18 to 17, only one submission, by the State, would be required. (See also § 51.21) On the other hand, if a State were to pass legislation making a 17-year voting age a matter of local option, the preclearance of exercise of the option would be required (§ 51.14).

Court-ordered changes, § 51.16. Requested clarification of the exemption, from the preclearance requirement, of changes ordered by Federal courts has not been attempted. This section is designed only to alert affected jurisdictions and the public to the existence of this exemption. Its exact scope can only be determined through the application of the developing case law in this area to the particular situation in question. See Sanchez v. McDaniel, 615 F. 2d 1023 (5th Cir. 1980), application for stay pending consideration of petition for certiorari granted, —— U.S. —— (Aug. 14, 1980) (Powell, Circuit Justice).

The issue of the status of changes resulting from orders of State courts is not addressed in the Procedures. The reference in § 51.20 to approval by State courts is to the system in some States by which courts have an administrative role in the approval of some voting changes.

Premature Submissions, § 51.20. This section has been expanded to conform to present practice under which we consider unripe for review proposed changes which are based upon or are otherwise directly related to other voting changes which have not been precleared.

Contents of submissions, §§ 51.24, 51.25, 51.26. A number of commenters complained of the burden imposed on jurisdictions by these sections; some commenters sought additional clarity. The specific requests for information contained in §§ 51.25 and 51.26 should be read in conjunction with the general provisions of § 51.24. See especially § 51.24(c) and (e). Providing the information requested should usually not be burdensome for the submitting authority but will result in more prompt and efficient handling of submissions, fewer requests under § 51.35, and fewer objections. For example, in many instances, "the anticipated effect of the change on members of racial or language minority groups" (§ 51.25(m)) could be provided by a brief statement. Also, in our view, identifying minority group contacts (§ 51.26(f)) does not place an undue burden on the submitting authority. Moreover, we do not expect jurisdictions with insignificant minority populations routinely to provide the names of minority contacts.

Because legal descriptions are generally integral parts of acts or ordinances, excluding them from a submission will frequently be a greater inconvenience than including them; accordingly, the exception for legal descriptions has been dropped from § 51.25(a). Revisions to increase clarity and specificity have been made in § 51.26.

Obtaining information, § 51.35(c). One commenter noted that we did not specify the event that triggers the beginning of the 60-day period when information necessary to complete a submission is obtained from a source other than the submitting authority. § 51.35 has been revised to indicate that the 60-day period begins on the date on which the Attorney General sends notification to the submitting authority of the receipt of the information.

Failure to complete submission, § 51.38. Two commenters were critical of the discretion allowed by § 51.38. That section provides that, if requested additional information is not received within 60 days, "the Attorney General, absent extenuating circumstances and consistent with the burden of proof under Section 5 * * * may object to the change * * *." One commenter advocated the substitution of "shall" for "may", explaining that in order to postpone an adverse determination, political subdivisions will deliberately fail to provide additional information requested by the Department of Justice. To the extent that such a problem may exist, we believe that the practice described in § 51.38 provides a sufficient remedy. Ordinarily, the schedule by which requested information is provided is of greater interest to the submitting authority than to the Attorney General.

Burden of proof, § 51.39(e). One commenter opposed placing the burden of proof on the submitting authority. In our view, the burden of proof described in § 51.39(e) is consistent with and required by the scheme of Section 5. See Georgia v. United States, 411 U.S. 526, 536–39 (1973); South Carolina v. Katzenbach, 383 U.S. 301, 335 (1966); see also Evers v. State Board of Election Commissioners, 327 F. Supp. 640 (S.D. Miss. 1971), appeal dismissed 405 U.S. 1001 (1972). No objection, §§ 51.40, 51.42, 51.48. Concern with respect to the finality of a decision not to interpose an objection was expressed by one commenter. However, Section 5 itself states: "Neither an affirmative indication by the Attorney General that no objection will be made, nor the Attorney General's failure to object, nor a declaratory judgment entered under this section shall bar a subsequent action to enjoin enforcement of such qualification, prerequisite, standard, practice, or procedure." It is the practice of the Attorney General, reflected in § 51.40, to notify submitting authorities of this provision. The "subsequent action" referred to could not be under Section 5 but would have to have some other legal basis and could not constitute judicial review of the action of the Attorney General (see § 51.48). Accordingly, the Attorney General's reservation of the right to reexamine within the 60-day period a decision not to object (§ 51.42) is necessary if the Attorney General is to continue the practice of accommodating jurisdictions by making decisions as early as possible within the 60-day period.

Failure to respond, § 51.41. One commenter asserted that there would be insufficient procedural safeguards if preclearance were accomplished by the failure of the Attorney General to respond within the 60-day period. As § 51.41 was intended to make clear, it is the practice of the Attorney General to respond within the 60-day period. This section was added to clarify the rare occasions when, through the failure of administrative mechanisms, no response is made. Another commenter considered the provisos contained in the section inappropriate. The first proviso, that the submission be properly addressed, is necessary to assure that the submission can be routed to the proper unit within the Department of Justice. The second proviso, that response on the merits be appropriate, only makes clear that, if Section 5 does not apply (for one of the reasons listed in § 51.33), no preclearance is possible. In response to concern expressed by a number of commenters, § 51.41 has been changed to indicate explicitly (what was implicit in § 51.8(c)) that actions of the Attorney General under Section 5 are in writing.

Objections and Reconsiderations, §§ 51.43, 51.44, 51.45, 51.46, 51.47. The sections relating to notification of the decision to interpose an objection and the procedures for the reconsideration of objections have been reorganized and renumbered, without substantive change, to improve the clarity of presentation.

Accordingly, 28 CFR Part 51 is revised to read as set forth below.

Dated: December 18, 1980.

Benjamin R. Civiletti,
Attorney General.

PART 51—PROCEDURES FOR THE ADMINISTRATION OF SECTION 5 OF THE VOTING RIGHTS ACT OF 1965, AS AMENDED

Subpart A—General Provisions

Sec.
51.1 Purpose.
51.2 Definitions.
51.3 Delegation of authority.

Authority: The provisions of this Part 51 are issued under 5 U.S.C. 301, 28 U.S.C. 509, 510; and 42 U.S.C. 1973c.

Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act of 1965, as amended, 42 U.S.C. 1973c, prohibits the enforcement in any jurisdiction covered by Section 4(b) of the Act, 42 U.S.C. 1973(b), of any voting qualification or prerequisite to voting, or standard, practice, or procedure with respect to voting different from that in force or effect on the date used to determine coverage, until either (1) a declaratory judgment is obtained from the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia that such qualification, prerequisite, standard, practice, or procedure does not have the purpose and will not have the effect of denying or abridging the right to vote on account of race, color, or membership in a language minority group, or (2) it has been submitted to the Attorney General and the Attorney General has interposed no objection within a 60-day period following submission. In order to make clear the responsibilities of the Attorney General under Section 5 and the interpretation of the Attorney General of the responsibility imposed on others under this section, the procedures in this part have been established to govern the administration of Section 5.

§ 51.2 Definitions.

As used in this part—

(a) "Act" means the Voting Rights Act of 1965, 79 Stat. 437, as amended by the Civil Rights Act of 1968, 82 Stat. 73, the Voting Rights Act Amendments of 1970, 84 Stat. 314, and the Voting Rights Act Amendments of 1975, 89 Stat. 400, 42 U.S.C. 1973 et seq. Section numbers, such as "Section 14(c)(3)," refer to sections of the Act.

(b) "Attorney General" means the Attorney General of the United States or the delegate of the Attorney General.

(c) "Vote" and "voting" are used, as defined in the Act, to include "all action necessary to make a vote effective in any primary, special, or general election, including but not limited to, registration, listing pursuant to this Act, or other action required by law prerequisite to voting, casting a ballot, and having such ballot counted properly and included in the appropriate totals of votes cast with respect to candidates for public or party office and propositions for which votes are received in an election." Section 14(c)(1).

(d) "Change affecting voting" means any voting qualification, prerequisite to voting, or standard, practice, or procedure with respect to voting different from that in force or effect on the date used to determine coverage under Section 4(b) and includes, inter alia, the examples given in § 51.12.

(e) "Political subdivision" is used, as defined in the Act, to refer to " * * * any county or parish, except that where registration for voting is not conducted under the supervision of a county or parish, the term shall include any other subdivision of a State which conducts registration for voting." Section 14(c)(2).

(f) "Covered jurisdiction" is used to refer to a State, where the determination referred to in § 51.4 has been made on a statewide basis, and to a political subdivision, where the determination has not been made on a statewide basis.

(g) "Preclearance" is used to refer to the obtaining of the declaratory judgment described in Section 5 or to the failure of the Attorney General to interpose an objection pursuant to Section 5.

(h) "Submission" is used to refer to the written presentation to the Attorney General by an appropriate official of any change affecting voting.

(i) "Submitting authority" means the jurisdiction on whose behalf a submission is made.

(j) "Language minority" or "language minority group" is used, as defined in the Act, to refer to persons who are American Indian, Asian American, Alaskan Natives, or of Spanish heritage. Section 14(c)(3). See 28 CFR Part 55, Interpretative Guidelines: Implementation of the Provisions of the Voting Rights Act Regarding Language Minority Groups.

§ 51.3 Delegation of authority.

The responsibility and authority for determinations under Section 5 have been delegated by the Attorney General to the Assistant Attorney General, Civil Rights Division. With the exception of objections and decisions following the reconsideration of objections, the Chief of the Voting Section is authorized to act on behalf of the Assistant Attorney General.

§ 51.4 Date used to determine coverage; list of covered jurisdictions.

(a) The requirement of Section 5 takes effect upon publication in the Federal Register of the requisite determinations of the Director of the Census and the Attorney General under Section 4(b). These determinations are not reviewable in any court. Section 4(b).

(b) Section 5 requires the preclearance of changes affecting voting made since the date used for the determination of coverage. For each covered jurisdiction that date is one of the following: November 1, 1964; November 1, 1968; or November 1, 1972. A list of covered jurisdictions, together with the applicable date used to determine coverage, is contained in the appendix to this part. Any additional determinations of coverage will be published in the Federal Register.

§ 51.5 Termination of coverage.

A covered jurisdiction may terminate the application of Section 5 by obtaining the declaratory judgment described in Section 4(a) of the Act.

§ 51.6 Political subunits.

All political subunits within a covered jurisdiction (e.g., counties, cities, school districts) are subject to the requirement of Section 5.

§ 51.7 Political parties.

Certain activities of political parties are subject to the preclearance requirement of Section 5. A change affecting voting effected by a political party is subject to the preclearance requirement (1) if the change relates to a public electoral function of the party and (2) if the party is acting under authority explicitly or implicitly granted by a covered jurisdiction or political subunit subject to the preclearance requirement of Section 5. For example, changes with respect to the recruitment of party members, the conduct of political campaigns, and the drafting of party platforms are not subject to the preclearance requirement. Changes with respect to the conduct of primary elections at which party nominees, delegates to party conventions, or party officials are chosen are subject to the preclearance requirement of Section 5. Where appropriate the term "jurisdiction" (but not "covered jurisdiction") includes political parties.

§ 51.8 Computation of time.

(a) The Attorney General shall have 60 days in which to interpose an objection to a submitted change affecting voting.

(b) Except as specified in §§ 51.35, 51.37, and 51.41 the 60-day period shall commence upon receipt by the Department of Justice of a submission.

(c) The 60-day period shall mean 60 calendar days, with the day of receipt of the submission not counted. If the final day of the period should fall on a Saturday, Sunday, any day designated as a holiday by the President or Congress of the United States, or any other day that is not a day of regular business for the Department of Justice, the Attorney General shall have until the close of the next full business day in which to interpose an objection. The date of the Attorney General's response shall be the date on which it is mailed to the submitting authority.

§ 51.9 Requirement of action for declaratory judgment or submission to the Attorney General.

Section 5 requires that, prior to enforcement of any change affecting voting, the jurisdiction that has enacted or seeks to administer the change must either (1) obtain a judicial determination from the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia that denial or abridgment of the right to vote on account of race, color, or membership in a language minority group is not the purpose and will not be the effect of the change or (2) make to the Attorney General a proper submission of the change to which no objection is interposed. It is unlawful to enforce a change affecting voting without obtaining preclearance under Section 5. The obligation to obtain such preclearance is not relieved by unlawful enforcement.

§ 51.10 Right to bring suit.

Submission to the Attorney General does not affect the right of the submitting authority to bring an action in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia for a declaratory judgment that the change affecting voting does not have the prohibited discriminatory purpose or effect.

§ 51.11 Scope of requirement.

Any change affecting voting, even though it appears to be minor or indirect, even though it ostensibly expands voting rights, or even though it is designed to remove the elements that caused objection by the Attorney General to a prior submitted change, must meet the Section 5 preclearance requirement.

§ 51.12 Examples of changes.

Changes affecting voting include, but are not limited to, the following examples:

(a) Any change in qualifications or eligibility for voting.

(b) Any change concerning registration, balloting, and the counting of votes and any change concerning publicity for or assistance in registration or voting.

(c) Any change with respect to the use of a language other than English in any aspect of the electoral process.

(d) Any change in the boundaries of voting precincts or in the location of polling places.

(e) Any change in the constituency of an official or the boundaries of a voting unit (e.g., through redistricting, annexation, deannexation, incorporation, reapportionment, changing to at-large elections from district elections, or changing to district elections from at-large elections).

(f) Any change in the method of determining the outcome of an election (e.g., by requiring a majority vote for election or the use of a designated post or place system).

(g) Any change affecting the eligibility of persons to become or remain candidates, to obtain a position on the ballot in primary or general elections, or to become or remain holders of elective offices.

(h) Any change in the eligibility and qualification procedures for independent candidates.

(i) Any change in the term of an elective office or an elected official or in the offices that are elective (e.g., by shortening the term of an office, changing from election to appointment or staggering the terms of offices).

(j) Any change affecting the necessity of or methods for offering issues and propositions for approval by referendum.

(k) Any change affecting the right or ability of persons to participate in political campaigns which is effected by a jurisdiction subject to the requirement of Section 5.

§ 51.13 Recurrent practices.

Where a jurisdiction implements a practice or procedure periodically or upon certain established contingencies, a change occurs (1) the first time such a practice or procedure is implemented by the jurisdiction, (2) when the manner in which such a practice or procedure is implemented by the jurisdiction is changed, or (3) when the rules for determining when such a practice or procedure will be implemented are changed. The failure of the Attorney General to object to a recurrent practice or procedure constitutes preclearance of the future use of the practice or procedure if its recurrent nature is clearly stated or described in the submission or is expressly recognized in the final response of the Attorney General on the merits of the submission.

§ 51.14 Enabling legislation and contingent or nonuniform requirements.

(a) The failure of the Attorney General to interpose an objection to legislation (1) that enables or permits political subunits to institute a voting change or (2) that requires or enables political subunits to institute a voting change upon some future event or if they satisfy certain criteria does not exempt the political subunit itself from the requirement to obtain preclearance when it seeks or is required to institute the change in question, unless implementation by the subunit is explicitly included and described in the submission of such parent legislation.

(b) Such legislation includes for example, (1) legislation authorizing counties, cities, or school districts to institute any of the changes described in § 51.12, (2) legislation requiring a political subunit that chooses a certain form of government to follow specified election procedures, (3) legislation requiring or authorizing political subunits of a certain size or a certain location to institute specified changes, (4) legislation requiring a political subunit to follow certain practices or procedures unless the subunit's charter or ordinances specify to the contrary.

§ 51.15 Distinction between changes in procedure and changes in substance.

The failure of the Attorney General to interpose an objection to a procedure for instituting a change affecting voting does not exempt the substantive change from the preclearance requirement. For example, if the procedure for the approval of an annexation is changed from city council approval to approval in a referendum, the preclearance of the new procedure does not exempt an annexation accomplished under the new procedure from the preclearance requirement.

§ 51.16 Court-ordered changes.

Changes affecting voting that are specifically ordered by a Federal court as a result of the court's equitable jurisdiction over an adversary proceeding are not subject to the preclearance requirement of Section 5. However, subsequent changes necessitated by the court order but decided upon by the jurisdiction are subject to the preclearance requirement. For example, although a court-ordered districting plan may not be subject to the preclearance requirement, changes in voting precincts and polling places made necessary by the new plan remain subject to Section 5.

§ 51.17 Request for notification concerning voting litigation.

A jurisdiction subject to the preclearance requirement of Section 5 that becomes involved in any litigation concerning voting is requested promptly to notify the Assistant Attorney General, Civil Rights Division, Department of Justice, Washington, D.C. 20530. Such notification will not be considered a submission under Section 5.

Subpart B—Procedures for Submission to the Attorney General

§ 51.18 Form of submissions.

Submissions may be made in letter or any other written form.

§ 51.19 Time of submissions.

Changes affecting voting should be submitted as soon as possible after they become final.

§ 51.20 Premature submissions.

The Attorney General will not consider on the merits (a) any proposal for a change affecting voting submitted prior to final enactment or administrative decision or (b) any proposed change which has a direct bearing on another change affecting voting which has not received Section 5 preclearance. However, with respect to a change for which approval by referendum, a State court or a Federal agency is required, the Attorney General may make a determination concerning the change prior to such approval if the change is not subject to alteration in the final approving action and if all other action necessary for approval has been taken.

§ 51.21 Party and jurisdiction responsible for making submissions.

(a) Changes affecting voting shall be submitted by the chief legal officer or other appropriate official of the submitting authority or by any other authorized person on behalf of the submitting authority. When one or more counties or other political subunits within a State will be affected, the State may make a submission on their behalf. Where a State is covered as a whole, State legislation (except legislation of local applicability) or other changes undertaken or required by the State shall be submitted by the State.

(b) A change effected by a political party (see § 51.7) may be submitted by an appropriate official of the political party.

§ 51.22 Address for submissions.

Changes affecting voting shall be mailed or delivered to the Assistant Attorney General, Civil Rights Division, Department of Justice, Washington, D.C. 20530. The envelope and first page of the submission shall be clearly marked: Submission under Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act.

§ 51.23 Withdrawal of submissions.

If while a submission is pending the submitted change is repealed, altered, or declared invalid or otherwise becomes unenforceable, the jurisdiction may withdraw the submission. In other circumstances, a jurisdiction may withdraw a submission only if it shows good cause for such withdrawal.

§ 51.27 Communications concerning voting changes.

Any individual or group may send to the Attorney General information concerning a change affecting voting in a jurisdiction to which Section 5 applies.

(a) Communications may be in the form of a letter stating the name address, and telephone number of the individual or group, describing the alleged change affecting voting and setting forth evidence regarding whether the change has or does not have a discriminatory purpose or effect, or simply bringing to the attention of the Attorney General the fact that a voting change has occurred.

(b) The communications should be mailed to the Assistant Attorney General, Civil Rights Division, Department of Justice, Washington, D.C. 20530. The envelope and first page should be marked: Comment under Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act.

(c) Comments by individuals or groups concerning any change affecting voting may be sent at any time; however, individuals and groups are encouraged to comment as soon as they learn of the change.

(d) Department of Justice officials and employees shall comply with the request of any individual that his or her identity not be disclosed to any person outside the Department, to the extent permitted by the Freedom of Information Act, 5 U.S.C. 552. In addition, whenever it appears to the Attorney General that disclosure of the identity of an individual who provided information regarding a change affecting voting "would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy" under 5 U.S.C. 552(b)(6), the identity of the individual shall not be disclosed to any person outside the Department.

(e) When an individual or group desires the Attorney General to consider information that was supplied in connection with an earlier submission, it is not necessary to resubmit the information but merely to identify the earlier submission and the relevant information.

§ 51.28 Action on communications from individuals or groups.

(a) If there has already been a submission received of the change affecting voting brought to the attention of the Attorney General by an individual or group, any evidence from the individual or group shall be considered along with the materials submitted and materials resulting from any investigation.

(b) If such a submission has not been received, the Attorney General shall advise the appropriate jurisdiction of the requirement of Section 5 with respect to the change in question.

§ 51.29 Communications concerning voting suits.

Individuals and groups are urged to notify the Assistant Attorney General Civil Rights Division, of litigation concerning voting in jurisdictions subject to the requirement of Section 5.

§ 51.30 Establishment and maintenance of registry of interested individuals and groups.

The Attorney General shall establish and maintain a Registry of Interested Individuals and Groups, which shall contain the name and address of any individual or group that wishes to receive notice of Section 5 submissions. Information relating to this registry and to the requirements of the Privacy Act of 1974, 5 U.S.C. 552a et seq., is contained in Justice/CRT-004, 43 FR 44676 (Sept. 28, 1978).

Subpart E—Processing of Submissions

§ 51.31 Notice to registrants concerning submissions.

Weekly notice of submissions that have been received will be given to the individuals and groups who have registered for this purpose under § 51.30.

§ 51.32 Expedited consideration.

(a) When a submitting authority is required under State law or local ordinance or otherwise finds it necessary to implement a change within the 60-day period following submission, it may request that the submission be given expedited consideration. The submission should explain why such consideration is needed and provide the date by which a determination is required.

(b) Jurisdictions should endeavor to plan for changes in advance so that expedited consideration will not be required and should not routinely request such consideration. When a submitting authority demonstrates good cause for expedited consideration the Attorney General will attempt to make a decision by the date requested. However, the Attorney General cannot guarantee that such consideration can be given.

(c) Notice of the request for expedited consideration will be given to interested parties registered under § 51.30.

§ 51.33 Disposition of inappropriate submissions.

The Attorney General will make no response on the merits with respect to an inappropriate submission but will notify the submitting authority of the inappropriateness of the submission. Such notification will be made as promptly as possible and no later than the 60th day following receipt and will include an explanation of the inappropriateness of the submission. Inappropriate submissions include the submission of changes that do not affect voting (see, e.g., § 51.12), the submission of standards, practices, or procedures that have not been changed (see, e.g., §§ 51.4, 51.13), the submission of changes that affect voting but are not subject to the requirement of Section 5 (see, e.g., § 51.16), premature submissions (see § 51.20), and submissions by jurisdictions not subject to the requirement of Section 5 (see §§ 51.4, 51.5).

§ 51.34 Release of information concerning submissions.

The Attorney General shall have the discretion to call to the attention of the submitting authority or any interested individual or group information or comments related to a submission.

§ 51.35 Obtaining information from the submitting authority.

(a) If a submission does not satisfy the requirements of § 51.25, the Attorney General shall request such further information as is necessary from the submitting authority and advise the submitting authority that the 60-day period will not commence until such information is received by the Department of Justice. The request shall be made as promptly as possible after receipt of the original inadequate submission and no later than the 60th day following its receipt.

(b) A copy of the request shall be sent to any party who has commented on the submission or has requested notice of the Attorney General's action thereon.

(c) If, after a request for further information is made pursuant to this section, the information requested becomes available to the Attorney General from a source other than the submitting authority, the Attorney General shall promptly notify the submitting authority, and the 60-day period will commence upon the date of such notification.

(d) Notice of the request for and receipt of further information will be given to interested parties registered under § 51.30.

§ 51.36 Obtaining information from others.

(a) The Attorney General may at any time request relevant information from governmental jurisdictions and from interested groups and individuals and may conduct any investigation or other inquiry that is deemed appropriate in making a determination.

(b) If a submission does not contain evidence of adequate notice to the public, and the Attorney General believes that such notice is essential to a determination, steps will be taken by the Attorney General to provide public notice sufficient to invite interested or affected persons to provide evidence as to the presence or absence of a discriminatory purpose or effect. The submitting authority shall be advised when any such steps are taken.

§ 51.37 Supplementary submissions.

When a submitting authority provides documents and information materially supplementing a submission (or a request for reconsideration of an objection) or, before the expiration of the 60-day period, makes a second submission such that the two submissions cannot be independently considered, the 60-day period for the original submission will be calculated from the receipt of the supplementary information or the second submission.

§ 51.38 Failure to complete submissions.

If after 60 days the submitting authority has not provided further information in response to a request made pursuant to § 51.35(a), the Attorney General, absent extenuating circumstances and consistent with the burden of proof under Section 5 described in § 51.39(e), may object to the change, giving notice as specified in § 51.43.

§ 51.39 Standards for determination by the Attorney General.

(a) Section 5 provides for submission to the Attorney General as an alternative to the seeking of a declaratory judgment from the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia. Therefore, the Attorney General shall make the same determination that would be made by the court in an action for a declaratory judgment under Section 5: whether the submitted change has the purpose or will have the effect of denying or abridging the right to vote on account of race, color, or membership in a language minority group.

(b) Guided by the relevant judicial decisions, the Attorney General shall base a determination on a review of material presented by the submitting authority, relevant information provided by individuals or groups, and the results of any investigation conducted by the Department of Justice.

(c) If the Attorney General determines that a submitted change does not have the prohibited purpose or effect, no objection shall be interposed to the change.

(d) If the Attorney General determines that a submitted change has the prohibited purpose or effect, an objection shall be interposed to the change.

(e) The burden of proof on a submitting authority when it submits a change to the Attorney General is the same as it would be if the change was the subject of a declaratory judgment action in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia. Therefore, if the evidence as to the purpose or effect of a change is conflicting and the Attorney General is unable to determine that the submitted change does not have the prohibited purpose or effect, an objection shall be interposed to the change.

§ 51.40 Notification of decision not to object.

(a) The Attorney General shall within the 60-day period allowed notify the submitting authority of a decision to interpose no objection to a submitted change affecting voting.

(b) The notification shall state that the failure of the Attorney General to object does not bar subsequent litigation to enjoin the enforcement of the change.

(c) A copy of the notification shall be sent to any party who has commented on the submission or has requested notice of the Attorney General's action thereon.

§ 51.41 Failure of the Attorney General to respond.

It is the practice and intention of the Attorney General to respond to each submission within the 60-day period. However, the failure of the Attorney General to make a written response within the 60-day period constitutes preclearance of the submitted change, provided the submission is addressed as specified in § 51.22 and is appropriate for a response on the merits as described in § 51.33.

§ 51.42 Reexamination of decision not to object.

After notification to the submitting authority of a decision to interpose no objection to a submitted change affecting voting has been given, the Attorney General may reexamine the submission if, prior to the expiration of the 60-day period, information indicating the possibility of the prohibited discriminatory purpose or effect is received. In this event, the Attorney General may interpose an objection provisionally and advise the submitting authority that examination of the change in light of the newly raised issues will continue and that a final decision will be rendered as soon as possible.

§ 51.43 Notification of decision to object.

(a) The Attorney General shall within the [illegible] allowed notify the submitting authority of a decision to interpose an objection. The reasons for the decision shall be stated.

(b) The submitting authority shall be advised that the Attorney General will reconsider an objection upon a request by the submitting authority.

(c) The submitting authority shall be advised further that notwithstanding the objection it may institute an action in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia for a declaratory judgment that the change objected to by the Attorney General does not have the prohibited discriminatory purpose or effect.

(d) A copy of the notification shall be sent to any party who has commented on the submission or has requested notice of the Attorney General's action thereon.

(e) Notice of the decision to interpose an objection will be given to interested parties registered under § 51.30.

§ 51.44 Request for reconsideration.

(a) The submitting authority may at any time request the Attorney General to reconsider an objection.

(b) Requests may be in letter or any other written form and should contain relevant information or legal argument.

(c) Notice of the request will be given to any party who commented on the submission or requested notice of the Attorney General's action thereon and to interested parties registered under § 51.30. In appropriate cases the Attorney General may request the submitting authority to give local public notice of the request.

§ 51.45 Reconsideration of objection at the insistance of the Attorney General.

(a) Where there appears to have been a substantial change in operative fact or relevant law, an objection may be reconsidered, if it is deemed appropriate, at the insistance of the Attorney General.

(b) Notice of such a decision to reconsider shall be given to the submitting authority, to any party who commented on the submission or requested notice of the Attorney General's action thereon, and to interested parties registered under § 51.30, and the Attorney General shall decide whether to withdraw or to continue the objection only after such persons have had a reasonable opportunity to comment.

§ 51.46 Conference.

(a) A submitting authority that has requested reconsideration of an objection pursuant to § 51.44 may request a conference to produce information or legal argument in support of reconsideration.

(b) Such a conference shall be held at a location determined by the Attorney General and shall be conducted in an informal manner.

(c) When a submitting authority requests such a conference, individuals or groups that commented on the change prior to the Attorney General's objection or that seek to participate in response to any notice of a request for reconsideration shall be notified and given the opportunity to confer.

(d) The Attorney General shall have the discretion to hold separate meetings to confer with the submitting authority and other interested groups or individuals.

(e) Such conferences will be open to the public or to the press only at the discretion of the Attorney General and with the agreement of the participating parties.

§ 51.47 Decision after reconsideration.

(a) The Attorney General shall within the 60-day period following the receipt of a reconsideration request or following notice given under § 51.45(b) notify the submitting authority of the decision to continue or withdraw the objection, provided that the Attorney General shall have at least 15 days following any conference that is held in which to decide. The reasons for the decision shall be stated.

(b) The objection shall be withdrawn if the Attorney General is satisfied that the change does not have the purpose and will not have the effect of discriminating on account of race, color, or membership in a language minority group.

(c) If the objection is not withdrawn, the submitting authority shall be advised that notwithstanding the objection it may institute an action in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia for a declaratory judgment that the change objected to by the Attorney General does not have the prohibited purpose or effect.

(d) A copy of the notification shall be sent to any party who has commented on the submission or reconsideration or has requested notice of the Attorney General's action thereon.

(e) Notice of the decision after reconsideration will be given to interested parties registered under § 51.30.

§ 51.48 Absence of judicial review.

The decision of the Attorney General not to object to a submitted change or to withdraw an objection is not reviewable. However, Section 5 states: "Neither an affirmative indication by the Attorney General that no objection will be made, nor the Attorney General's failure to object, nor a declaratory judgment entered under this section shall bar a subsequent action to enjoin enforcement of such qualification, prerequisite, standard, practice, or procedure."

§ 51.49 Records concerning submissions.

(a) Section 5 files: The Attorney General shall maintain a Section 5 file for each submission, containing the submission, related written materials, correspondence, memoranda, investigative reports, notations concerning conferences with the submitting authority or any interested individual or group, and copies of any letters from the Attorney General concerning the submission.

(b) Objection files: Brief summaries regarding each submission and the general findings of the Department of Justice investigation and decision concerning it will be prepared when a decision to interpose, continue, or withdraw an objection is made. Files of these summaries, arranged by jurisdiction and by the date upon which such decision is made, will be maintained.

(c) Computer file: Records of all submissions and of their dispositions by the Attorney General shall be electronically stored and periodically retrieved in the form of computer printouts.

APPENDIX—Jurisdictions covered under secs. 4(f)(4) and 203(c) of the Voting Rights Act of 1965, as amended by the Voting Rights Act Amendments of 1975.

SOURCE: Order No. 655-76, 41 FR 29998, July 20, 1976, unless otherwise noted.

§ 55.1 Definitions.

For purposes of this Part—

(a) "Act" means the Voting Rights Act of 1965, 79 Stat. 437, as amended by the Voting Rights Act Amendments of 1970, 84 Stat. 314, and the Voting Rights Act Amendments of 1975, Pub. L. 94-73, 42 U.S.C. 1973 et seq. Section numbers, such as "Section 14(c)(3)," refer to the Act.

(b) "Attorney General" means the Attorney General of the United States.

(c) "Language minority" or "Language minority group" means persons who are American Indian, Asian American, Alaskan Natives, or of Spanish heritage. Sections 14(c)(3), 203(e). For the purposes of the Act the following Asian American groups are considered language minority groups: Chinese Americans, Filipino Americans, Japanese Americans, and Korean Americans. As used in this Part, "applicable language minority group" refers to the group or groups listed in the determinations as to coverage published in the FEDERAL REGISTER. As used in this Part, each of the seven following groups is considered a "single language minority group": American Indians, Alaskan Natives, persons of Spanish heritage, Chinese Americans, Filipino Americans, Japanese Americans, and Korean Americans.

(d) "Political subdivision" means: "• • • any county or parish, except that where registration for voting is not conducted under the supervision of a county or parish, the term shall include any other subdivision of a State which conducts registration for voting." Section 14(c)(2).

§ 55.2 Purpose; standards for measuring compliance.

(a) The purpose of this Part is to set forth the Attorney General's interpretation of the provisions of the Voting Rights Act, as amended by Public Law 94-73 (1975), which require certain States and political subdivisions to conduct elections in the language of certain "language minority groups" in addition to English.

(b) In the Attorney General's view the objective of the Act's provisions is to enable members of applicable language minority groups to participate effectively in the electoral process. This Part establishes two basic standards by which the Attorney General will measure compliance: (1) That materials and assistance should be provided in a way designed to allow members of applicable language minority groups to be effectively informed of and participate effectively in voting-connected activities; and (2) that an affected jurisdiction should take all reasonable steps to achieve that goal.

(c) The determination of what is required for compliance with Section 4(f)(4) and Section 203(c) is the responsibility of the affected jurisdiction. These guidelines should not be used as a substitute for analysis and decision by the affected jurisdiction.

(d) Jurisdictions covered under Section 4(f)(4) of the Act are subject to the preclearance requirements of Section 5. See Part 51 of this Chapter. Such jurisdictions have the burden of establishing to the satisfaction of the Attorney General or to the United States District Court for the District of Columbia that changes made in their election laws and procedures in order to comply with the requirements of Section 4(f)(4) are not discriminatory under the terms of Section 5. However, Section 5 expressly provides that the failure of the Attorney General to object does not bar any subsequent judicial action to enjoin the enforcement of the changes.

(e) Jurisdictions covered solely under Section 203(c) of the Act are not subject to the preclearance requirements of Section 5, nor is there a Federal apparatus available for preclearance of Section 203(c) compliance activities. The Attorney General will not preclear jurisdictions' proposals for compliance with Section 203(c).

(f) Consideration by the Attorney General of a jurisdiction's compliance with the requirements of Section 4(f)(4) occurs in the review pursuant to Section 5 of the Act of changes with respect to voting, in the consideration of the need for litigation to enforce the requirements of Section 4(f)(4), and in the defense of suits for termination of coverage under Section 4(f)(4). Consideration by the Attorney General of a jurisdiction's compliance with the requirements of Section 203(c) occurs in the consideration of the need for litigation to enforce the requirements of Section 203(c).

(g) In enforcing the Act—through the Section 5 preclearance review process, through litigation, and through defense of suits for termination of coverage under Section 4(f)(4)—the Attorney General will follow the general policies set forth in this Part.

(h) This Part is not intended to preclude affected jurisdictions from taking additional steps to further the policy of the Act. By virtue of the Supremacy Clause of Art. VI of the Constitution, the provisions of the Act override any inconsistent State law.

§ 55.3 Statutory requirements.

The Act's requirements concerning the conduct of elections in languages in addition to English are contained in Section 4(f)(4) and Section 203(c). These sections state that whenever a jurisdiction subject to their terms "provides any registration or voting notices, forms, instructions, assistance, or other materials or information relating to the electoral process, including ballots, it shall provide them in the language of the applicable language minority group as well as in • • • English. • • •"

Subpart B—Nature of Coverage

§ 55.4 Effective date; list of covered jurisdictions.

(a) The 1975 Amendments took effect upon the date of their enactment, August 6, 1975.

(1) The requirements of Section 4(f)(4) take effect upon publication in the FEDERAL REGISTER of the requisite determinations of the Director of the Census and the Attorney General. Such determinations are not reviewable in any court.

(2) The requirements of Section 203(c) take effect upon publication in the FEDERAL REGISTER of the requisite determinations of the Director of the Census. Such determinations are not reviewable in any court.

(b) Jurisdictions determined to be covered under Section 4(f)(4) or Section 203(c) are listed, together with the language minority group with respect to which coverage was determined, in the Appendix to this Part. Any additional determinations of coverage under either Section 4(f)(4) or Section 203(c) will be published in the FEDERAL REGISTER.

§ 55.5 Coverage under Section 4(f)(4).

(a) Coverage formula. Section 4(f)(4) applies to any State or political subdivision in which (1) over five percent of the voting-age citizens were, on November 1, 1972, members of a single language minority group, (2) registration and election materials were provided only in English on November 1, 1972, and (3) fewer than 50 percent of the voting-age citizens were registered to vote or voted in the 1972 Presidential election.

All three conditions must be satisfied before coverage exists under Section 4(f)(4).[1]

(b) Coverage may be determined with regard to Section 4(f)(4) on a statewide or political subdivision basis.

(1) Whenever the determination is made that the bilingual requirements of Section 4(f)(4) are applicable to an entire State, these requirements apply to each of the State's political subdivisions as well as to the State. In other words, each political subdivision within a covered State is subject to the same requirements as the State.

(2) Where an entire State is not covered under Section 4(f)(4), individual political subdivisions may be covered.

§ 55.6 Coverage under Section 203(c).

There are two ways in which coverage under Section 203(c) may be established.[2]

(a) Under the first method, a preliminary determination is made by the Director of the Census of States in which more than five percent of the voting-age citizens are members of a single language minority group the illiteracy rate of which, in the particular State, is greater than the national illiteracy rate. In these States, a particular political subdivision is covered with respect to the State's applicable language minority group if five percent or more of the voting-age citizens of the political subdivision are members of the applicable language minority group.

(b) The second method of establishing coverage is used with respect to language minority groups not reached by the preliminary determination based on statewide data. Under the second method, covered political subdivisions are those in which more than five percent of the voting-age citizens are members of a single language minority group the illiteracy rate of which, in the particular political subdivision, is greater than the national illiteracy rate.

(c) For the purpose of determinations of coverage under Section 203(c), "illiteracy means the failure to complete the fifth primary grade." Section 203(b).

§ 55.7 Termination of coverage.

(a) Section 4(f)(4). A covered jurisdiction may terminate coverage under Section 4(f)(4) (via Section 4(a)) by obtaining from the United States District Court for the District of Columbia a declaratory judgment that there has been no discriminatory use of a test or device for a period of ten years. The term "test or device" is defined in

[1] Coverage is based on Sections 4(b) (third sentence), 4(c), and 4(f)(3).

[2] The criteria for coverage are contained in Section 203(b).

Section 4(c) and Section 4(f)(3). When an entire State is covered in this regard, only the State, and not individual political subdivisions within the State, may bring an action to terminate coverage.

(b) Section 203(c). The requirements of Section 203(c) apply until August 6, 1985. A covered jurisdiction may terminate such coverage earlier if it can prove in a declaratory judgment action in a United States district court, that the illiteracy rate of the applicable language minority group is equal to or less than the national illiteracy rate.

§ 55.8 Relationship between Section 4(f)(4) and Section 203(c).

(a) The statutory requirements of Section 4(f)(4) and Section 203(c) regarding minority language material and assistance are essentially identical.

(b) Jurisdictions subject to the requirements of Section 4(f)(4)—but not jurisdictions subject only to the requirements of Section 203(c)—are also subject to the Act's special provisions, such as Section 5 (regarding preclearance of changes in voting laws) and Section 6 (regarding Federal examiners).[3] See Part 51 of this Chapter.

(c) Although the coverage formulas applicable to Section 4(f)(4) and Section 203(c) are different, a political subdivision may be included within both of the coverage formulas. Under these circumstances, a judgment terminating coverage of the jurisdiction under one provision would not have the effect of terminating coverage under the other provision.

§ 55.9 Coverage of political units within a county.

Where a political subdivision (e.g., a county) is determined to be subject to Section 4(f)(4) or Section 203(c), all political units that hold elections within that political subdivision (e.g., cities, school districts) are subject to the same requirements as the political subdivision.

[3] In addition, a jurisdiction covered under Section 203(c) but not under Section 4(f)(4) is subject to the Act's special provisions if it was covered under Section 4(b) prior to the 1975 Amendments to the Act.

§ 55.10 Types of elections covered.

(a) General. The language provisions of the Act apply to registration for and voting in any type of election, whether it is a primary, general or special election. Section 14(c)(1). This includes elections of officers as well as elections regarding such matters as bond issues, constitutional amendments and referendums. Federal, State and local elections are covered as are elections of special districts, such as school districts and water districts.

(b) Elections for statewide office. If an election conducted by a county relates to Federal or State offices or issues as well as county offices or issues, a county subject to the bilingual requirements must insure compliance with those requirements with respect to all aspects of the election, i.e., the minority language material and assistance must deal with the Federal and State offices or issues as well as county offices or issues.

(c) Multi-county districts. Regarding elections for an office representing more than one county, e.g., State legislative districts and special districts that include portions of two or more counties, the bilingual requirements are applicable on a county-by-county basis. Thus, minority language material and assistance need not be provided by the government in counties not subject to the bilingual requirements of the Act.

Subpart C—Determining the Exact Language

The requirements of Section 4(f)(4) or Section 203(c) apply with respect to the languages of language minority groups. The applicable groups are indicated in the determinations of the Attorney General or the Director of the Census. This Subpart relates to the view of the Attorney General concerning the determination by covered jurisdictions of precisely the language to be employed. In enforcing the Act, the Attorney General will consider whether the languages, forms of languages, or dialects chosen by covered jurisdictions for use in the electoral process enable members of applicable language minority groups to participate effectively in the electoral process. It is the responsibility of covered jurisdictions to determine what languages, forms of languages, or dialects will be effective.

§ 55.12 Language used for written material.

(a) Language minority groups having more than one language. Some language minority groups, for example, Filipino Americans, have more than one language other than English. A jurisdiction required to provide election materials in the language of such a group need not provide materials in more than one language other than English. The Attorney General will consider whether the language that is used for election materials is the one most widely used by the jurisdiction's voting-age citizens who are members of the language minority group.

(b) Languages with more than one written form. Some languages, for example, Japanese, have more than one written form. A jurisdiction required to provide election materials in such a language need not provide more than one version. The Attorney General will consider whether the particular version of the language that is used for election materials is the one most widely used by the jurisdiction's voting-age citizens who are members of the language minority group.

(c) Unwritten Languages. Many of the languages used by language minority groups, for example, by some American Indians and Alaskan Natives, are unwritten. With respect to any such language, only oral assistance and publicity are required. Even though a written form for a language may exist, a language may be considered unwritten if it is not commonly used in a written form. It is the responsibility of the covered jurisdiction to determine whether a language should be considered written or unwritten.

§ 55.13 Language used for oral assistance and publicity.

(a) Languages with more than one dialect. Some languages, for example, Chinese, have several dialects. Where a jurisdiction is obligated to provide oral assistance in such a language, the jurisdiction's obligation is to ascertain the dialects that are commonly used by members of the applicable language minority group in the jurisdiction and to provide oral assistance in such dialects. (See § 55.20.)

(b) Language minority groups having more than one language. In some jurisdictions members of an applicable language minority group speak more than one language other than English. Where a jurisdiction is obligated to provide oral assistance in the language of such a group, the jurisdiction's obligation is to ascertain the languages that are commonly used by members of that group in the jurisdiction and to provide oral assistance in such languages. (See § 55.20.)

Subpart D—Minority Language Materials and Assistance

(a) This Subpart sets forth the views of the Attorney General with respect to the requirements of Section 4(f)(4) and Section 203(c) concerning the provision of minority language materials and assistance and some of the factors that the Attorney General will consider in carrying out his responsibilities to enforce Section 4(f)(4) and Section 203(c). Through the use of his authority under Section 5 and his authority to bring suits to enforce Section 4(f)(4) and Section 203(c), the Attorney General will seek to prevent or remedy discrimination against members of language minority groups based on the failure to use the applicable minority language in the electoral process. The Attorney General also has the responsibility to defend against suits brought for the termination of coverage under Section 4(f)(4) and Section 203(c).

(b) In discharging these responsibilities the Attorney General will respond to complaints received, conduct on his own initiative inquiries and surveys concerning compliance, and undertake other enforcement activities.

(c) It is the responsibility of the jurisdiction to determine what actions by it are required for compliance with the requirements of Section 4(f)(4) and Section 203(c) and to carry out these actions.

§ 55.15 Affected activities.

The requirements of Sections 4(f)(4) and 203(c) apply with regard to the provision of "any registration or voting notices, forms, instructions, assistance, or other materials or information relating to the electoral process, including ballots." The basic purpose of these requirements is to allow members of applicable language minority groups to be effectively informed of and participate effectively in voting-connected activities. Accordingly, the quoted language should be broadly construed to apply to all stages of the electoral process, from voter registration through activities related to conducting elections, including, for example the issuance, at any time during the year, of notifications, announcements, or other informational materials concerning the opportunity to register, the deadline for voter registration, the time, places and subject matters of elections, and the absentee voting process.

§ 55.16 Standards and proof of compliance.

Compliance with the requirements of Section 4(f)(4) and Section 203(c) is best measured by results. A jurisdiction is more likely to achieve compliance with these requirements if if has worked with the cooperation of and to the satisfaction of organizations representing members of the applicable language minority group. In planning its compliance with Section 4(f)(4) or Section 203(c), a jurisdiction may, where alternative methods of compliance are available, use less costly methods if they are equivalent to more costly methods in their effectiveness.

§ 55.17 Targeting.

The term "targeting" is commonly used in discussions of the requirements of Section 4(f)(4) and Section 203(c). "Targeting" refers to a system in which the minority language materials or assistance required by the Act are provided to less than all persons or registered voters. It is the view of the Attorney General that a targeting system will normally fulfill the Act's minority language requirements if it is designed and implemented in such a way that language minority group members who need minority language materials and assistance receive them.

§ 55.18 Provision of minority language materials and assistance.

(a) Materials provided by mail. If materials provided by mail (or by some comparable form of distribution) generally to residents or registered voters are not all provided in the applicable minority language, the Attorney General will consider whether an effective targeting system has been developed. For example, a separate mailing of materials in the minority language to persons who are likely to need them or to residents of neighborhoods in which such a need is likely to exist, supplemented by a notice of the availability of minority language materials in the general mailing (in English and in the applicable minority language) and by other publicity regarding the availability of such materials may be sufficient.

(b) Public notices. The Attorney General will consider whether public notices and announcements of electoral activities are handled in a manner that provides members of the applicable language minority group an effective opportunity to be informed about electoral activities.

(c) Registration. The Attorney General will consider whether the registration system is conducted in such a way that members of the applicable language minority group have an effective opportunity to register. One method of accomplishing this is to provide, in the applicable minority language, all notices, forms and other materials provided to potential registrants and to have only bilingual persons as registrars. Effective results may also be obtained, for example, through the use of deputy registrars who are members of the applicable language minority group and the use of decentralized places of registration, with minority language materials available at places where persons who need them are most likely to come to register.

(d) Polling place activities. The Attorney General will consider whether polling place activities are conducted in such a way that members of the applicable language minority group have an effective opportunity to vote. One method of accomplishing this is to provide all notices, instructions, ballots, and other pertinent materials and oral assistance in the applicable minority language. If very few of the registered voters scheduled to vote at a particular polling place need minority language materials or assistance, the Attorney General will consider whether an alternative system enabling those few to cast effective ballots is available.

(e) Publicity. The Attorney General will consider whether a covered jurisdiction has taken appropriate steps to publicize the availability of materials and assistance in the minority language. Such steps may include the display of appropriate notices, in the minority language, at voter registration offices, polling places, etc., the making of announcements over minority language radio or television stations, the publication of notices in minority language newspapers, and direct contact with language minority group organizations.

§ 55.19 Written materials.

(a) Types of materials. It is the obligation of the jurisdiction to decide what materials must be provided in a minority language. A jurisdiction required to provide minority language materials is only required to publish in the language of the applicable language minority group materials distributed to or provided for the use of the electorate generally. Such materials include, for example, ballots, sample ballots, informational materials, and petitions.

(b) Accuracy, completeness. It is essential that material provided in the language of a language minority group be clear, complete and accurate. In examining whether a jurisdiction has achieved compliance with this requirement, the Attorney General will consider whether the jurisdiction has consulted with members of the applicable language minority group with respect to the translation of materials.

(c) Ballots. The Attorney General will consider whether a jurisdiction provides the English and minority language versions on the same document. Lack of such bilingual preparation of ballots may give rise to the possibility, or to the appearance, that the secrecy of the ballot will be lost if a separate minority language ballot or voting machine is used.

(d) Voting machines. Where voting machines that cannot mechanically accommodate a ballot in English and in the applicable minority language are used, the Attorney General will consider whether the jurisdiction provides sample ballots for use in the polling booths. Where such sample ballots are used the Attorney General will consider whether they contain a complete and accurate translation of the English ballots, and whether they contain or are accompanied by instructions in the minority language explaining the operation of the voting machine. The Attorney General will also consider whether the sample ballots are displayed so that they are clearly visible and at the same level as the machine ballot on the inside of the polling booth, whether the sample ballots are identical in layout to the machine ballots, and whether their size and typeface are the same as that appearing on the machine ballots. Where space limitations preclude affixing the translated sample ballots to the inside of polling booths, the Attorney General will consider whether language minority group voters are allowed to take the sample ballots into the voting booths.

§ 55.20 Oral assistance and publicity.

(a) General. Announcements, publicity, and assistance should be given in oral form to the extent needed to enable members of the applicable language minority group to participate effectively in the electoral process.

(b) Assistance. The Attorney General will consider whether a jurisdiction has given sufficient attention to the needs of language minority group members who cannot effectively read either English or the applicable minority language and to the needs of members of language minority groups whose languages are unwritten.

(c) Helpers. With respect to the conduct of elections, the jurisdiction will need to determine the number of helpers (i.e., persons to provide oral assistance in the minority language) that must be provided. In evaluating the provision of assistance, the Attorney General will consider such facts as the number of a precinct's registered voters who are members of the applicable language minority group, the number of such persons who are not proficient in English, and the ability of a voter to be assisted by a person of his own choice. The basic standard is one of effectiveness.

§ 55.21 Record keeping.

The Attorney General's implementation of the Act's provisions concerning language minority groups would be facilitated if each covered jurisdiction would maintain such records and data as will document its actions under those provisions, including, for example, records on such matters as alternatives considered prior to taking such actions, and the reasons for choosing the actions finally taken.

Subpart E—Preclearance

§ 55.22 Requirements of Section 5 of the Act.

For many jurisdictions, changes in voting laws and practices will be necessary in order to comply with Section 4(f)(4) or Section 203(c). If a jurisdiction is subject to the preclearance requirements of Section 5 (see § 55.5(b)), such changes must either be submitted to the Attorney General or be made the subject of a declaratory judgment action in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia. Procedures for the administration of Section 5 are set forth in Part 51 of this Chapter.

§ 55.23 Enforcement by the Attorney General.

(a) The Attorney General is authorized to bring civil actions for appropriate relief against violations of the Act's provisions, including Section 4 and Section 203. See Sections 12(d) and 204.

(b) Also, certain violations may be subject to criminal sanctions. See Sections 11(a)–(c) and 205.

Subpart G—Comment on This Part

§ 55.24 Procedure.

These guidelines may be modified from time to time on the basis of experience under the Act and comments received from interested parties. The Attorney General therefore invites public comments and suggestions on these guidelines. Any party who wishes to make such suggestions or comments may do so by sending them to: Assistant Attorney General, Civil Rights Division, Department of Justice, Washington, D.C. 20530.

Dear Mr. Thagard:

This is in reference to the change in the method of election for members of the Barbour County Commission from six single-member districts and one county-wide district to election from seven single-member districts and to the redistricting plan for those seven districts for Barbour County, Alabama, submitted to the Attorney General pursuant to Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act of 1965, as amended, 42 U.S.C. 1973c. Your submission was received on May 27, 1981.

The Attorney General does not interpose any objection to the change to a plan that provides that all seven members of the County Commission be elected from single-member districts. However, we feel a responsibility to point out that Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act expressly provides that the failure of the Attorney General to object does not bar any subsequent judicial action to enjoin the enforcement of such change.

With regard to the redistricting plan, we have given careful consideration to the information you have provided as well as to that available from the Bureau of the Census and from other interested parties. Our analysis shows that most districts are not compact, do not follow natural and recognizable boundaries in many instances and, with respect to Districts 1 and 4, are noncontiguous. In addition, District 3 merges the 83.5 percent black Springhill/Comer area with a 72 percent white portion of the City of Eufaula resulting in a district which appears to have a majority white voting age population.

Our analysis also reveals that the county's submitted plan divides the predominantly black population concentrations in the northern and western portions of the county among three districts (Districts 3, 5, and 6) and the areas of black population concentration within the City of Eufaula among three districts (Districts 1, 2 and 4). This fragmentation of black population concentrations results in a plan that contains no district in which a majority of the voters are black, even though the County is 44 percent black, according to the 1980 Census. Specifically, although the plan provides for districts with nominal black population majorities of 55.7, 55.8 and 57.6 percent (Districts 1, 3 and 6), the County has not provided any information regarding voting age population. Unless the ratio of black to white voting age population has radically changed since 1970, two of the above districts have a white majority voting age population and the third is only slightly over 50 percent black. Even in that district, whites constitute a majority of registered voters. In addition, apparent racial bloc voting and the majority vote requirement further impinge on black voting strength.

Since the prior plan is unconstitutionally malapportioned, Porto v. Barbour County Commission, Civil Action No. 79-537-N (M. D. Ala., Dec. 17, 1979), our standard of comparison under Beer v. United States, 374 F. Supp. 363, rev'd, 425 U.S. 130 (1976), is "options for properly apportioned single-member district plans." Wilkes County v. United States, 450 F. Supp. 1171, 1178, Conclusion 10 (D. D.C. 1978), aff'd, 439 U.S. 999 (1978). In this regard, our analysis reveals that readily apparent alternatives would provide at least two viable majority black districts, one in the northwestern portion of the county and one in the City of Eufaula, with black populations of well over 60 percent each. Such districts would be natural, compact and contiguous, would satisfy the Fourteenth Amendment requirement of one person, one vote and most likely such a plan could include a third district of nearly a 60 percent black population. The county has not provided any information to show that its choice of the submitted redistricting plan, in preference to the available alternatives, does not have the purpose or effect of discriminating against black voters.

In addition, there is evidence pertinent to the question of an impermissible racial purpose. Barbour County has a long history of failing to comply with the preclearance provisions of the Voting Rights Act. This submission itself is the result of court action stemming from such a failure. While the white community was consulted regarding this plan, it is our understanding that leaders of the black community were not consulted concerning the placement of the new district lines, and the County has provided no evidence of any systematic effort to involve blacks in its deliberations. As noted above, racially polarized voting appears to exist in Barbour County, the proposed districts are not natural, compact or contiguous and the electoral scheme would maintain black voting strength at a minimum level, although readily available alternatives would provide a fair chance for meaningful minority participation. These facts all bear on the question of an impermissible racial purpose in the adoption of the plan. See Wilkes County v. United States, supra.

Under Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act, the submitting authority has the burden of proving that a submitted change has no discriminatory purpose or effect. See, e.g., Georgia v. United States, 411 U.S. 526 (1973); see also Section 51.39(e) of the Procedures for the Administration of Section 5 (46 Fed. Reg. 878). In light of the considerations discussed above, I cannot conclude, as I must under the Voting Rights Act, that that burden has been sustained in this instance. Therefore, on behalf of the Attorney General, I must object to the redistricting plan for election of the Barbour County Commissioners.

Of course, as provided by Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act, you have the right to seek a declaratory judgment from the United States District Court for the District of Columbia that this change has neither the purpose nor will have the effect of denying or abridging the right to vote on account of race, color or membership in a language minority group. In addition, the Procedures for the Administration of Section 5 (Section 51.44, 46 Fed. Reg. 878) permit you to request the Attorney General to reconsider the objection. However, until the objection is withdrawn or the judgment from the District of Columbia Court is obtained, the effect of the objection by the Attorney General is to make the redistricting plan legally unenforceable.

To enable this Department to meet its responsibility to enforce the Voting Rights Act, please inform us within twenty days of your receipt of this letter what course of action Barbour County plans to take with respect to this matter. If you have any questions concerning this letter, please feel free to call Carl W. Gabel (202-724-7439), Director of the Section 5 Unit of the Voting Section.

We are sending a copy of this letter to the Honorable Robert E. Varner, Judge, United States District Court, Middle District of Alabama.

Sincerely,

James P. Turner

T. W. Thagard, Jr., Esq.
Smith, Bowman, Thagard,

Dear Mr. Thagard:

This is in reference to the redistricting plan for the seven single-member districts for members of the Barbour County Commission of Barbour County, Alabama, submitted to the Attorney General pursuant to Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act of 1965, as amended, 42 U.S.C. 1973c. Your submission was received on September 16, 1981.

At the outset we note that on July 21, 1981, an objection was interposed on behalf of the Attorney General to the plan previously submitted. We found that the districts in that plan were "not compact, do not follow natural and recognizable boundaries . . . and . . . are noncontiguous." We further found that the plan evidenced dilution of black voting strength in Barbour County by drawing new district lines in such a way as to cause needless fragmentation of black population concentrations. In the context of Barbour County, including as it does racial bloc voting, a majority vote requirement, and a substantially lower voting age population and voter registration rate among blacks than among whites, we were unable to conclude that black voting strength had been maintained at a level that would have allowed blacks to participate fully and fairly in the electoral process. Accordingly, we advised the county that it had failed to sustain its burden under the Voting Rights Act and an objection was interposed.

As noted in our July 21 letter of objection, since the pre-existing plan was found to be unconstitutionally malapportioned, Forte v. Barbour County Commission, Civil Action No. 79-537-N (M.D. Ala., Dec. 17, 1979), the proper standard of comparison under Beer v. United States, 425 U. S. 130 (1976), is to compare the submitted plan with "options for properly apportioned single-member district plans." Wilkes County v. United States, 450 F. Supp. 1171, 1178, Conclusion 19 (D. D.C. 1978), aff'd, 439 U.S. 999 (1978). Such a comparison necessarily must take into account the existence of racially polarized voting in Barbour County. Also important to our analysis is the wide discrepancy in voting age population between blacks and whites in Barbour County. Weighing in the balance these and other considerations we must in the end determine whether your submitted plan was designed "to minimize . . . the voting strength of racial . . . elements of the voting population." Fortson v. Dorsey, 379 U.S. 433, 439.

With this background in mind we have given careful consideration to the information you have supplied as well as that available from our files, the Bureau of the Census and other interested parties. Our analysis shows that even though the districts in the new proposal appear to be contiguous, some continue to be drawn in a manner designed to fragment black population concentrations. This is particularly the case in the City of Eufaula where the boundaries of District 3 are drawn in a convoluted and distorted fashion that "carves out" of the district three virtually all-black areas while drawing into the district elsewhere two all-white areas. The information that you have supplied does not indicate any governmental interest served by this configuration and we have received no explanation to suggest a reason other than to minimize black voting strength in District 3 over what one would naturally expect had a more evenly drawn, unfragmented plan been adopted.

In addition, with respect to the boundary line between Districts 1 and 2, predominantly black voting Precinct 10, which has the second highest percentage of black registered voters in the county, seems to be split unnecessarily between Districts 1 and 2. This fragmentation also results in what seems to be an unnecessary splitting of a Census Enumeration District and the attending unreliability of statistics that such splitting engenders. In fact, our analysis shows that the unreliability of the data resulting from the split in this instance may be exacerbated by the methodology used, which assumed equal distribution of population by race throughout the ED and which made no distinction in the number of persons per household whether white or black. Census experience has shown that these are not realistic assumptions.

Under Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act the submitting authority has the burden of proving that a submitted change has no discriminatory purpose or effect. See, e.g., Georgia v. United States, 411 U.S. 526 (1973); see also Section 51.39(e) of the Procedures for the Administration of Section 5 (46 Fed. Reg. 878). In light of the considerations discussed above, I cannot conclude, as I must under the Voting Rights Act, that the county has carried its burden of showing that the plan here under submission is free of any purpose to abridge the right to vote on account of race or color. Accordingly, on behalf of the Attorney General, I must interpose an objection to the redistricting plan contained in the instant submission.

Of course, as provided by Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act, you have the right to seek a declaratory judgment from the United States District Court for the District of Columbia that this change has neither the purpose nor will have the effect of denying or abridging the right to vote on account of race, color or membership in a language minority group. In addition, the Procedures for the Administration of Section 5 (Section 51.44, Fed. Reg. 878) permit you to request the Attorney General to reconsider the objection. However, until the objection is withdrawn or a judgment from the District of Columbia Court obtained, the effect of the objection by the Attorney General is to make the redistricting plan for Barbour County legally unenforceable.

Since this matter is related to the litigation pending in the federal district court, I am taking the liberty of forwarding a copy of this letter to Judge Varner. If you have any questions concerning this letter, please feel free to call Carl W. Gabel (202-724-7439), Director of the Section 5 Unit of the Voting Section.

Sincerely,

Dear Mr. Palomino:

This is in reference to your submission to the Attorney General, pursuant to Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act of 1965, 42 U.S.C. §1973c, of Local Law 47 (1981) of the City of New York providing for the increase in the number of single-member councilmanic districts, and the redistricting of the 35 single-member districts and related election district changes occasioned by the local law. Additional information was received on September 21, 1981. Since that date, the city has supplemented the submission with further information. The submission was completed on the date of the receipt of the last supplement on October 19, 1981.

We have given careful consideration to the materials which the city has submitted as well as information and comments from interested parties and information contained in other Section 5 submissions made by the city. The Attorney General does not interpose an objection to the increase in the number of members of the city council elected from single-member districts. However, on the basis of our review of the city's submission, available demographic data and comments received concerning this submission, we are unable to conclude that the city has satisfied its burden of proving that the submitted plan, as drawn, has neither the purpose nor the effect of denying or abridging the right to vote on account of race, color or membership in a language minority group.

Consequently, the Attorney General does interpose an objection to the councilmanic redistricting plan involving Bronx, Kings and New York Counties. Furthermore, because the proposed changes in the election districts are dependent on the objectionable councilmanic district changes, the Attorney General must also interpose an objection to the changes in election districts.

As you know, under Section 5, the city bears the burden of proving the absence of both discriminatory purpose and effect in the proposed councilmanic redistricting plan. City of Rome v. United States, 446 U.S. 156, 183 n.18 (1980); Beer v. United States, 425 U.S. 130, 140-41 (1976). In order to prove the absence of a racially discriminatory effect, the City of New York must demonstrate, at a minimum, that the proposed councilmanic redistricting plan would not lead to a retrogression in the position of racial minorities with respect to the effective exercise of their electoral franchise. Beer v. United States, supra, 425 U.S. at 140-41. While the city is under no obligation to maximize minority voting strength, the District Court for the District of Columbia has required that the city demonstrate that the plan "fairly reflects the strength of [minority] voting power as it exists." Mississippi v. United States, 490 F. Supp. 569, 581 (D.D.C. 1979), citing Beer v. United States, supra, 425 U.S. at 139 n.11 and 141; and City of Richmond v. United States, 422 U.S. 358, 362 (1975).

In studying the issue of retrogression, we have compared the projected impact of the proposed plan with the expected election results if the city were to continue to conduct elections under the 1977 plan. While we recognize that the city disagrees with our use of 1980 Census data to conduct this analysis, we are obligated to conduct the analysis "from the perspective of the most current available population data," City of Rome v. United States, supra, 446 U.S. at 186, and the 1980 Census data provides the most reliable basis for measuring the projected results of implementation of the new plan as compared with continued use of the 1977 plan. Also, because the existing councilmanic districts are severely malapportioned in light of the dramatic population shifts which have occurred in the last decade, we have studied possible alternative reapportionment plans faithful to nonracial criteria established by the city (i.e., compact, contiguous districts; efforts to avoid interborough districts; efforts to maintain existing boundaries to the extent possible). Cf. Wilkes County v. United States, 450 F. Supp. 1171, 1178 (D.D.C. 1978), aff'd, 439 U.S. 999 (1978); Donnell v. United States, C.A. No. 78-0392 (D.D.C., July 31, 1979), aff'd, 444 U.S. 1059 (1980).

Our analysis, under both methods, has resulted in a conclusion that the proposed plan will lead to a retrogression in the position of racial minorities with respect to their effective exercise of the electoral franchise and that the plan does not fairly reflect minority voting strength as it currently exists. As explained below, the retrogression found to exist in each covered county results primarily from the city's departure from its own nonracial plan-drawing criteria. Since no nonracial justification has been offered for these departures, and in light of the obvious effect, we are also unable to conclude that the city has satisfied its burden of demonstrating that the plan was drawn without a racially discriminatory purpose. Donnell v. United States, supra, slip op. at 10; Mississippi v. United States, supra, 490 F. Supp. at 581-82.

Our analysis of relevant demographic data and election returns has revealed significant minority concentrations in the three covered counties and the existence of a clear pattern of racial bloc voting. These findings do not support the city's assertions that the minority population is so widely dispersed as to preclude the creation of additional minority districts under a fairly drawn plan and that racial bloc voting is not apparent in elections in the city. Our analysis of the plan as it affects each covered county follows.

The single-member districts in the northern portion of New York County do not appear to be drawn in accordance with the city's stated objectives. For example, District 6 is unusually shaped, is six miles long and, for almost half its length, it measures only three blocks wide. Also, the plan for New York County proposes a second interborough district between Bronx County and New York County, when the population characteristics of New York County would allow seven districts wholly within Manhattan. While these deviations from the city's stated plan-drawing criteria do not, by themselves, constitute a violation of the Section 5 standard, each deviation has resulted in a fragmentation of minority residential areas and a corresponding dilution of minority voting strength. Thus, if District 6 would have been drawn compactly to include the northern portion of Manhattan, it seems likely that that district would be 65% minority or more. Similarly, if interborough districts between Bronx and New York Counties were not used, the likely result would be increased minority voting strength in both counties. In sum, our analysis indicates that if the city's stated objectives were utilized in Manhattan, seven districts wholly within Manhattan could be drawn and three of those districts would be 65% minority or greater.

With respect to Bronx County, a significant minority population concentration in the Morris Heights-Fordham section of the county is divided among four of the six councilmanic districts, thus minimizing minority voting strength by frustrating the creation of an additional district in which minority voters would have a fair opportunity to elect a candidate of their choice. We note that District 13, one of the fragmenting districts, is not compact but rather is drawn in a convoluted manner, and the unusual shape of the district contributes to the fragmentation of minority voting strength. We have not been presented with any compelling justification for such fragmentation of a substantial minority population concentration, and our analysis reveals none. Moreover, it appears that other rational and compact redistricting alternatives are available to achieve population equality without such a prohibited discriminatory impact. Also, as mentioned above, the elimination of interborough districts between New York and Bronx Counties would not only further the city's stated objectives but would also help avoid the dilution of minority voting strength.

In Kings County, we have noted a similar departure from nonracial plan-drawing criteria, which departure has resulted in a fragmentation and dilution of minority voting strength. District 24, rather than being compact, is approximately five miles long (north-south) and, in places, less than one-half mile wide. Our analysis, as well as information we have received, indicates that the configuration of this district results from efforts to maintain neighboring District 25 as a district which would be controlled by white voters. If compact districts were utilized in this area of the county (e.g., districts which run on an east-west axis as District 25 previously ran) it appears likely that the minority community in Kings County would have a reasonable opportunity to elect candidates of its choice in at least four districts; as a result of the city's departure from its nonracial plan-drawing criteria, the minority community in Kings County has a reasonable opportunity of electing candidates of its choice in only three districts. Additionally, if the unnecessary fragmentation of other minority population concentrations (e.g., East New York) could be avoided, the end result might be that minority voters would have a realistic opportunity to elect candidates of their choice in five districts.

Under these circumstances, I am unable to conclude, as I must under the Voting Rights Act, that the presently proposed councilmanic district lines for Bronx, Kings and New York Counties were drawn without any discriminatory racial purpose or effect. Accordingly, I must, on behalf of the Attorney General, interpose an objection to Local Law 47 (1981) of the City of New York insofar as Bronx, Kings and New York Counties are concerned.

Of course, as provided by Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act of 1965, you have the right to seek a declaratory judgment from the United States District Court for the District of Columbia that these changes have neither the purpose nor the effect of denying or abridging the right to vote on account of race, color or membership in a language minority group. In addition, the Procedures for the Administration of Section 5 (Section 51.44, 46 Fed. Reg. 878) permit you to request the Attorney General to reconsider the objection. However, until the objection is withdrawn or a judgment from the District Court for the District of Columbia is obtained, the effect of the objection by the Attorney General is to make the reapportionment of the New York City Council legally unenforceable with respect to Bronx, Kings and New York Counties.

To enable this Department to meet its responsibility to enforce the Voting Rights Act, please inform us within twenty days of your receipt of this letter of the course of action the City of New York plans to take with respect to this matter. If you have any questions concerning this letter, please feel free to call Carl W. Gabel (202-724-7439), Director of the Section 5 Unit of the Voting Section. Because this decision pertains to the issues raised in Horron v. Koch, No. 81 Civ. 1956 (E.D.N.Y.); Andrews v. Koch, No. 81 Civ. 2542 (E.D.N.Y.); and Gerena-Valentin v. Koch, No. 81 Civ. 5468 (S.D.N.Y.), I am taking the liberty of sending a copy of this letter to the members of the three-judge district court. Moreover, in light of requests which we have received for a copy of the decision in this matter, we are making copies of the letter available on request.

Mr. Alex K. Brock
Executive Secretary-Director
State Board of Elections
Suite 801 Raleigh Building
5 West Hargett Street
Raleigh, North Carolina 27601

Dear Mr. Brock:

This is in reference to Chapter 894 (S.B. No. 87, 1981) and Chapter 821 (S.B. No. 313, 1981), providing for the reapportionment of United States Congressional districts and for the reapportionment of the North Carolina Senate. Your submission, pursuant to Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act, 42 U.S.C. 1973c, was initially received on July 16, 1981, and was supplemented with requested additional information on October 6, 1981.

Under Section 5, the State bears the burden of proving the absence of both discriminatory purpose and effect in proposed redistricting plans. City of Rome v. United States, 446 U.S. 156, 183 n.18 (1980); Beer v. United States, 425 U.S. 130, 140-41 (1976). In order to show the absence of a racially discriminatory effect, the State of North Carolina must demonstrate, at a minimum, that the proposed redistricting plans will not lead to "a retrogression in the position of racial minorities with respect to their effective exercise of the electoral franchise." Beer v. United States, supra, 425 U.S. at 141. While the State is under no obligation to maximize minority voting strength, the State must demonstrate that the plan "fairly reflects the strength of [minority] voting power as it exists." Mississippi v. United States, 490 F. Supp. 569, 581 (D.D.C. 1979), citing Beer v. United States, supra, 425 U.S. at 139 n.11 and 141; and City of Richmond v. United States, 422 U.S. 358, 362 (1975).

We have given careful consideration to all of the forwarded materials, as well as past legislative reapportionment plans, comments from interested citizens, and other information available to us. With regard to the Senate plan, we note at the outset that the proposed redistricting plan was developed by the North Carolina Legislature pursuant to a 1968 amendment to the North Carolina Constitution which provides that no county shall be divided in the formation of a Senate or Representative district. As you know, on November 30, 1981, the Attorney General interposed an objection to that amendment under Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act of 1965, 42 U.S.C. 1973c, because "[o]ur analysis show[ed] that the prohibition against dividing the 40 covered counties in the formation of Senate and House districts predictably requires, and has led to the use of, large multi-member districts." Our review of the 1968 amendment also showed "that the use of such multi-member districts necessarily submerges cognizable minority population concentrations into large white electorates." Accordingly, we have reviewed the Senate plan not only to determine whether the proposed plan would lead to a "retrogression in the position of racial minorities with respect to their effective exercise of the electoral franchise," Beer, supra 425 U.S. at 141, but also to see whether it fairly reflects minority voting strength as it exists today. State of Mississippi v. United States, 490 F. Supp. 569 (D.D.C. 1979).

Our analysis of the Senate plan shows that in several counties covered by the Voting Rights Act's special provisions, such as in Guilford, Wilson, Nash, Bertie, Edgecomb and Martin, there are cognizable concentrations of minority persons whose political strength is diluted as a result of the use of multi-member districts in the proposed redistricting plan. In Guilford, for example, the State has proposed the creation of a three-member district with a black population percentage of only 25 percent. Yet, under a fairly-drawn system of single-member districts in that area, one such district likely would be majority black and, therefore, would better recognize the potential of blacks to elect representation of their choice.

Likewise, in Wilson, Nash, Edgecomb, Martin and several of the counties in proposed District 1 which are covered jurisdictions, the State proposes to create multi-member districts in which black voters seem to have no opportunity to elect candidates of their choice. Here again, fairly-drawn single-member districts would likely result in Senate districts that would not, as the proposed Senate plan does, minimize the voting potential of black voters in those covered counties.

Understandably, these effects of the proposed Senate reapportionment plan well may have been the result of the State's adherence to the 1968 constitutional amendment which, as we have already found, necessarily requires a submerging of sizeable black communities into large multi-member districts. In view of the concerns discussed above, however, I am unable to conclude, as I must under the Voting Rights Act, that the proposed Senate redistricting plan is free of a racially discriminatory purpose or effect. Accordingly, on behalf of the Attorney General, I must interpose an objection to the Senate plan under Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act of 1965 as it relates to the covered counties.

With respect to the Congressional redistricting, we have also completed review of that submission. During the course of our review, we were presented with allegations that the decision to exclude Durham County from Congressional District No. 2 had the effect of minimizing minority voting strength and in addition was motivated by racial considerations, i.e., the desire to preclude from that district the voting influence of the politically-active black community in Durham. On the basis of the information that has been made available to us, we remain unable to conclude that the State's decision to draw District No. 2 was wholly free from discriminatory purpose and effect. In this connection we find particularly troublesome the "strangely irregular" shape of Congressional District No. 2 (see Gomillion v. Lightfoot, 364 U.S. 339, 341 (1960)), which appears designed to exclude Durham County from that district contrary to the House Congressional Redistricting Committee's recommendation.

We note also that, over the past several redistrictings, the black population percentage in District 2 has been decreased. Prior to the State's 1971 redistricting District No. 2 was approximately 43 percent black. Under the 1971 reapportionment plan, District 2 decreased to 40.2 percent black population. The 1981 submitted plan would reduce further the black population in the district to 36.7 percent. This reduction in black population percentage, occurring despite a statewide increase in the black population, is especially crucial in District 2, because it occurs in the only district where black voters could have the potential for electing a candidate of their choice.

We recognize that the State may want to respond further to the claims that a racially discriminatory purpose and effect were involved in the Legislature's decision to circumvent Durham. However, because of the time constraints imposed on the Attorney General by Section 5, and the unanswered questions still remaining, I cannot conclude that the burden imposed on the State by Section 5 has been sustained. Accordingly, I must interpose an objection also to the Congressional redistricting insofar as it affects the covered counties. However, should the state desire to present to us information relating to the configuration of District 2 which would address the allegations mentioned above, we stand ready to reconsider this determination as provided in the Section 5 guidelines.

Of course, as provided by Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act, you have the right to seek a declaratory judgment from the United States District Court for the District of Columbia that the Congressional redistricting plan has neither the purpose nor will have the effect of denying or abridging the right to vote on account of race, color or membership in a language minority group. However, until the objection is withdrawn or the judgment from the District of Columbia Court is obtained, the effect of the objection by the Attorney General is to make the Congressional redistricting plan legally unenforceable in the covered counties.

If you have any questions concerning this matter, please feel free to call Carl W. Gabel (202/724-7439), Director of the Section 5 Unit of the Voting Section. As always, we stand ready to assist you in any way possible in your reapportionment effort.

Honorable Daniel R. McLeod
Attorney General
Wade Hampton Office Building
Post Office Box 11549
Columbia, South Carolina 29211

Dear Mr. McLeod:

This is in reference to Act No. R249 (1981), providing for the reapportionment of the South Carolina House of Representatives. Your submission, pursuant to Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act, 42 U.S.C. 1973c, was received on September 19, 1981, and supplemented thereafter with additional materials forwarded to us by Mr. Robert J. Sheheen, Chairman of the House Judiciary Committee.

We have given careful consideration to all of the forwarded materials, as well as other information available to us. The submitted reapportionment includes 124 single-member districts, the overwhelming majority of which are unobjectionable. We are, however, unable at this time to preclear the reapportionment plan since there are a limited number of districts which fail to satisfy the requirement under the Act that they be drawn in a manner that does not have a discriminatory effect.

Under Section 5, the State bears the burden of proving the absence of both discriminatory purpose and effect in the proposed House redistricting plan. City of Rome v. United States, 446 U.S. 156, 183 n.18 (1980); Beer v. United States, 425 U.S. 130, 140-41 (1976). In order to prove the absence of a racially discriminatory effect, the State of South Carolina must demonstrate, at a minimum, that the proposed House redistricting plan will not lead to "a retrogression in the position of racial minorities with respect to their effective exercise of the electoral franchise." Beer v. United States, supra, 425 U.S. at 141. While the State is under no obligation to maximize minority voting strength, the State must demonstrate that the plan "fairly reflects the strength of [minority] voting power as it exists." Mississippi v. United States, 490 F. Supp. 569, 581 (D.D.C. 1979), citing Beer v. United States, supra, 425 U.S. at 139 n.11 and 141; and City of Richmond v. United States, 422 U.S. 358, 362 (1975).

On the basis of our review of the proposed reapportionment plan we find certain districts drawn in a manner that "would lead to a retrogression in the position of racial minorities with respect to their effective exercise of the electoral franchise." Beer v. United States, supra, 425 U.S. at 141. In this regard, we have carefully analyzed the submitted plan in comparison to the prior reapportionment plan as drawn in 1974. In examining the "old" plan, we have, as the law requires, viewed the districts "from the perspective of the most current available population data," City of Rome v. United States, supra, 446 U.S. at 186 (i.e., the 1980 census data). On that basis, we have found noticeable dilution or fragmentation of the minority vote in Florence County (Proposed District Nos. 59, 62, 63), Richland County (Proposed District Nos. 70, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 79), Lee County (Proposed District Nos. 50, 65, 66), Allendale-Bamberg-Barnwell Counties (Proposed District Nos. 90, 91), and Jasper-Beaufort Counties (Proposed District No. 122).

We are aware that alternate proposals were presented which would have avoided the fragmentation and dilution of minority voting strength in each of the referenced areas, and we have received complaints alleging that such alternate proposals were rejected for racially discriminatory reasons. Our own review has revealed that reasonably available alternative plans for each of these districts could be drawn which would avoid the fragmentation and dilution of minority voting strength and the State's submission offers no satisfactory explanation for, or governmental interest in, the rejection of such alternatives. In these circumstances, and in light of the existing patterns of racial bloc voting in South Carolina and the current underrepresentation of blacks in the South Carolina House of Representatives, we are unable to conclude that the State has met its burden of proving that the plan, at least as it affects the referenced areas, meets the requirements of the Act.

Since I am unable to conclude that Act No. R249 (1981) providing for the reapportionment of the South Carolina House of Representatives was enacted by the Legislature without a racially discriminatory purpose or effect, I must, on behalf of the Attorney General, interpose an objection to Act No. R249 pursuant to Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act of 1965.

Of course, as provided by Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act, you may seek a declaratory judgment from the United States District Court for the District of Columbia that the House reapportionment plan does not have the purpose and will not have the effect of denying or abridging the right to vote on account of race or color. In addition, the Procedures for the Administration of Section 5 (Sec. 51.44, 46 Fed. Reg. 878) permit you to request the Attorney General to reconsider the objection. Until the objection is withdrawn or unless a declaratory judgment from the District Court for the District of Columbia is obtained, the effect of the Attorney General's objection is to render the reapportionment of the South Carolina House of Representatives legally unenforceable.

If you have any questions concerning this letter, please feel free to call Carl W. Gabel (202-724-7439) Director of the Section 5 Unit in our Voting Section. You can be assured that we are prepared to assist you in any way possible in connection with your reapportionment efforts.

Perkins Wilson, Esq.
Assistant Attorney General
Supreme Court Building

Richmond, Virginia 23219

Dear Mr. Wilson:

This is in reference to the reapportionment of the Virginia Senate by Chapter 2, 1981 Acts of the General Assembly (Special Session), submitted to the Attorney General pursuant to Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act of 1965, as amended. Your submission was received on May 19, 1981.

We have given careful consideration to the materials you have submitted, as well as information and comments of other interested parties and information contained in other Department files. On the basis of our review, the Attorney General does not interpose any objection to the Senate reapportionment except with respect to the districts discussed below.

At the outset, we note that on May 7, 1971, the Attorney General found it necessary to interpose an objection to the division line between Senate districts 5 and 6 in the City of Norfolk. At that time the Department concluded that "[t]he division of Senate districts 5 and 6, which divides concentrations of Negro voters, appears contorted and does not conform to natural boundaries", while more natural boundaries appeared feasible, which would have avoided such an adverse effect on the black voting strength. As a result of that objection the 1971 legislation was amended to relocate the boundary between districts 5 and 6 in such a way as to eliminate substantially the bifurcation of black concentrations in the city. As so modified, the plan was precleared on August 13, 1971.

The precleared plan was not implemented because of the lack of accurate data regarding the residence of Naval personnel. Instead, the federal court ordered an interim plan combining districts 5, 6, and 7 into one multi-member district. That plan was to stay in effect until the General Assembly enacted a single-member district plan consistent with legal requirements. See Muhon v. Howell, 410 U.S. 315 (1973).

Our current analysis shows that one of the most striking elements of the plan presently under submission is the similarity of its characteristics to those of the plan objected to in 1971 insofar as districts 5 and 6 are concerned. Our inquiry has revealed that the boundary between districts 5 and 6 in the 1981 plan cuts through the black community in such a way that neither district has more than a 37-percent black population. At the same time, our analysis shows that the Senate rejected an alternative configuration which would have combined contiguous black neighborhoods, producing a district in which black persons would have constituted a majority. There is substantial information that this choice of district lines was made with the full awareness and expectation that it would fragment the black electorate and create two majority white districts.

In its consideration of the current plan, the Virginia Senate was aware that in 1971 the Attorney General had found it necessary to interpose an objection to the then proposed configuration of districts 5 and 6 because those lines appeared unnecessarily to fragment concentrations of black voters, and that that objection had been overcome by the reconstruction of those districts in a way which did not divide the black concentration in the southern part of the city. The Commonwealth has presented no plausible non-racial justification for its choice of district lines in Norfolk, strikingly similar to the unacceptable 1971 plan.

Under these circumstances I am unable to conclude, as I must under the Voting Rights Act, that the presently proposed district lines within Norfolk were drawn without any discriminatory racial purpose or effect. Accordingly, I must, on behalf of the Attorney General, interpose an objection to Chapter 2, 1981 Acts of the Virginia General Assembly (Special Session) insofar as districts 5 and 6 of the plan are concerned.

Of course, as provided by Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act, you have the right to seek a declaratory judgment from the United States District Court for the District of Columbia that this change has neither the purpose nor the effect of denying or abridging the right to vote on account of race, color or membership in a language minority group. In addition, the Procedures for the Administration of Section 5 (Section 51.44, 46 Fed. Reg. 878) permit you to request the Attorney General to reconsider the objection. However, until the objection is withdrawn or the judgment from the District of Columbia Court is obtained, the effect of the objection by the Attorney General is to make the reapportionment of the Virginia Senate legally unenforceable with respect to the districts in question.

To enable this Department to meet its responsibility to enforce the Voting Rights Act, please inform us within twenty days of your receipt of this letter of the course of action the State of Virginia plans to take with respect to this matter. If you have any questions concerning this letter, please feel free to call Carl W. Gabel (202-724-7439), Director of the Section 5 Unit of the Voting Section.

Dear Mr. Wilson:

This is in reference to the reapportionment of the Virginia House of Delegates by Chapter 5, 1981 Acts of the General Assembly (Special Session), submitted to the Attorney General pursuant to Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act of 1965, as amended. Your submission was completed on July 2, 1981. In accordance with your request, this submission has been reviewed on an expedited basis.

Under Section 5, the Commonwealth of Virginia has the burden of proving that its proposed reapportionment does not represent a retrogression in the position of its black residents, and that the new plan was adopted without any racially discriminatory purpose. See Beer v. United States, 425 U.S. 130 (1976). We have carefully reviewed the material you submitted and for the most part find the proposed reapportionment plan to have neither the purpose nor effect of diluting or abridging the voting rights of black citizens.

However, there is one general area where the proposed plan appears to dilute and fragment black voting strength unnecessarily. According to the 1980 census the southern part of the Commonwealth contains five contiguous rural counties with black population majorities (Brunswick, Greensville, Sussex, Surry and Charles City). The nearby City of Petersburg also has a majority black population of 61.09%. Under the pre-existing apportionment plan four of the five black majority counties were grouped together with New Kent County to make up District 45, which by 1980 census figures was 53.09% black. In the proposed plan each of the five majority black counties is combined with one or more predominently white counties in such a way that there is a black minority in each of the resulting districts (Nos. 26, 27, 35, 41 and 46). We note that one of the resulting districts (No. 27), which combines Nottaway, Dinwiddie and Greensville Counties and Emporia City, connected only by a two mile stretch of the Nottaway River, does not seem to comply with the Commonwealth's standard of compactness.

Testimony prepared for the pending lawsuits indicate that the legislature was aware that dispersing the majority black counties that were in former district 45 would necessarily dilute the voting strength of blacks in this area.

Similarly, the City of Peterburg is combined in the plan with the virtually all white city of Colonial Heights resulting in a district (No. 28) which is 43.66% black. This district was formed notwithstanding the fact that Colonial Heights had historically been associated with Chesterfield County and, in fact, had been combined under the 1971 plan with Chesterfield to form District No. 36 which, with a population of 157,881, could have been continued as a viable three-member district in the new plan. This latter approach was supported by representatives of the Colonial Heights city government. Material submitted to us indicates there are a number of options available that would not have the effect of diluting the voting strength of the black citizens of Petersburg.

Accordingly, after careful consideration of the materials you have submitted, as well as comments and information provided by other interested parties, I am unable to conclude, as I must under the Voting Rights Act, that the submitted plan for the reapportionment of the House of Delegates is free of any racially discriminatory purpose or effect in the described area. For that reason, I must, on behalf of the Attorney General, interpose an objection to Chapter 5 of the 1981 Acts of the General Assembly of Virginia (Special Session) as it affects the district lines in the SouthsidePetersburg area.

Of course, as provided by Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act, you have the right to seek a declaratory judgment from the United States District Court for the District of Columbia that this change has neither the purpose nor the effect of denying or abridging the right to vote on account of race, color or membership in a language minority group. In addition, the Procedures for the Administration of Section 5 (Section 51.44, 46 Fed. Reg. 878) permit you to request the Attorney General to reconsider the objection. However, until the objection is withdrawn or the judgment from the District of Columbia Court is obtained, the effect of the objection by the Attorney General is to make the reapportionment of the Virginia House of Delegates legally unenforceable with respect to the districts in question.

We are aware that there is a severe time problem if the Commonwealth is to hold timely elections for the General Assembly. Please be assured that we stand ready to do all we can to assure that any future review of such limited changes as may be necessary to comply with the requirements of Section 5 is accomplished in the most expeditious way possible. If you have any questions concerning this letter, please feel free to call Carl W. Gabel (202-724-7439), Director of the Section 5 Unit of the Voting Section.

Sincerely,

Wm. Bradford Reynolds
Assistant Attorney General
Civil Rights Division

U. S. Department of Justice
Office of Legislative Affairs

Office of the Assistant Attorney General

25 FEB 1982

Honorable Orrin G. Hatch
Chairman
Subcommittee on the Constitution
Committee on the Judiciary
United States Senate
Washington, D.C. 20510

Dear Mr. Chairman:

This is in further response to your letter of December 2, 1981, concerning enforcement of the Voting Rights Act and analysis of H.R. 3112, the House-passed bill to amend the Act. My January 8, 1982 letter replied to some of your questions. This letter completes our response.

> 5. Describe in detail the Department's policy on annexations: What percentage reduction of minority voting strength is deemed to constitute a denial or abridgement of their right to vote? Under what circumstances will the Department require a municipality to change its form of government as a condition of approval? What provisions of the Act or passages in its legislative history justify these policies? What decisions of the Supreme Court justify these policies? What positions did the Department advocate in those cases?

a. The Department's policies concerning annexations are based on Section 5, which applies to "any voting qualification or prerequisite to voting, or standard, practice, or procedure with respect to voting" different from that in effect on the date used to determine coverage under Section 4(b), e.g., November 1, 1964. To obtain preclearance, either from the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia or from the Attorney General, a jurisdiction must show that the proposed change "does not have the purpose and will not have the effect of denying or abridging the right to vote on account of race or color, or * * * [membership in a language minority group]."

In Allen v. State Board of Elections, 393 U.S. 544, 565-569 (1969), the Supreme Court held that Section 5 applied to a change from district to at-large voting. 1/ The Court's reasoning was as follows:

> The right to vote can be affected by a dilution of voting power as well as by an absolute prohibition on casting a ballot. See Reynolds v. Sims, 377 U.S. 533, 555 (1964). Voters who are members of a racial minority might well be in the majority in one district, but in a decided minority in the county as a whole. This type of change could therefore nullify their ability to elect the candidate of their choice just as would prohibiting some of them from voting.

393 U.S. at 569.

In 1970, Congress enacted a five-year extension of the Act's special provisions, including Section 5. The House report and the joint statement of ten members of the Senate Judiciary Committee expressed approval of the Supreme Court's decision in Allen. 2/

In a 1971 decision, Perkins v. Matthews, the Supreme Court held that annexations are within the scope of Section 5. 400 U.S. 379, 387, 390. The United States did not participate in Perkins, but, in holding that annexations are covered, the Court relied in part upon testimony to that effect given by this Department during the 1969-1970 Senate hearings on extending the Act. See 400 U.S. at 391-394. 3/

In 1975, the Act's special provisions were extended for seven years. The legislative history indicates Congress' approval of Perkins and continued approval of Allen. 4/ Also, the com-

1/ This Department filed a memorandum for the United States as amicus curiae, taking the position that the change to at-large elections (as well as the other changes at issue in Allen) was covered by Section 5.

3/ In 1971, this Department issued its first set of guidelines for implementing Section 5. Annexations were included in the list of covered changes. See 28 C.F.R. § 51.4(c)(3).

4/ See, e.g., H.R. Rep. No. 94-196, 94th Cong., 1st Sess. 9 (1975); S. Rep. No. 94-295, 94th Cong., 1st Sess. 16 (1975).

mittee reports listed, as an example of practices showing the need to continue Section 5, "annexations of predominantly white areas." 5/

In 1973, in City of Petersburg v. United States, the Supreme Court affirmed the denial of preclearance with regard to an annexation that would have changed the city's population from majority black to majority white. 354 F. Supp. 1021 (D.D.C. 1972), aff'd per curiam, 410 U.S. 962. 6/

In City of Richmond v. United States, 422 U.S. 358, 371-372 (1975), the Supreme Court held that, in the context of a fairly drawn system of single-member districts for electing the city council (which system would replace the pre-annexation at-large system), the annexation in question would not have the racial effect proscribed by Section 5. 7/ The case was remanded

5/ H.R. Rep. No. 94-196 at 10; S. Rep. No. 94-295 at 16.

6/ This Department had previously objected to the annexation.

The district court did not find that the annexation had a racial purpose, but found that the city had failed to meet its burden of proving the absence of racial effect. 354 F. Supp. at 1027-1028. The district court stated the following:

> The Court concludes then, that this annexation, insofar as it is a mere boundary change and not an expahsion of an at-large system, is not the kind of discriminatory change which Congress sought to prevent; but it also concludes, in accordance with the Attorney General's findings, that this annexation can be approved only on the condition that modifications calculated to neutralize to the extent possible any adverse effect upon the political participation of black voters are adopted, i.e., that the plaintiff shift from an at-large to a ward system of electing its city councilmen.

7/ In Richmond, 422 U.S. at 370, the Supreme Court stated the following:

> Petersburg was correctly decided. On the facts there presented, the annexation of an area with a white majority, combined with at-large councilmanic elections and racial voting, created or enhanced the power of the white majority to exclude Negroes totally from particito the district court, however, for further proceedings with regard to the issue of racial purpose. 8/ 422 U.S. at 375.

In City of Rome v. United States, 446 U.S. 156, 187 (1980), the Supreme Court upheld the denial of preclearance to a group of annexations. 9/

> pation in the governing of the city through membership on the city council. We agreed, however, that that consequence would be satisfactorily obviated if at-large elections were replaced by a ward system of choosing councilmen. It is our view that a fairly designed ward plan in such circumstances would not only prevent the total exclusion of Negroes from membership on the council but would afford them representation reasonably equivalent to their political strength in the enlarged community.

8/ The result reached by the Supreme Court in Richmond--remand for further proceedings on the issue of purpose--is the course that this Department had proposed.

9/ In City of Rome, this Department's position was that the annexations should not receive preclearance.

The Supreme Court's reasoning was as follows:

> The District Court properly concluded that these annexations must be scrutinized under the Voting Rights Act. See Perkins v. Matthews, 400 U.S., at 388-390. By substantially enlarging the city's number of white eligible voters without creating a corresponding increase in the number of Negroes, the annexations reduced the importance of the votes of Negro citizens who resided within the preannexation boundaries of the city. In these circumstances, the city bore the burden of proving that its electoral system "fairly reflects the strength of the Negro community as it exists after the annexation[s]." City of Richmond v. United States, 422 U.S., at 371. The District Court's determination that the city failed to meet this burden of proof for City Commission elections was based on the presence of three vote-dilutive factors: the at-large electoral system, the residency requirement for officeholders, and the high degree of racial bloc voting. Particularly in light of the inadequate evidence introduced by the city, this determination cannot be considered to be clearly erroneous.

466 U.S. at 187.

Another pertinent decision is Beer v. United States, which is discussed below.

b. In evaluating annexations submitted for review under Section 5, the policy of the Department is to apply the standards developed by the federal courts. This is done on a case-by-case basis in consideration of all the relevant facts.

Among the factors considered are the effects of the proposed annexation upon the racial make-up of the total population, voting-age population, and registered voters. However, the Department does not use any rigid mathematical cut-off. Each submission is evaluated individually. The existing method of government, including whether the electoral system provides for majority or plurality voting, for full-slate or "single-shot" voting, and for election by district or at-large voting, is considered, along with such matters as the extent of racial bloc voting. We also consider the history of annexations by the jurisdiction.

When an objection is interposed to changes caused by an annexation, our practice is to indicate the kinds of action the municipality might take that would render the change unobjectionable. The Department is always willing to discuss matters of this kind with the municipalities.

> 6. Describe in detail the Department's policy on reapportionment: What sort of mathematical standards are used to determine when a reapportionment constitutes a denial or abridgement of the right to vote? What other objective criteria are taken into account? How does the Department determine what sort of changes to require as a condition for approval? What provisions of the Act or passages in its legislative history justify these policies? What decisions of the Supreme Court justify these policies? What positions did the Department advocate in those cases?

a. The statutory basis for applying Section 5 to reapportionment plans is the language that was interpreted in Allen.

In Georgia v. United States, 411 U.S. 526 (1973), the Court held that a reapportionment statute was subject to Section 5. 10/

10/ This was an action by the United States to enforce Section 5, i.e., to enjoin implementation of a state reapportionment law that had not been precleared. The district court held in favor of the United States, and the Supreme Court affirmed.

The Supreme Court pointed out that the reasoning of Allen "all but conclusively established" that Section 5 covers redistricting laws. 411 U.S. at 532. The Court noted Congress' awareness of and acceptance of Allen and the practice of this Department and covered jurisdictions. 411 U.S. at 533-534.

Another pertinent decision is White v. Regester, 412 U.S. 755, 765-769 (1973), in which the Supreme Court sustained the lower court's decision that use, in a statute establishing districts for the Texas legislature, of multi-member districts in Dallas and Bexar Counties was unconstitutional, because they were "being used invidiously to cancel out or minimize the voting strength of" blacks and Mexican-Americans respectively (412 U.S. at 765). 11/

The legislative history of the 1975 amendments to the Voting Rights Act emphasized the need for continuing the application of Section 5 to the redistricting process in covered states. 12/ The committee reports noted with approval the decision in White v. Regester. 13/

In Beer v. United States, 425 U.S. 130 (1976), 14/ the Court enunciated a standard concerning "retrogression," which it explained as follows:

> When it adopted a 7-year extension of the Voting Rights Act in 1975, Congress explicitly stated that "the standard [under § 5] can only be fully satisfied by determining on the basis of the facts found by the Attorney General [or the District Court] to be true whether the ability of minority groups to participate in the political process and to to elect their choices to office is augmented, diminished, or not affected by the change affecting voting . . . ." H. R. Rep. No. 94-196, p. 60 (emphasis added). In other words the purpose of § 5 has always been to 11/ The United States did not participate in White v. Regester.

12/ See, e.g., H.R. Rep. No. 94-196 at 10-11; S. Rep. No. 94-295 at 17-18.

13/ H.R. Rep. No. 94-196 at 19; S.Rep. No. 94-295 at 27.

14/ Beer was an action by the City of New Orleans to obtain preclearance of the reapportionment of its councilmanic districts. This Department opposed the granting of preclearance. The district court denied the declaratory judgment sought by the city, but the Supreme Court held that the lower court had erred in concluding that the plan would have racially discriminatory effect.

> insure that no voting-procedure changes would be made that would lead to a retrogression in the position of racial minorities with respect to their effective exercise of the electoral franchise.
> It is thus apparent that a legislative reapportionment that enhances the position of racial minorities with respect to their effective exercise of the electoral franchise can hardly have the "effect" of diluting or abridging the right to vote on account of race within the meaning of § 5. We conclude, therefore, that such an ameliorative new legislative apportionment cannot violate § 5 unless the new apportionment itself so discriminates on the basis of race or color as to violate the Constitution.

425 U.S. at 141 (footnote omitted).

Also relevant is United Jewish Organizations v. Carey, 430 U.S. 144 (1977). 15/ The Court held that New York's use of racial criteria in redistricting Kings County was not unconstitutional. 16/ 430 U.S. at 161 (White, J., with Stevens, Brennan and Blackmun, Js.), 179-180 (Stewart, J., with Powell, J., concurring in the judgment).

b. In evaluating reapportionment or redistricting plans submitted under Section 5, as in evaluating annexations, the Department applies the legal standards that have been developed by the courts. In doing so, we proceed on a case-by-case basis, in the light of all of the facts, without imposing any rigid mathematical standards.

15/ This action, brought by Hasidic Jews who resided in Kings County, New York, challenged the constitutionality of a state redistricting statute (adopted after a prior statute had been objected to by the Attorney General, pursuant to Section 5). The lower courts upheld the state statute.

This Department filed a brief in the Supreme Court, asserting that the lower courts had properly dismissed the Attorney General as a party and that the redistricting plan did not violate the plaintiffs' Fourteenth or Fifteenth Amendment rights. The Supreme Court affirmed the judgment of the court of appeals.

16/ After the Attorney General objected to its initial redistricting plan, the state adopted a new plan creating, in Kings County, 65-percent nonwhite majorities in two additional senate and two additional assembly districts.

Most often, the question presented is whether new district boundary lines lead to retrogression in the ability of members of racial groups to participate in the electoral process. Relevant considerations include the racial make-up of the total population, voting-age population, and registered voters in the districts before and after the boundary lines of the districts were redrawn. Other factors that are considered include the method of election and the compactness and contiguity of the districts. 17/

The Department does not require any particular change as a condition for preclearance. However, we do discuss with the submitting jurisdiction possible methods of bringing the apportionment plan into compliance with Section 5. If the jurisdiction wishes, our Section 5 guidelines allow informal discussion of possible revisions. For example, we might discuss particular revisions of boundary lines or electoral practices.

> 8. Describe in detail the Department's policy regarding institution of suits to protect voting rights: How many different sorts of suits are authorized by statute? What criteria does the Department employ in determining when to bring each type of suit? What different sorts of relief are authorized by statute? What criteria does the Department employ in determining which sorts of relief to request in a particular case?

a. A number of statutory provisions authorize the Attorney General to bring civil actions to protect voting rights. This authority relates not only to discrimination on the basis of race or membership in a language minority group, but also to provisions concerning durational residency requirements, 18/ voting age, 19/

17/ Regarding submissions such as reapportionments of legislative bodies, including state legislatures, we also consider the racial impact of deviations from one-person, one-vote requirements.

and the rights of overseas citizens. 20/ In addition, there are criminal laws prohibiting interference with voting rights. 21/

Under Section 12(d) of the Voting Rights Act, 42 U.S.C. 1973j(d), the Attorney General is authorized to sue to enforce the Act's special provisions, including Section 5, and also such permanent provisions as Sections 2 and 3. Another statute granting authority to sue to prevent racial discrimination regarding voting is Section 131 of the Civil Rights Act of 1957, 42 U.S.C. 1971(c). See also Title IX of the 1964 Civil Rights Act, 42 U.S.C. 2000h-2.

Under Section 204 of the Voting Rights Act, as amended, 42 U.S.C. 1973aa-2. the Attorney General is empowered to sue to enforce Section 201, the permanent prohibition against use of literacy tests, and Section 203, which imposes bilingual election requirements on certain counties.

b. For more than ten years, the main priority of the Civil Rights Division in the area of voting has been enforcement of Section 5, the preclearance requirement. Our administrative implementation, i.e., processing changes submitted to the Department, is supplemented by litigation. We defend suits brought by a jurisdiction to obtain judicial preclearance of a change. In addition, we initiate suits to enforce Section 5--suits in the local federal district court to enjoin operation of changes that have not been precleared.

In recent years, the category accounting for the second largest number of the Civil Rights Division's voting rights suits is litigation to remedy dilution of the voting rights of blacks or a language minority group.

In deciding whether to initiate a suit, we use the following criteria: the strength of the evidence of a violation, whether the violation is egregious, the jurisdiction's response to our efforts to obtain voluntary compliance, the number of persons affected, the existence of legal issues between the United States and the jurisdiction, and the availability of our resources.

21/ E.g., 18 U.S.C. 241-242; 18 U.S.C. 245(b)(1)(A), added by Section 101(a) of the Civil Rights Act of 1968; Sections 11(c)-(e) and 12(a)-(c) of the Voting Rights Act, as amended, 42 U.S.C. 1973i(c)-(e); 1973j(a)-(c). If an alleged violation of one of the criminal statutes involves discrimination based on race or membership in a language minority group, the matter is handled by the Criminal Section of the Civil Rights Division. If such discrimination is not involved, the matter is handled by the Criminal Division.

c. As noted above, provisions of the Voting Rights Act and other statutes dealing with the right to vote authorize both civil and criminal relief, but, since 1975, the Civil Rights Division has brought only one criminal prosecution in the area of voting rights.

The statute that we use most frequently is Section 12(d) of the Voting Rights Act, 42 U.S.C. 1973j(d), which provides that in the event of violation of specified provisions of the Act, such as Section 2 or Section 5, "the Attorney General may institute for the United States * * * an action for preventive relief, including an application for a temporary or permanent injunction, restraining order, or other order * * *." Also, declaratory judgments are authorized (see 28 U.S.C. 2201).

In determining what remedies to seek in litigation, the Department is basically guided by the nature of the violation: the defendants should take the action needed to bring them into compliance with federal law and remedy the effects of the violation. As a rule, declaratory and injunctive relief are the forms of relief most often sought. Such relief is generally sufficient to insure the federally protected rights of the victims of voting discrimination. Sometimes, the Department also finds it necessary to seek other relief. 22/

In an action to enforce Section 5. the basic relief is an injunction against implementation of the non-precleared change in voting laws. At times, such a suit may involve an effort to postpone or set aside an election.

In a dilution suit under Section 2, e.g., a suit challenging the at-large method of election, we seek adoption of a nondiscriminatory system.

9. List all suits to protect voting rights initiated by the Department since 1975. Describe in detail in each case how the criteria described above were applied.

a. My letter of January 8 included a list of the voting rights suits we have initiated since January 1, 1975. See Attachment D to that letter.

22/ For example, in one case, the United States initiated civil contempt proceedings after we determined that the defendants in a pending case had failed to comply with a federal court order.

b. To indicate application of the criteria outlined in our reply to question 8, we are attaching a summary of each of the cases listed in Attachment D. These summaries are Attachment I to the present letter.

> 10. List all suits for bailout filed under the Act since 1965. Describe the criteria used by the Department in determining whether to consent to bailout. Describe how the Department's actions in each case complied with those criteria.

a. Our January 8, 1982 response included lists of the bailout suits under Section 4(a) and Section 203(d). See Attachments E and F to that letter.

b. The criteria regarding consent to a bailout judgment depend upon the applicable statutory provisions.

(1) Section 4(a)

(A) In a bailout suit by a 1965- or 1970-covered jurisdiction, the issue is whether, during the applicable period (now, the 17 years preceding the filing of the suit), there was any use of a "test or device" with the purpose or effect of denying or abriding the right to vote on account of race. 23/ The definition of "test or device" applicable to these jurisdictions is set forth in Section 4(c) and includes requirements concerning literacy, educational achievement, good character, and the voucher of other persons.

The next-to-last paragraph of Section 4(a) states that the Attorney General "shall consent" to the entry of a bailout judgment if he "determines that he has no reason to believe" that any such discriminatory use of a test or device occurred during the applicable period. 24/

23/ Section 4(a) provides that a bailout judgment may not be issued to a jurisdiction for a period of 17 years after entry by a federal court of a final judgment determining that such discriminatory use of a test or device occurred within the territory of the jurisdiction.

24/ Section 4(d) sets forth a de minimis exception for cases in which the incidents of discriminatory use of a test were few in number and promptly corrected by state or local officials, and recurrence of such discrimination is unlikely.

(B) The coverage formula added to Section 4(b) in 1975 uses a new definition of "test or device." That definition, Section 4(f)(3), refers to conducting registration or elections solely in English in a jurisdiction with substantial "language minority group" population. 25/ This additional definition of "test or device" is the primary issue with regard to bailout by a 1975-covered jurisdiction, but does not apply to bailout from 1965 or 1970 coverage.

To obtain a bailout judgment, a 1975-covered jurisdiction must show that, during the preceding ten years, it did not use English-only elections for the purpose or with the effect of denying or abridging voting rights on the ground of membership in a language minority group.

(C) When a bailout suit is filed, our practice is to conduct an investigation in order to determine whether a test or device was used during the pertinent period and, if so, whether such use had the proscribed discriminatory purpose or effect.

If our investigation shows that there was no discriminatory use of a test or device, we consent to entry of a bailout judgment. Otherwise, we defend the suit and oppose entry of such a judgment.

(2) Section 203(d)

The issue in a bailout suit under Section 203(d) is whether "the illiteracy rate of the applicable language minority group within the [plaintiff] State or political subdivision is equal to or less than the national illiteracy rate." 26/ If the pertinent data on illiteracy showed that the jurisdiction satisfies the standard of Section 203(d), we would consent to the bailout judgment.

c. To indicate application of our criteria, we are attaching a summary of each of the bailout suits. See Attachment J. As noted in my January 8 letter, nine of the suits under Section 4(a) resulted in a bailout judgment, and each such judgment was based on the Attorney General's consent.

25/ The term "language minority group" refers to Hispanics, American Indians, Asian Americans and Alaskan Natives.

26/ The meaning of "illiteracy" for purposes of Section 203 is set forth in Section 203(b).

12. List all States and political subdivisions to which the Department has assigned federal examiners during the last ten years. Describe in detail the criteria, including written regulations and guidelines, used by the Department in determining whether to assign such examiners.

a. Our January 8 letter included lists of the counties to which examiners have been assigned during the past ten years. See Attachments G and H to that letter.

b. The statutory criteria employed by the Attorney General in certifying counties for the use of federal examiners are set forth in Section 6 of the Act, 42 U.S.C. 1973d. Examiners have two functions--listing persons whom the examiner found to be qualified to vote (see Sections 6 and 7 of the Act) and being present at an election to which federal observers are assigned (see Sections 8 and 12(e) of the Act).

The Department of Justice has not issued any regulations or guidelines regarding the criteria for using examiners. We will describe (1) our general practice concerning use of examiners to list qualified voters, (2) the specific circumstances that resulted in such use of examiners in two Mississippi counties in 1975, and (3) our practice with regard to use of federal observers (and therefore examiners) at an election.

(1) Section 6 of the Act, as amended, provides for the appointment of examiners (a) when authorized by a court pursuant to Section 3(a) of the Act or (b), in a county subject to the special provisions, when the Attorney General certifies (i) that he has received, from at least 20 of the county's residents, meritorious written complaints that their voting rights have been denied, under color of law, on account of race or membership in a language minority group or (ii) that, in his judgment, "the appointment of examiners is otherwise necessary to enforce the guarantees of the fourteenth or fifteenth amendment."

In making the latter determination, the Attorney General is required to take into account whether the ratio of nonwhite to white persons registered to vote appears reasonably attributable to violations of the Fourteenth or Fifteenth Amendment or whether bona fide efforts are being made to comply with those amendments. More specifically, the Department considers such factors as how long and how consistently the voter registration office is open, its location in relation to areas where minority registration is low and whether offices are set up in outlying areas; whether there has been intimidation of registrants ranging from discourtesy to violence; and whether standards are applied differently to white and minority applicants.

(2) The most recent use of examiners to list qualified voters occurred, in 1975, in Madison County and Humphreys County, Mississippi. Examiners were assigned to Madison County after the county registrar allowed whites, but refused to grant blacks, the opportunity for voter registration in outlying areas of the county, and the registrar closed his office to avoid registering blacks, refused to allow black applicants to be assisted by other blacks, and displayed a pistol while ordering a black registration worker and two black prospective applicants out of his office.

Federal examiners were assigned to Humphreys County after the county registrar caused lengthy delays in the registration of illiterate black voters, closed his office during the usual hours for voter registration, and refused to allow voter registration in the evening or on weekends, the only time available to many black field workers for registration.

(3) When a county is subject to an examiner certification, the Attorney General may direct the Office of Personnel Management to assign federal observers, persons who monitor the conduct of the election and the counting of votes. As noted above, whenever observers are assigned to an election, an examiner is also present.

In determining whether federal observers are needed at a particular election, we consider three basic factors: (a) the extent to which those who will run an election are prepared, e.g., whether there are sufficient voting hours and facilities, whether procedural rules for voting have been adequately publicized, and whether polling officials have been selected in a nondiscriminatory manner and are instructed in election procedures; (b) the confidence of the minority community in the electoral process and in the individuals conducting the election, including the extent to which minorities are allowed to be poll officials, and (c) the possibility that forces outside the official election machinery, such as racial violence or threats of violence or a history of discrimination in areas other than voting, may interfere with the election. Such factors are particularly important in an election where a minority candidate or a non-minority candidate who has the support of minority voters has a good chance of winning the election. Federal observers can provide a calming, objective presence and the observers can serve to prevent intimidation of minority voters at the polls and to assure that illiterate voters are provided with noncoercive assistance in voting.

For most of the states covered by the special provisions of the Act, we determine the need for federal observers through standard pre-election surveys. 27/

13. How many political subdivisions are covered by the preclearance provisions of the Act? List each State or political subdivision which, on the basis of all information available to the Department, would be unable to meet the bailout standard set by H.R. 3112, and in each case describe the reason for such inability.

a. Nine states are fully covered by the special provisions of the Voting Rights Act. This means that Section 5's preclearance requirement applies to each of those state governments, as well as to the 830 counties and independent cities within those states and to all of their subunits. In addition, the special provisions apply to a total of 82 political subdivisions in 13 other states. Please note that a list of the covered jurisdictions is set forth in the appendix to our Section 5 guidelines, Attachment A to my January 8, 1982 letter.

b. On October 1, 1981, I sent Congressman Railsback a letter discussing operation of the bailout standard of H.R. 3112. Included, as attachments, were detailed lists of the jurisdictions affected by certain criteria. A copy of this letter (which was included in the Congressional Record) is attached. See Attachment K. We are in the process of updating the lists, and I plan to provide them to the Subcommittee in connection with my testimony.

Please note that, because of lack of information on the nature of the criteria, we are not able to estimate the effect of the standards concerning (1) compliance with the procedural requirements of Section 5, (2) constructive efforts regarding registration and voting, (3) elimination of dilutive voting procedures and methods of election, or (4) the general provision on violation of federal or state prohibitions against voting discrimination.

27/ Our surveys begin with telephone inquiries to election officials in counties with significant minority populations. These inquiries are followed by telephone discussions with minority contacts in counties where minority and white or Anglo candidates are contesting a local office, and in counties where we have received complaints of discrimination in election procedures. Our surveys conclude with field investigations in counties where our telephone inquiries show that the assignment of federal observers may prove to be necessary. The final decision regarding the assignment of federal observers is made by the Assistant Attorney General on the basis of written recommendations that set out the facts obtained in the pre-election surveys.

14. Describe the criteria used by the Department in determining whether to enter into a consent decree, settlement, or agreement resolving voting rights litigation. What effect would the enactment of the provision of H.R. 3112 governing the consequences of such agreements have on the Department's policies?

a. In determining whether to enter into a consent decree, settlement or agreement resolving voting rights litigation, the Department's primary consideration is whether the actions to be taken by the parties to the consent decree will effectively achieve compliance with federal law.

The Department attempts to resolve lawsuits by consent of the parties whenever possible, because such resolution achieves compliance with federal law and, at the same time, allows for more efficient use of our limited resources.

b. Under the standard set forth in H.R. 3112, no bailout judgment would issue if the court were to determine, inter alia, that, during the applicable period, a consent decree had been entered into which resulted in the abandonment of a voting practice which was challenged on racial grounds. Although the enactment of this provision would not materially affect the Department's policies concerning consent decrees, the provision could well affect the willingness of defendant jurisdictions to enter into such decrees.

15. Describe the Department's interpretation of the term "voting procedures and methods of election which inhibit or dilute equal access to the electoral process" as used in H.R. 3112.

Section 1(b) of H.R. 3112 sets forth amendments to the bailout provisions of Section 4(a) of the Voting Rights Act, 42 U.S.C. 1973b(a). These amendments, which would take effect on August 5, 1984, would add a new set of standards for award of a bailout judgment. The required showing must be made with regard to the ten years preceding the filing of a bailout suit and the period during which the suit is pending.

The provision referred to in your question, proposed Section 4(a)(1)(F)(i), would require a state or political subdivision seeking a bailout judgment to prove, for the applicable period, that it and "all governmental units within its territory" have "eliminated voting procedures and methods of election which inhibit or dilute equal access to the electoral process." This provision was included in the bill as reported by the House Judiciary Committee, and no amendment regarding it was considered during the House floor debate. Accordingly, the main evidence of its intended meaning is the report of the House committee, H.R. Rep. No. 97-227, 97th Cong., 1st Sess. (1981).

One issue relates to the coverage of Section 4(a)(1)(F)(i), that is, the meaning of "voting procedures" and "methods of election." Neither of the terms is defined in the bill. 28/ The House report states (p. 43) that "[v]oting procedures encompass requirements for voter registration and the registration process" and that "methods of election include the electoral process and the means by which public officials are elected." Some specific guidance is provided by the following explanation:

> The basis for this standard is the extensive committee record which shows clearly that discriminatory voting procedures and methods of election continue to prevail throughout the covered jurisdictions. This evidence indicates that the types of voting procedures and methods of election which have continuously been used in a discriminatory manner include: unduly restrictive voter registration procedures, multi-member legislative districts, at-large county-wide and citywide voting which denies a substantial minority population an equal opportunity to participate, majority vote-runoff requirements, prohibitions on single-shot voting, and others.

House report at 42-43.

To the extent that proposed Section 4(a)(1)(F)(i) would apply to the voter registration process, it is related to proposed Section 4(a)(1)(F)(iii). The latter provision would require, as a condition for bailout, proof that the jurisdictions in question > have engaged in other constructive efforts, such as expanded opportunity for convenient registration and voting for every person of voting age and the appointment of minority persons as election officials throughout the jurisdiction and at all stages of the election and registration process.

The basis for and meaning of subparagraph (iii) are explained as follows in the House report (pp. 43-44):

28/ The term "voting procedures" is similar to language appearing in Section 2 of the Act, 42 U.S.C. 1973, ("standard, practice, or procedure"), and Section 5, 42 U.S.C. 1973c, ("standard, practice, or procedure with respect to voting").

> The Committee hearing record is replete with examples of restrictive registration practices and procedures, such as restricted hours and locations for registration, dual registration practices, and discriminatory reregistration requirements, which continue to exist throughout the covered jurisdictions. A jurisdiction could meet the requirements of the subsection by offering expanded opportunities for registration through the appointment of deputy registrars who are accessible to minority citizens, offering evening and weekend registration hours, or providing postcard registration. Other examples of constructive efforts include appointment of minority citizens as deputy registrars, pollworkers, and to other positions which indicate to minority group members that they are encouraged to participate in the political process.

Thus, it appears that subparagraphs (i) and (iii) would require at a minimum that any covered jurisdiction seeking bailout not only eliminate any registration requirements or practices that might be said to disadvantage blacks or members of language minority groups, but also alternatively adopt such measures as necessary to enhance the opportunities for convenient registration and voting of minorities. 29/

The next set of issues relates to subparagraph (i)'s phrase "inhibit or dilute equal access to the electoral process." The House report states (p. 43) the following:

> The Committee's greatest concern is that a jurisdiction seeking bail-out be required to show that it, and governmental units within its territory, have eliminated voting procedures and methods of election which discriminate against or submerge minority voters. The requirement to eliminate means the elimination of all such structural and procedural barriers.

The report indicates that the requirement of proposed Section 4(a)(1)(F)(i) is aimed particularly at at-large election systems and is not limited to procedures or election methods that are unconstitutional. 30/ The applicable standard would be "purpose or effect"; the report states (p. 43) that the jurisdiction seeking a bailout judgment must provide "empirical evidence that its methods of election and voting procedures have neither the purpose nor the effect of discriminating." One obvious conclusion to be drawn is that virtually no covered jurisdiction with an at-large election system and substantial minority population will be permitted to obtain release from the special provisions unless that at-large system is eliminated--even if all the other criteria of the bailout provision can be fully satisfied.

29/ The House report states (p. 43) that proposed Section 4(a)(1)(F)(iii) "places an affirmative duty on covered jurisdictions to expand the opportunities for minority citizens to register and vote."

> 16. Does the Department have sufficient resources at this time to respond to such bailout suits as may be brought under the existing Act? Does the Department have sufficient resources at this time to respond to such bailout suits as may be brought under H.R. 3112 were it to be enacted? If not, what other resources are needed?

a. As noted above, under the present bailout provision of Section 4(a), our response to a bailout suit includes an investigation in the jurisdiction. The extent of our litigative efforts depends on whether the case proceeds to discovery and trial. 31/

30/ After listing the examples of covered procedures and methods of election, the House report (p. 43) adds:

> Although they are not necessarily unconstitutional under existing standards, these voting procedures and methods of election cited by the Supreme Court and lower Federal courts as having a "built-in-bias" against minorities do not permit minorities "to enter into the political process in a reliable and meaningful manner." White v. Regester, 412 U.S. 755, 766-67 (1973); Zimmer v. McKeithen 485 F.2d 1297 (5th Cir. 1973) (en banc).
> For example, while in some areas with few minority citizens, at-large election may be a reform measure, the Committee heard extensive evidence about discriminatory at-large election systems in the covered jurisdiction [sic].

31/ Of the seven bailout suits filed after the 1975 Amendments to the Voting Rights Act, three were concluded by the entry of judgments in which we consented to bailout in the early stages of litigation, three were concluded by the jurisdiction's voluntary dismissal of the action in the early stages of litigation after we had determined that we could not consent to bailout, and one case, involving the City of Rome, Georgia, proceeded through all stages of litigation including appeal to the Supreme Court.

To date, the number of bailout suits has been limited, and our resources have been adequate to respond to those suits. 32/

In the event that Congress does not extend the Act before August 6 of this year, it is likely that, soon after that date, all or most of the 1965-covered jurisdictions would bring bailout suits. This could mean a total of six statewide suits and one or more suits by 39 North Carolina counties. 33/

Responding to a statewide bailout suit would be a substantial undertaking. The demands on our resources would depend in part upon the timing of the bailout suits, i.e., whether their filing is staggered over a period of months or whether several are filed at essentially the same time. If the resources of our Voting Section and the FBI proved to be inadequate, we would have to divert temporarily other resources available within the Department and might need to seek additional funds from Congress.

b. H.R. 3112, the House-passed bill, would substantially change the bailout process. First, a bailout suit could be brought by an individual county in a fully covered state. There are more than 800 such counties.

Second, new bailout standards would be applicable after August 1984, which would be the earliest possible date for bailout.

It is difficult, at this time, to estimate what the demands on our resources would be after August 1984, because that requires speculation as to the number and timing of bailout suits that would be filed and the issues that would be in dispute. It is possible that, in 1984 and the next several years, a large number of bailout suits would be filed. Still, the standards are such that it would be exceedingly difficult for a plaintiff jurisdiction to meet them. For example, a bailout effort by a state or a county could be defeated simply by showing that one of the towns within it had failed, during the preceding ten years, to obtain preclearance of one or more changes in voting laws. Accordingly, even if the number of suits were large, there might be few trials and few full investigations. Litigation of some legal issues, including appeals, might be necessary.

32/ The Civil Rights Division's litigation of voting suits in the district courts is handled by 17 attorneys in the Voting Section, including three supervisors.

33/ In August 1965, the States of Alabama, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, South Carolina and Virginia became subject to Section 4(a). Of the North Carolina counties covered on the basis of the 1965 formula, 26 became subject to Section 4(a) in August 1965; the other 13 became subject in January or March 1966.

At some point, probably after 1992, the situation would change. That is, adjudication of the various issues presented by the bailout standards would be necessary. Such suits would be extremely difficult and complicated. They would, for example, entail litigating the purpose and effect of all electoral systems of the plaintiff jurisdiction and all the cities, towns and school districts within it. The demands on this Department with regard to investigating and litigating even a single suit of this type would be extremely great. Nonetheless, because it appears that such demands would not arise until many years in the future, we cannot be specific regarding the additional resources that would be needed.

17. In the Department's view are there any purposes served by the confinement of bailout litigation to the District of Columbia that could not equally well be served by litigation in other districts?

Under Sections 4(a) and 14(b) of the Voting Rights Act, exclusive jurisdiction over actions to terminate Section 4(a) coverage is vested in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia. Such actions are heard by a three-judge court, and there is a right of direct appeal to the Supreme Court.

In 1965, the reasons for confining bailout suits to the District Court for the District of Columbia were (1) a desire for uniformity of decisions at the trial-court level, (2) the belief that use of the District of Columbia court would mean prompt and impartial adjudication of the cases, thus avoiding problems that had been experienced in some of the federal courts in covered states, and (3) the convenience to this Department. 34/

During its consideration of H.R. 3112 on October 5, 1981, the House of Representatives debated and rejected an amendment, offered by Congressman Caldwell Butler, that would have permitted Section 4(a) bailout actions to be brought in the local federal district courts. 35/ Opponents of the amendment stated that, over the last 16 years, use of the District of Columbia court had worked well, and they maintained that the original reasons for 34/ See, e.g., H.R. Rep. No. 439, 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 19 (1965); 111 Cong. Rec. 10354-10355 (1965) (Senator Hart), id. at 10362-10363 (Senator Javits), id. at 16225 (Congressman Ryan).

35/ Under the amendment, the suits would be heard by a three-judge court, the members of which would be selected by the chief judge of the circuit and could not include "any of the judges normally assigned to * * * [the] judicial district." See 127 Cong. Rec. H 6948 (daily ed., Oct. 5, 1981).

limiting the suits to that court were still valid. 36/ The disadvantages of barring use of the local federal courts were discussed by Congressman Butler and other supporters of his amendment. 37/

Our view concerning this issue depends upon the nature of the bailout standards. The present provisions have been workable and, if the existing bailout standard is retained, we would favor continuing the exclusive jurisdiction of the District Court for the District of Columbia. If bailout standards similar to those of the House-passed bill are adopted, the arguments made in favor of permitting bailout suits to be brought in the local federal district courts are, in our opinion, more persuasive.

I hope that this letter will be of assistance.

Sincerely,

Wm. Bradford Reynolds
Assistant Attorney General
Civil Rights Division

Senator HATCH. Thank you, Senator Grassley, for calling upon Senator Mathias, who will be our next witness.

STATEMENT OF HON. CHARLES McC. MATHIAS, JR., A U.S. SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF MARYLAND

Senator MATHIAS. In view of the fact that we have spent a lot of time and I have had already an opportunity to get in a few words, I am going to ask permission to submit my statement for the record and then just make one point very briefly.

Senator HATCH. That will be fine. Your full statement will be made a part of the record as though fully delivered.

Senator MATHIAS. Since this question of intent is obviously the focal point of this discussion and I suspect will be throughout the month of February, I would like to say that I think that the amendment that we propose to section 2 is needed. I want to answer the chairman specifically. It is needed to clarify the burden of proof in voting discrimination cases and to remove the uncertainty caused by the failure of the Supreme Court to articulate a clear standing in the City of Mobile v. Bolden. In that case it was four members of the Court who interpreted section 2 to require that violations of the section be based on specific evidence of discriminatory purpose.

In this connection, I would say, Mr. Chairman, that the language that has been used this morning—we want to overrule the Court—is really not accurate. We are not trying to overrule the Court. The Court seems to be in some error about what the legislative intent was. We are simply trying to make it clear what I recall the legislative intent to have been, what the Attorney General recalls it to have been—Attorney General Katzenbach.

Prior to Bolden, a violation in voting discrimination cases can be shown by reference to a variety of factors that, when taken together, added up to a finding of illegal discrimination. But in Bolden the plurality appears to have abandoned this totality of circumstance test and to have replaced it with a requirement of specific evidence. By requiring the specific evidence of intent to discriminate, the plurality in Bolden—note, I say plurality, not majority——

Senator HATCH. There were six Justices, were there not, who endorsed an intent standard?

Senator MATHIAS. Places a virtually impossible burden on the plaintiffs.

The reason we need it is that plaintiffs must now reach back into time and produce direct evidence of discriminatory purpose. With all deference to the chairman, I think this is a requirement of a smoking gun, and I think it becomes a crippling blow to the overall effectiveness of the act.

Congress has the constitutional authority to refresh the memory of that plurality of the Court and to restore the original meaning to section 2, and that is merely what we are trying to do.

I will submit the balance of my statement so that the other witnesses can be heard.

Senator HATCH. Thank you, Senator Mathias.

I have one question for you, but let me first say this: It was more than a plurality. There were six Justices arguably who agreed that the intent standard was the standard under the 15th amendment. Six Justices reaffirmed that under the 15th amendment you have to have intent to have a violation. I think this opinion is shared by the majority of people who have read the case. I might even add that Justice White, in his dissent in Mobile, said that purpose was necessary. I think this is an important point to recognize.

Let me ask you this question.

Senator MATHIAS. Just so the record is clear, you said six members. There were four, and two concurred, but on other grounds.

Senator HATCH. The four concurring judges, Justice White, and perhaps one or two of the concurring justices.

Senator MATHIAS. Justice Blackmun concludes that the relief afforded appellees by the district court was not commensurate with the sound exercise of judicial discretion.

Senator HATCH. That is true about Blackmun; but it is hardly dispositive that he opposed the intent requirement.

Senator MATHIAS. I will stick with four.

Senator HATCH. Fine, but let us read the whole case.

I noted with great interest in the Washington Post recently a statement by Mr. John W. Douglas, chairman of the Maryland General Assembly's Black Caucus redistricting panel. He was quite concerned that the city of Baltimore which, as you know, is 55 percent black, would only have four out of nine house districts, only 44 percent of these districts, with a majority black population. Mr. Douglas said, as I recall, that he was dissatisfied with the plan for that reason and that the Black Caucus was considering legal action. Do you know if any suit has been initiated yet?

Senator MATHIAS. I do not know that.

Senator HATCH. Do you have any thoughts on such a suit's legal merits? Do you think that any of the changes in the proposed Voting Rights Act amendments may have an impact on his suit if it is ever brought?

Senator MATHIAS. I am sure it could well have some impact.

Senator HATCH. I am sure, too.

Senator MATHIAS. Depending on when the suit is brought, we get around to enacting this bill, and all that kind of thing.

Senator HATCH. Let us assume the bill is enacted and the suit is brought. What kind of an impact do you expect this law, assuming that the Supreme Court would uphold it, would have on Mr. Douglas' and his associate's suit to have proportional representation in the city of Baltimore with a 55 percent representation?

Senator MATHIAS. The impact of the law—and by that I assume you mean the bill——

Senator HATCH. That is right, should it be enacted in its present form, and not vetoed.

Senator MATHIAS. That is the first time that nasty word has been used—"veto."

Senator HATCH. No; it has been used repeatedly throughout these hearings this morning, not by anybody on the administration's part but by those questioning.

Senator MATHIAS. The purpose of the bill is to provide for fair and just access to the electoral process.

Senator HATCH. Is that the most fair and just means to achieve access—if 55 percent of Baltimore is black then 55 percent ought to be black majority districts?

Senator MATHIAS. A fair and just operation of the electoral process is to give all citizens equal access to vote, run, or otherwise participate in the process.

Senator HATCH. What does "equal access" mean, Senator Mathias?

Senator MATHIAS. You are well aware of what it means.

Senator HATCH. I want to know what you think it means, because I know what it means under the effects test in section 5. I think it means, as does the Attorney General of the United States, proportional representation.

Senator MATHIAS. You look at the totality of circumstances; that is what we have been doing.

Senator HATCH. That is what we do under the intents standard.

Senator MATHIAS. I do not think——

Senator HATCH. Of course we do.

Senator MATHIAS. You require some proof of intent. The Attorney General says that is not the same proof of intent that would be required under a criminal statute, or at least that is what I heard him say. Is that what you heard him say? He said it is not that kind of intent. I am not sure just what kind of intent he does mean.

Senator HATCH. I am quite confused as to the relevance of the circumstances that you are considering in their totality. For instance, the intent test would also allow all of these considerations to be evaluated by the court in question.

Senator MATHIAS. Is what you are really asking me, would this bill require proportional representation? If that is really your question, I can give you a quick answer—no.

Senator HATCH. I will give you an equally quick response: it most certainly would.

Senator MATHIAS. That is where we disagree.

Senator HATCH. You and the Attorney General and I disagree, I suppose.

Let me just say this: You talk about "equal access," and "totality of circumstances." In the Lodge case, for example, the totality of circumstances have been considered to arrive at a finding that there was an intent to discriminate.

The circumstances added up to an inference of intent, enough to go to the jury, as they do in criminal cases, but without that high of a standard of proof.

I do not understand what the question is that the Court asks itself in evaluating the totality of the circumstances under the results test. What precisely does the Court ask itself after it has looked at the totality of the circumstances? What is the standard for evaluation under the results test?

Senator MATHIAS. Look at the results.

Senator HATCH. That is all? You are saying that if there was absolutely no intent to discriminate, as the Court found in the Mobile case, yet the results were the election of disproportionately few minority candidates, that a case would be established? How would this effect a case such as that raised in Baltimore?

Senator MATHIAS. I do not think looking like discrimination—the Court has to find that there is discrimination. If the results are that people are being excluded, that is a condition that we want to remedy. It is not a punitive act, it is a remedial act. We want to remedy that condition.

Senator HATCH. How are you going to do that without looking predominantly at the numbers in a case such as the one I cited from Baltimore?

Senator MATHIAS. Of course you look at the numbers; you look at a variety of factors.

Senator HATCH. If there is no showing of intent, there is in fact no intent. If the numbers show what Mr. Douglas said, how does a community respond? What evidence does it offer? Would we be able to impose a voting system on Baltimore?

Senator MATHIAS. I can only repeat what I have said, Mr. Chairman. The Court would look at a variety of factors. I think they have to look beyond a lack of proportionality. They have to look at a lot of things. That is what we believe the law has required before the Mobile case. That is what we would simply restore; that is all.

Senator HATCH. Again, I am still confused as to the relevance of what you are talking about, with regard to these circumstances that you are considering in their totality. What precisely does the Court ask itself after it has looked at the totality of circumstances? Does it not really come down to a statistical numbers game and proportional representation?

Senator MATHIAS. You look at what goes on; you look at where people are, what they do; you look at a great variety of things.

Senator HATCH. Under present law—which the Mobile case articulates—I think the question asked is this: Do these circumstances—the totality of the circumstances—add up to an inference of intent? That is what the present law is.

Senator MATHIAS. Let me just suggest this to you. The record will either bear me out or will not, as the days unfold. I think we will hear about the impact of the Bolden case. You have just implied it is all so easy.

Senator HATCH. No, I have not.

Senator MATHIAS. You just look at this, that, and the other thing, and it all adds up, and there is no problem to it.

Senator HATCH. It should not be easy. I am not implying that it should be easy.

Senator MATHIAS. The impact of the Bolden case may well have been to chill the atmosphere here. We often hear of chilling effect—this may be another case of chilling effect—that very few cases have been filed, and people do not file because they are concerned about what they need to prove. They find the law in a vague and uncertain state. So their recourse, as a matter of fact, if not of law, has been narrowed and diminished. It is that situation that we want to correct.

Senator HATCH. Let me just suggest to you, Senator, that every one of these cases—the Arlington Heights case, the Washington v. Davis case, the Mobile v. Bolden case, the Lodge v. Buxton case, the Escambia County case, the Feeney v. Mass case, all recent cases—has held that under the doctrine of intent you can look at the totality of the circumstances.

What I am saying is that we have a test now, a test that has worked, that has proven to be correct, that fits within the Constitution, that has been articulated by the Supreme Court of the United States of America, and that is not inordinately difficult to prove. I do not believe that you have actually articulated what the Court asks itself under the effects tests.

It seems to me that the totality test, as you have expressed it, is irrelevant within the context of the effects test, because there is no standard by which they would evaluate the evidence, where with the intent test, at least, we have a standard which can be proven, and a standard which does work.

Senator MATHIAS. Mr. Chairman, I think you have perhaps summed up the difference between us very neatly in your last statement. You think it works; I do not think it works. You are going to sit here and hear a lot of testimony between now and February 25, and we hope that that testimony will persuade you. The present state of the law is not working. It provides an unreasonable burden of proof, and it is narrowing the remedy of grievances in the country.

Senator HATCH. Remember that the goal of American jurisprudence is not to facilitate convictions but to create justice. Frankly, I agree with you; if you adopt the effects test, complaints will be facilitated against almost every municipality in this country, but, in the vast majority of cases, on completely erroneous grounds. If you proved these cases under the present standard, which does work, I think the American public will understand and support the final decisions more readily than by having some nebulous, unproven, unstandardized approach to solving this complex issue that conceivably could allow anybody to bring a suit for any flimsy reason. Even in the absence of any intent to discriminate on the part of the municipality, the proposed changes in section 2 would result in people being branded as discriminators without any showing of intent.

Senator MATHIAS. Mr. Chairman, I think we are going back and forth here like a tennis game. Rather than continue this indefinitely, let me just offer you the universal response that the late great H. L. Mencken gave to all letters that he received, "You may be right."

Senator HATCH. Could I ask one other question, Senator? Do you know of any instances in your own personal experience—and you are a great civil rights advocate, for which I admire you—where the intent test as presently interpreted has proved inefficacious, invalid, or unbeneficial in any way?

Senator MATHIAS. There will be testimony presented on that very point——

Senator HATCH. Can you think of any?

Senator MATHIAS. I think rather than be repetitious, you have witnesses coming in who are going to discuss that point.

Senator HATCH. OK. We thank you, Senator Mathias.

[The prepared statement of Senator Mathias follows:]

PREPARED STATEMENT OF SENATOR CHARLES McC. MATHIAS, JR.

MR. CHAIRMAN, THE FUTURE OF THE MOST EFFECTIVE CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF ALL TIME WILL BE DECIDED DURING THE SECOND SESSION OF THE 97TH CONGRESS. FOR THE NEXT SEVERAL WEEKS THIS SUBCOMMITTEE WILL HEAR TESTIMONY ON PROPOSALS TO EXTEND THE VOTING RIGHTS ACT OF 1965. TODAY, THE FATE OF THE 1965 ACT IS IN YOUR HANDS. FOR THAT REASON, I WELCOME THIS OPPORTUNITY TO TESTIFY BEFORE THE SUBCOMMITTEE ON THE IMPORTANCE I ATTACH TO EXTENDING THE VOTING RIGHTS ACT. I WILL ALSO EXPLAIN WHY I BELIEVE THAT S. 1992, WHICH I INTRODUCED ON DECEMBER 16, 1981 FOR MYSELF AND 60 OF MY COLLEAGUES, IS THE MOST APPROPRIATE VEHICLE FOR THE EXTENSION OF THE ACT.

IN 1870, THE 15TH AMENDMENT WAS ADDED TO THE CONSTITUTION. SECTION 1 SET OUT THIS SIMPLE, UNEQUIVOCAL COMMAND:

> THE RIGHT OF CITIZENS OF THE UNITED STATES TO VOTE SHALL NOT BE DENIED OR ABRIDGED BY THE UNITED STATES OR BY ANY STATE ON ACCOUNT OF RACE, COLOR, OR PREVIOUS CONDITION OF SERVITUDE.

BY PROVIDING A SPECIFIC CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISION PROTECTING THE RIGHT TO VOTE, THE RECONSTRUCTION CONGRESS ESTABLISHED ACCESS TO THE BALLOT AS A RIGHT JUST AS FUNDAMENTAL AND PRECIOUS AS THOSE INSCRIBED IN THE BILL OF RIGHTS BY OUR FOUNDING FATHERS. INCORPORATING THIS PRINCIPLE INTO OUR ORGANIC LAW CONSTITUTED A SOLEMN PROMISE THAT OUR SOCIETY WOULD NOT TOLERATE RACIAL BARRIERS PLACED IN THE WAY OF AMERICANS SEEKING ACCESS TO THE VOTING BOOTH.

UNFORTUNATELY, DESPITE THE UNAMBIGUOUS LANGUAGE OF SECTION 1, OF THE 15TH AMENDMENT, ITS PROMISE HAS NEVER BEEN FULLY REDEEMED. IN FACT, IT HAS OFTEN BEEN REPUDIATED AND IGNORED. FOR NEARLY A CENTURY, THAT PROMISE LAY DORMANT, BURIED IN LARGE PART BY AN AVALANCHE OF DISCRIMINATORY DEVICES SUCH AS LITERACY TESTS, POLL TAXES, GRANDFATHER CLAUSES, AND WHITE-ONLY PRIMARIES.

IT WAS NOT UNTIL THE LATE 1950'S THAT THINGS REALLY BEGAN TO CHANGE. THREE TIMES, FIRST IN 1957 AND AGAIN IN

1960 AND 1964, CONGRESS ENACTED LEGISLATION TO ENHANCE THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT'S ABILITY TO FIGHT DISCRIMINATORY VOTING PRACTICES ON A CASE-BY-CASE BASIS. BUT, DESPITE THESE NEW LAWS, THE EVILS CONTINUED. WHY? THE ANSWER WAS QUITE SIMPLE. AS THE SUPREME COURT OBSERVED, TAKING THIS TEDIOUS, TIME-CONSUMING CASE-BY-CASE APPROACH MEANT THAT:

> EVEN WHEN FAVORABLE DECISIONS (WERE) ... FINALLY OBTAINED, SOME OF THE STATES AFFECTED ... MERELY SWITCHED TO DISCRIMINATORY DEVICES NOT COVERED BY THE FEDERAL DECREES OR...ENACTED DIFFICULT NEW TESTS DESIGNED TO PROLONG THE EXISTING DISPARITY BETWEEN WHITE AND NEGRO REGISTRATION.

THOSE BENT ON FRUSTRATING BLACK ACCESS TO THE VOTING BOOTH STAYED ONE STEP AHEAD OF THE FEDERAL COURTS. TO CATCH THEM UP, SOMETHING NEW WAS NEEDED. THAT NEW APPROACH WAS THE VOTING RIGHTS ACT OF 1965. BASICALLY, IT SUBSTITUTED A STREAMLINED, EVEN-HANDED ADMINISTRATIVE PROCEDURE FOR THE PIECE-MEAL LITIGATION THAT HAD PROVED SO INEFFECTIVE.

By passing the Voting Rights Act of 1965, Congress took a giant step toward turning the promise of the 15th Amendment into a reality. It signaled to the nation and to the entire world that systematic violations of the 15th Amendment would no longer be tolerated. With the enactment of the 1965 Act, Black Americans finally began to collect on what Dr. Martin Luther King called the "promissory note of the Constitution."

More than 16 years have passed since President Johnson signed the Voting Rights Act into law. Much has been accomplished under the Act. Since 1965, minority registration and voting have increased dramatically. The number of blacks registered to vote in South Carolina, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Georgia, Virginia, and parts of North Carolina has doubled since 1965. And, in the period between the 1976 and 1980 Presidential elections, Hispanic registration increased by 30 percent nationwide and 44 percent

IN THE SOUTHWEST. MEMBERS OF MINORITY GROUPS HAVE BEEN ELECTED TO PUBLIC OFFICE IN INCREASING NUMBERS. REAL PARTICIPATION HAS BECOME A FACT OF LIFE IN AREAS OF OUR COUNTRY WHERE POLITICS USED TO BE A GAME OF CHARADES ENJOYED BY A SELECT FEW.

CLEARLY MUCH HAS BEEN ACHIEVED UNDER THE VOTING RIGHTS ACT, BUT MUCH REMAINS TO BE DONE. WE STILL NEED THE VOTING RIGHTS ACT. UNLESS IT IS EXTENDED, THE HARD-WON PROGRESS OVER THE PAST 16 YEARS WILL BE PUT IN JEOPARDY. THIS POINT WAS MADE OVER AND OVER AGAIN LAST YEAR BY WITNESSES BEFORE THE HOUSE JUDICIARY SUB-COMMITTEE ON CIVIL AND CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHTS ON PROPOSALS TO EXTEND THE VOTING RIGHTS ACT OF 1965.

THE HOUSE SUBCOMMITTEE HEARD TESTIMONY ABOUT THE CONTINUING NEED FOR THE VOTING RIGHTS ACT. FAR FROM MERELY REHASHING TALES OF ABUSES DATING BACK TO THE 1960s, THE HEARING RECORD CONTAINS NUMEROUS CONTEMPORARY EXAMPLES

OF VOTING DISCRIMINATION. SOME ARE REMINISCENT OF THE 1960S -- INTIMIDATION OR HARASSMENT OF MINORITY MEMBERS SEEKING TO VOTE OR REGISTER. BUT OTHERS REFLECT MORE SOPHISTICATED DODGES -- AT-LARGE ELECTIONS, ANNEXATIONS, MAJORITY VOTE REQUIREMENTS, PURGING OF VOTERS, AND EVEN CHANGES IN ESTABLISHED POLLING PLACES. SUCH TACTICS HAVE BEEN EFFECTIVELY EMPLOYED TO DILUTE THE IMPACT OF MINORITY VOTERS.

THE HOUSE HEARINGS ALSO DOCUMENTED WHAT WE HAD ALREADY SUSPECTED: THAT THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT'S MOST EFFECTIVE TOOL AGAINST SUCH DEVICES IS SECTION 5 OF THE ACT, WHICH REQUIRES FEDERAL REVIEW OF CHANGES IN STATE AND LOCAL ELECTION LAWS AND PROCEDURES PROPOSED BY JURISDICTIONS WITH A HISTORY OF DISCRIMINATION. AND, THE HEARINGS MADE CLEAR THAT THE CONTINUED EFFECTIVENESS OF SECTION 2, THE ACT'S GENERAL PROHIBITION AGAINST VOTING DISCRIMINATION, HAD BEEN THROWN INTO QUESTION BY THE SUPREME COURT'S DECISION IN CITY OF MOBILE V. BOLDEN.

THE HEARING RECORD COMPILED BY THE HOUSE JUDICIARY SBUCOMMITTEE ON CIVIL AND CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHTS CONVINCED THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES THAT AN EFFECTIVE VOTING RIGHTS ACT MUST BE PASSED. NOT ONLY MUST IT BE PASSED, BUT IT MUST BE PASSED PROMPTLY. UNLESS CONGRESS ACTS BY AUGUST 6, 1982, SECTION 5, IN EFFECT, WILL NO LONGER APPLY TO SEVERAL JURISDICTIONS OF SPECIAL CONCERN. ON TWO PREVIOUS OCCASIONS CONGRESS HAS FACED SIMILAR DEADLINES AND HAS ACTED IN THE NICK OF TIME TO EXTEND THE ACT.

MR. CHAIRMAN, I AM CONFIDENT THAT THE HEARING RECORD COMPILED IN THE COMING WEEKS BY THIS SUBCOMMITTEE WILL CONVINCE YOU AND YOUR COLLEAGUES THAT AN EFFECTIVE, PROMPT, EXTENSION OF THE ACT IS NOT ONLY JUSTIFIED, BUT THAT CIRCUMSTANCES COMPEL IT. THE REMAINING QUESTION THEN WILL BE WHAT FORM THE EXTENSION SHOULD TAKE. I HAVE HAD SOME THOUGHTS ON THIS SUBJECT, AND, SO HAS THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TWICE IN THE 97TH CONGRESS I HAVE INTRODUCED BILLS TO EXTEND THE VOTING RIGHTS ACT. ON APRIL 7, 1981, SENATORS KENNEDY, METZENBAUM, WEICKER, BIDEN, CHAFEE, MOYNIHAN, CRANSTON AND I INTRODUCED S. 895, THE VOTING RIGHTS ACT AMENDMENTS OF 1981. THAT BILL WAS IDENTICAL TO H.R. 3112, WHICH WAS OFFERED ON THE SAME DAY BY PETER RODINO, CHAIRMAN OF THE HOUSE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE. BASICALLY, BOTH S. 895, AND H.R. 3112, WOULD HAVE EXTENDED UNTIL 1992 BOTH THE TEMPORARY PROVISIONS OF THE ACT, INCLUDING SECTION 5, AND THE LANGUAGE MINORITY PROTECTIONS ADDED IN 1975. IN ADDITION, THE BILLS WOULD HAVE CLARIFIED THE BURDEN OF PROOF IN VOTING DISCRIMINATION CASES BROUGHT UNDER SECTION 2 OF THE ACT.

THE ORIGINAL VERSION OF H.R. 3112, WAS REVIEWED EXTENSIVELY DURING THE HEARINGS BEFORE THE HOUSE JUDICIARY SUBCOMMITTEE ON CIVIL AND CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHTS TO WHICH I HAVE PREVIOUSLY ALLUDED. AND, ON OCTOBER 5, 1981, THE HOUSE APPROVED A REVISED VERSION OF THE BILL BY AN OVERWHELMING VOTE OF 389-24.

ON DECEMBER 16, 1981, THREE FIFTHS OF MY COLLEAGUES IN THE SENATE AND I INTRODUCED S. 1992, WHICH IS IDENTICAL TO THE HOUSE-PASSED VERSION OF H.R. 3112. I URGE THE SUBCOMMITTEE'S FAVORABLE CONSIDERATION OF S. 1992. I DO SO FOR A NUMBER OF REASONS.

S. 1992 HAS BROAD BIPARTISAN SUPPORT. THIS WAS DEMONSTRATED BY THE HOUSE'S DECISIVE ACTION IN APPROVING H.R. 3112, AS AMENDED, AND BY THE LARGE NUMBERS OF DEMOCRATS AND REPUBLICANS WHO HAVE JOINED TOGETHER TO SPONSOR ITS SENATE COUNTERPART. BUT, EQUALLY IMPORTANT, IT IS A FAIR PROPOSAL WHICH WE BELIEVE WILL BE EFFECTIVE.

MAKE NO MISTAKE ABOUT IT. S. 1992 IS A COMPROMISE MEASURE. IT IS BY NO MEANS IDENTICAL TO THE ORIGINAL VERSIONS OF H.R. 3112 AND S. 895. SOME CHANGES HAVE BEEN MADE AND ONE OF THESE REPRESENTS AN IMPORTANT COMPROMISE.

SPECIFICALLY, S. 1992 CONTAINS A LIBERALIZED BAILOUT PROVISION WHICH WAS ADOPTED AT THE TIME OF THE MARK-UP BY

THE HOUSE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE. UNDER THIS NEW PROCEDURE, JURISDICTIONS COVERED UNDER THE ACT'S SPECIAL PROVISIONS, INCLUDING SECTION 5 PRECLEARANCE, CAN BAILOUT MORE EASILY THAN IF PRESENT LAW WERE EXTENDED. S. 895 AND H.R. 3112, AS INTRODUCED, WOULD HAVE CONTINUED THE EXISTING AND MORE STRINGENT "BAILOUT PROCEDURES". IN MY VIEW, THIS CHANGE REPRESENTS A MAJOR ACCOMMODATION AND I SHARE THE BELIEF OF THE HOUSE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE THAT IT "WILL PROVIDE THE NECESSARY INCENTIVES TO THE COVERED JURISDICTIONS TO COMPLY WITH LAWS PROTECTING THE VOTING RIGHTS OF MINORITIES," AND THUS ALLOW THEM TO ACHIEVE EXEMPTION FROM THE ACT'S SPECIAL REQUIREMENTS.

MR. CHAIRMAN, I AM WELL AWARE THAT THIS REVISED "BAIL-OUT" PROCEDURE WILL BE THE SUBJECT OF MUCH DISCUSSION AT YOUR HEARINGS. ALSO CERTAIN TO BE DISCUSSED EXTENSIVELY IS THE AMENDMENT TO SECTION 2 OF THE VOTING RIGHTS ACT PROPOSED IN S. 1992.

THE AMENDMENT TO SECTION 2 IS NEEDED TO CLARIFY THE BURDEN OF PROOF IN VOTING DISCRIMINATION CASES AND THUS REMOVE THE UNCERTAINTY CAUSED BY THE FAILURE OF THE SUPREME COURT TO ARTICULATE A CLEAR STANDARD IN CITY OF MOBILE V. BOLDEN. IN BOLDEN, FOUR MEMBERS OF THE COURT INTERPRETED SECTION 2 TO REQUIRE THAT VIOLATIONS OF THE SECTION BE BASED ON SPECIFIC EVIDENCE OF DISCRIMINATORY PURPOSE. PRIOR TO BOLDEN, A VIOLATION IN VOTING DISCRIMINATION CASES COULD BE SHOWN BY REFERENCE TO A VARIETY OF FACTORS THAT WHEN TAKEN TOGETHER ADDED UP TO A FINDING OF ILLEGAL DISCRIMINATION. IN BOLDEN, THE PLURALITY APPEARS TO HAVE ABANDONED THIS "TOTALITY OF CIRCUMSTANCES" TEST AND TO HAVE REPLACED IT WITH A REQUIREMENT OF SPECIFIC EVIDENCE OF DISCRIMINATORY PURPOSE.

BY REQUIRING SPECIFIC EVIDENCE OF "INTENT" TO DISCRIMINATE, THE PLURALITY IN BOLDEN PLACES A VIRTUALLY IMPOSSIBLE BURDEN ON PLAINTIFFS. NOW, PLAINTIFFS MUST REACH BACK INTO TIME AND PRODUCE DIRECT EVIDENCE OF DISCRIMINATORY PURPOSE. THIS "SMOKING GUN" REQUIREMENT IS A CRIPPLING BLOW TO THE OVERALL EFFECTIVENESS OF THE ACT. CONGRESS HAS THE CONSTITUTIONAL AUTHORITY TO CORRECT THE PLURALITY'S MISINTERPRETATION OF CONGRESSIONAL INTENT IN BOLDEN AND RESTORE THE ORIGINAL MEANING OF SECTION 2. OUR AMENDMENT TO SECTION 2 WOULD DO JUST THAT. SPECIFICALLY, S. 1992 WOULD AMEND SECTION 2 BY MAKING CLEAR THAT A VIOLATION EXISTS IN THOSE SITUATIONS WHERE THE CHALLENGED CONDUCT RESULTS IN A DENIAL OR ABRIDGMENT OF THE RIGHT TO VOTE.

I UNDERSTAND THAT SOME HAVE EXPRESSED CONCERN ABOUT THE PROPOSED AMENDMENT TO SECTION 2 IN S. 1992. IT HAS BEEN SAID THAT THIS NEW LANGUAGE MAY LEAD TO A STATUTORY REQUIREMENT OF PROPORTIONAL REPRESENTATION FOR MINORITY VOTERS. I THINK THESE CONCERNS ARE UNFOUNDED. AS THE ORIGINAL SPONSOR OF S. 895, I CAN SAY UNEQUIVOCALLY THAT THE LANGUAGE IN S. 895 AND H.R. 3112, AS INTRODUCED, DID NOT

HAVE ANY SUCH MEANING. HOWEVER, TO MAKE SURE THAT THERE WOULD BE NO DOUBT ABOUT THE IMPACT OF THE PROPOSED AMENDMENT TO SECTION 2, THE HOUSE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE ADDED SPECIFIC LANGUAGE ON THIS VERY POINT:

> THE FACT THAT MEMBERS OF A MINORITY GROUP HAVE NOT BEEN ELECTED IN NUMBERS EQUAL TO THE GROUP'S PROPORTION OF THE POPULATION, SHALL NOT, IN AND OF ITSELF, CONSTITUTE A VIOLATION OF THIS SECTION.

MR. CHAIRMAN, I WOULD LIKE TO THANK YOU FOR THE OPPORTUNITY TO APPEAR HERE TODAY. I LOOK FORWARD TO OUR WORKING TOGETHER IN THE WEEKS AHEAD AND TO WRITING WHAT I HOPE WILL BE THE FINAL CHAPTER IN THE VERY LONG AND DIFFICULT SAGA THAT HAS OCCUPIED THIS NATION FOR WELL OVER A CENTURY: THE STRUGGLE TO GUARANTEE THE RIGHT TO VOTE FOR ALL AMERICANS.

Senator HATCH. Senator Kennedy, we will take your testimony at this point.

STATEMENT OF HON. EDWARD M. KENNEDY, A U.S. SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF MASSACHUSETTS

Senator KENNEDY. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate that.

I would like to have my statement prir ted in its entirety in the record. We have a number of witnesses—many have come from out of town—whom I think we ought to hear from. I intend to be around during the course of these hearings, and I would like to hear from Mr. Hooks, Vilma Martinez, and Ms. Hinerfeld from the League of Women Voters, if we could.

Senator HATCH. I hope you want to hear from Dr. Berns also, Senator.

Let me just say this: We will put your full statement in the record. I have read it. I would like to just ask you one question and maybe discuss a few other points for a minute.

The specific application of the proposed new "results" standard in section 2 confuses me, for instance. Suppose, for example, that we are considering a hypothetical new mayor of Boston. Suppose that Boston has a minority population of approximately 22.4 percent. And suppose that Boston has a city council of approximately 11 percent minorities. This is slightly less than one-half of the minorities' representation in the population. Suppose further that the city of Boston elected its representatives on an at-large basis, a system of government that, as you know, many civil rights advocates consider unconstitutional. Suppose further that there was at least some credible evidence that the voting patterns in the minority and non-minority communities in Boston varied in some significant respects. Suppose too that there had been a history of segregated schools in Boston. Suppose that my exemplary mayor had a predecessor who had acknowledged in the newspapers a certain history of racial discrimination in Boston. Assume finally that the U.S. Civil Rights Commission had indicated that there was "a great deal of unfinished business of civil rights" in Boston. Let us assume all this.

Can you offer this mayor any assurances and, if so, specifically what assurances that he will not have the Justice Department, or the Lawyers Committee for Civil Rights, or the NAACP Legal Defense Fund suing the city of Boston upon passage of this act under the new "results" test? And what assurances could you offer to this mayor that his constituents in Boston are not going to have these organizations coming into his community and suing him and the community to dismantle its entire system of government?

This is a purely hypothetical situation of course, but I would like to have your response.

Senator KENNEDY. Supposing you write it out for me, and I will give you a written answer.

Senator HATCH. I have written it out, and I think the point is there.

Senator KENNEDY. I know you have written it out. Why do you not make a copy?

Senator HATCH. Sure.

Senator KENNEDY. I thought these hearings were to hear witnesses this morning, and—

Senator HATCH. You were one of them.

Senator KENNEDY. We have heard a lot from some of the Senators. Let me just say that what basically we are attempting to do with our proposal is restore the rule of law as it was in the White decision.

There is no requirement for strict proportional representation at large elections, and to try and state that as part of our particular legislation is—I think the words were used earlier in the course of the hearing—a smokescreen. It basically fails to understand what the courts were dealing with in the White decision and what we are attempting to do with this legislation.

Senator Mathias' response was right on point. No matter how many times the question is asked, I think the answer is very much the same—that there is no requirement about a strict proportional representation at large elections. What will be considered is a variety of different factors, some of which have been outlined in the course of the hearings and in the committee report that was put out in the House, and I imagine there are going to be other factors to be considered by a court, not to be all inclusive. I think that is what we are getting at. That is what Senator Mathias has responded to. That is why I think this would be an important provision. No matter how many times the question is asked, that at least represents an answer.

Senator HATCH. Thank you, Senator.

I would hasten to point out about the White v. Regester decision that Mr. Justice Potter Stewart said in his Mobile decision that White v. Regester is, thus, consistent with "the basic equal protection principle that the invidious quality of a law claimed to be racially discriminatory must ultimately be traced to a racially discriminatory purpose."

I would still be interested in the application of the new "results" test to my "hypothetical" New England community.

Senator KENNEDY. The fact is, Mr. Chairman, that as I understand a case similar to the condition which you described was brought regarding the Boston School Board. I will put that into the record, and I will point out that the plaintiffs lost under the standard of White v. Regester.

Senator HATCH. We will be happy to put it in the record although I am unsure of its relevance with respect to the new proposal.

Senator KENNEDY. Thank you.

[The prepared statements of Senator Kennedy and Senator Metzenbaum follow:]

PREPARED STATEMENT OF SENATOR EDWARD M. KENNEDY

Today, the Senate Judiciary Committee begins consideration of the most important civil rights law of modern times -- the Voting Rights Act of 1965.

The Act is so crucial because the right it protects is so fundamental. The right to vote and to have that vote counted fully and fairly is essential to representative democracy. All other rights in a democracy flow from that right. Without full enjoyment of the right to vote a citizen cannot be sure he will have a fair opportunity to protect his other rights or to make the government responsive to his needs.

That is why we are here today. That is why the American people have expressed such a strong concern about the fate of the Voting Rights Act. And that is why Senator Mathias and I have introduced S. 1992 to preserve the precious protection of this Act.

There are a number of battles which this society went through in the 1960's and which we thought we had put behind us. Now, there are those who would open old wounds. On a number of fronts, they ask us to refight these old battles once again. It is a sad spectacle. But I am still hopeful that the Administration will not make that necessary -- at least in the case of voting rights.

One national commitment which the American people made in 1965 was that we would finally fulfill the proud promise of the 15th Amendment. For 100 years, the simple promise of the amendment remained largely unfulfilled. In many places blacks and other minorities could not vote.

The Voting Rights Act has ended that shameful blight for black and brown Americans. It has enabled all Americans to escape the prison of our past and to cleanse the stain of that past from our national conscience. The Voting Rights Act more than any other law symbolizes the fundamental decisions which America made two decades ago.

Twice before, in 1970 and 1975, the crucial provisions of the Act have been extended. Each time the Act has come under attack. But each time, the Congress on a bipartisan basis has come to its rescue. In 1975, the Act's protections was also extended to Hispanic Americans and other language minorities who have been the victim of similar discrimination in the right to vote.

Today, once more, the question before us is whether a strong, effective Voting Rights Act will continue to protect millions of our citizens. Or, will the Act be crippled under the guise of "streamlining" it, and making it more "reasonable?" We have heard those offers to revise the Act before. All too often they are code words for sophisticated efforts to gut the most successful civil rights law of our time. The choice is clear. We must not let that happen.

In the weeks ahead, we will hear a lot of technical discussion about "bail-out" and"intent test", about bilingual elections and Section 5 preclearance. But make no mistake about it. The issue to which those terms refer are not mere technicalities. They go to the core of our commitment to protect the right of every American to participate in the political process.

What is more, the American people understand that these are not minor technicalities. Civil Rights Groups, Bar Associations, religious and public interest organizations and individuals from all parts of the country who want a strong Act all understand that these are crucial questions. They know what this fight is all about. And they too are determined that this great law shall not be crippled.

As we hear the witnesses and review the record, it is important that we keep the central issues in focus. Today I want to emphasize five main points.

First, the Voting Rights Act is still needed,particularly the preclearance requirement of Section 5.

Second, the bill which Senator Mathias and I introduced with 59 of our colleagues and which the House passed by a 389-24 vote, is a reasonable compromise. It does not represent insistence on our druthers without any effort to accommodate the concerns of others. It is a significant revision of the bill which we introduced last Spring. The inclusion in this second bill, S. 1992, of a new liberalized bail-out procedure for those jurisdictions covered by Section 5 is a substantial modification of the law. It represents a major concession by those of us who favored the strongest possible legislation.

Third, it the bail-out is amended further, there is a serious danger that the extension of Section 5 will prove a hollow victory. A flimsey bail-out provision would become a seive. It would serve as a backdoor exit for many jurisdictions where the preclearance provision of Section 5 is still needed. It would be an indirect repeal of Section 5.

Fourth, we must be wary of the scare tactics and mis-information that will be used against the proposed amendment to Section 2 of the Voting Rights Act. We have already heard extremely misleading statements of what the law has been and of what our amendment would do. In fact, the Mathias-Kennedy bill would restore the law in voting discrimination cases to what it has been for most of the past 15 years.

The courts have made clear that under the standard in our bill there is no right to a quota or to proportional representation, even in the context of at large elections. Some have alleged that our bill would strike down at large elections unless minorities elected a proprotional share of the candidates. That allegation is false and misleading. The witnesses who will come before you will meet it head on. It is precisely the kind fo scare tactic which we do not need in dissussing something as scared and fundamental as the right to vote.

The last major point which I hope this Committe and the public will keep in mind concerns the bilingual election provisons of the Act. These provisions have proven successcul in bringing thousands of Americans into the political process who were previously unable or hesitant to participate because of their inability to speak and read English. We should keep faith with these Hispanic American, Asian American, and Native Americans. We should assure them that despite effort to undermine these provisions, they will be retained.

THE NEED FOR SECTION 5

To understand the continued need for the Voting Rights Act, it is necessary to remember its orgins. The Civil Rights Act of 1957 and 1960 had authorized the Attorney General to seek injunctions against discrimination. Many time consuming private and government lawsuits were brought.

The key to the Voting Rights Act was the preclearance requirement which put the burden of time and inertia on those proposing a new scheme. A new law has to be approved before it could be implemented.

The initial effort to implement the Voting Rights Act focused on black registration. More than a million black citizens were added to the voting rolls from 1965 to 1972. But registration is only the threshold hurdle to full, effective participation in the political process. As the Supreme Court has said:

> "The right to vote can be affected by dilution of voting power, as well as by absolute prohibition on casting a ballot."

Opponents of the dramatic rise in registration sought to cancel the impact of the new black vote. A broad array of dilution schemes have been tried. Elective posts were made appointive; election boundaries were gerrymandered; majority runoffs were instituted to prevent victories under a prior plurality system; at-large elections were substituted for single-member election districts, or combined with other sohphisticated rules to prevent an effective minority vote. The ingenuity of such schemes seems endless. Their common purpose has been to neutralize the gains made at the ballot box under the Act.

Congress anticipated this response. The preclearance provisions of Section 5 were designed to halt such efforts. Upholding the constitutionality of Section 5, the Supreme Court noted:

> "Congress knew that some of the states covered by Section 4(b) of the Act had resorted to the extraordinary strategem of contriving new rules of various kinds for the sole purpose perpetuating voting discrimination in the face of adverse federal court decreees. Congress had reason to suppose that these states might try similar maneuvers in the future in order to evade the remedies for discrimination contained in the Act itself."

Once the Supreme Court made clear that the Act required review of any new laws in covered areas which could directly or indirectly impair the right to vote, Section 5 became both the centerpiece of the Voting Rights Act and the main target of efforts to undermine it.

Some opponents of the Act may still claim at this late date that the scope and administraion of Seciton 5 has run beyond the intent of Congress. That is simply incorrect. Not only has the Supreme Court repeatedly reaffirmed that Congress sought a broad safeguard against anticipated ingenious counter-schemes; Congress itself has ratified that broad reading in the course of the 1970 and 1975 extensions of the Act.

At the beginning of this Congress there were many who questioned the continued need for the stringent safeguards of Section 5. Now those voices are far fewer. The hearings in the House Judiciary Committee vividly demonstrated continuing efforts to deny minorities fair and equal access to the political process. Witness after witness warned that without the continued protection of Seciton 5 in their area, the advances of a decade could be wiped out in the short time it would take to impose new discriminatory schemes.

I am concerned about the need for further progress. But I am even more concerned about the risk of losing what has already been won. Those who fought the battles know how fragile the victories really are.

In recent years there has been a steady number of objections under Section 5. In fact, while more than 800 proposed changes have been objected to since 1965, well over half of those objections have been entered since the last time the Act was extended in 1975.

All too often, the background of those changes -- the absence of an innocent explanation, or the departure from past practice as minority voting strength approaches a new level -- demonstrates a continuing intent to dilute the minority vote, and a continuing need for the Act.

Many of the practices are complex and subtle. Sophisticated rules regarding redistricting may seem part of the everyday rough-and-tumble of American politics -- tactics used traditionally by the "ins" against the "outs." However, we must view such schemes in the context of repeated efforts to perpetuate past voting discrimination, and to undermine the results of the Voting Rights Act. The repetition of the same pattern over and over, as these rules were adopted in the late 1960's and early 1970's as black voting strength emerged, was hardly a coincidence.

Perhaps the best testimonial to the continued need for Section 5 was the conversion of representative Henry Hyde, after he had attended the House hearings. Admitting his initial hostility to extension of the administrative preclearance mechanism and his preference for litigation in court, Representative Hyde wrote this in the House Committee Report:

> Reluctantly I came to embrace the conclusion that administrative enforcement is indeed a practical necessity; the risks of continued voting rights abuse are too great to fall victim to philosophical purity.

Nor is the issue any longer whether Section 5 should be dissipated by applying it nationwide. The recent objection to redistricting in New York City was a vivid reminder that the preclearance provisions apply to parts of 22 states. The President has abandoned his earlier support for that position. And Representative Hyde has candidly admitted that making Section 5 nationwide "would strengthen the Act to death."

Thus, a frontal assault on Section 5 is no longer very credible. Instead the focus has shifted to revising the bail-out provisions of the Act by which jurisdictions may remove themselves from Section 5 coverage.

THE BAIL-OUT COMPROMISE

There is a bail-out provision in the current law. It is linked to the last discriminatory use of literacy tests. Therefore, in most jurisdictions it has not been available during the period of their preclearance coverage.

Our original legislation did not include any new bail-out because Senator Mathias and I did not believe that an additional one was clearly justified.

I am still not convinced that the case for an additional bail-out has been made. The preclearance provisions have worked fairly and effectively without undue burden on the covered jurisdictions.

However, a compromise was forged during the House deliberations which was designed to give jurisdictions an incentive to improve their records and to demonstrate full acceptance of minority participation. The provision reported by the Committee and passed overwhelmingly and adopted by the House is a fair and effective provision. This compromise was opposed on the House floor by some who argued that it was an impossible bail-out and offered only false hope to covered jurisdictions. I believe the bail-out is a tough, but fair and reasonable. It is tough , as it should be, for it is not designed to remove the protection of preclearance without very clear proof that it is no longer needed. Jurisdictions could bail out if they have fully complied with the provision of the Voting Rights Act for the past ten years; have eliminated discriminatory procedures; and have demonstrated that they accept participation of minorities through constructive efforts such as reasonabley accessible registration, effortsto combat voter intimidation, and similar reforms. Informed estimates are that some 200 of the 800 covered counties in the wholely covered states would be eligible to apply for bail-out when the provisions go into effect in 1984.

This addition of a new bail-out provison was a major concession and should expedite renewal of the Act. It is appropriate for the Senate to focus our efforts on swift passage of the House bill which had such overwhelming bipartisan support.

This provision contains a second major concession. Under current law, if an entire state is covered by Section 5, a county within that state may not bail-out on its own, no matter how good its record. Our bill allows individual counties to bail-out without have to wait for the rest of their state, as long as they can meet the new criteria. Efforts to weaken this new bail-out further in the House of Representatives were rejected decisively. They shoud be rejected by this Committee as well.

Nonetheless, some Senators have served notice that they will try to weaken the bail-out procedure. Alternative bail-out provisions which will be offered have loopholes that would permit a majority of those jurisdictions where Section 5 is still needed to end their coverage. If they do, the bail-out will turn out to be an escape hatch which leaves the vaunted protections of Section 5 an empty shell. We will have several days of detailed testimony on the bail-out issue. I urge my colleagues to listen to the testimony with this warning in mind. The burden is on those who would loosen the compromise bail-out provisionsin the House bill to show specifically why they are unworkable or unfair. I do not believe they will be able to do so.

AMENDMENT OF SECITON 2 OF THE VOTING RIGHRS ACT

Section 2 of the Voting Rights Act is the general prohibition of practices which deny or abridge the right to vote. S. 1992, like the House passed bill, would add clarifying language to Section 2 so that it would explicitly state that any practice which "results" in such denial or abridgement is prohibited.

If the Attorney General or private plaintiffs challenge a practice in a jurisdiction not covered by the preclearance obligation of Section 5, they must sue under Section 2. In addition, Section 2 is the only recourse even in areas covered by Section 5 for laws or practices adopted prior to 1965.

An effective, usable Section 2 is an essential part of the Act. However, the recent Supreme Court decision of Mobile v. Bolden cast a heavy cloud over Section 2's availability to challenge discrimination. A statutory amendment is needed to clarify the section and return the law to the originel understanding of Congress that Section 2 would reach discriminatory results, whether or not plaintiffs proves a discriminatory purpose.

Opponents of the amendment assert that it would introduce a new and unprecedented standard; that it departs from the original intent of Congress and that it is unconstitutional. Most of all, in the face of repeated statements of the amendment's scope, they persist in the inaccurate assertion that the proposed "results" test would constitute a "quota requirement" of proportional representation.

These hearings will subject these assertions to close scrutiny. Detailed legal memoranda will be supplied on these claims. I am confident that the record ultimately will make clear they are incorrect, In fact, the amendment of Section 2 in S. 1992:

--reflects the original understanding of Congress in 1965;
--restores the legal standard that applied for most of the past 15 years;
--is constitutional; and
--would not require quotas.

Section 2, as amended would not make mere failure of minorities to win proportional representation a violation, even if that came as the result of at large elections. Plaintiffs would have to prove additional factors establishing that, in the total circumstances minority voters not only failed "to win" but were effectively shut out of a fair opportunity participate in the election.

BILINGUAL ELECTION ASSISTANCE

The fifth fundamental issue of extension of the bilingual election assistance provisions of present law. These provisions do not expire until 1985. But we should make clear our commitment to provide a sufficient opportunity for these provisions to achieve their purpose. It is particularly important that we so do in view of the fact that bills have been introduced to repeal these provisions during the current extension of the Act.

Similar efforts were overwhelmingly rejected in the House. Those votes reflect the compelling record compiled in the House committee on the Judiciary.

Two kinds of arguments were made against these provisions in the House; their alleged burden and their alleged impact on the American Melting Pot tradition. Each was properly rejected.

After the initial start-up and targeting efforts, the administrative burden and cost is not excessive. Congressman Paul McCloskey of California, who questioned these provisions, acknowledged this when he testified in the House:

"It can no longer be argued that the cost is excessive for the bilingual ballot."

New York State Attorney General Robert Abrams agreed with that verdict.

The theoretical argument has been that such bilingual assistance might make language minority Americans more separate and insulate them from the mainstream of American society. I think that argument stands logic on its head. History teaches us that the best way to avoid insularity is to bring people into the political process; not to make them feel shut out. An editorial last September in the San Diego Union put it well:

> As for bilingual separtism, we do not see that as a real danger in America ...bilingual voting, at best is a temporary measure, a make-shift measure to give older Spanish-speaking citizens the sense of full participation in our democracy. The younger members of the community are moving rapidly away from linguistic isolation.

We should not turn our backs now on the thousands of older Americans who, through no fault of their own, simply have not had the opportunity to learn English well enough to vote without painful embarrassement and dangerous confusion.

I expect this Subcommittee to hold fair and expeditious hearings. I expect the full Committee on the Judiciary to meet on this measure and report it promptly to the full Senate. And I am confident that, working together, members of Congress and concerned Americans from all parts of this country will ensure that the Voting Rights Act emerges from this process strong and intact.

Black Voters v. McDonough, 565 F.2d 1 (1st Cir. 1977).

Challenge to at-large election of members of the Boston, Massachusetts school committee.

Holding in favor of defendants.

Results test applied:

> The Court of Appeals expressed some concern that, after Washington v. Davis, 426 U.S. 229 (1976), and Village of Arlington Heights v. Metropolitan Housing Development Corp., 429 U.S. 252 (1977), intent may be required in a dilution case. 565 F.2d at 4, n. 6. However, the Court proceeded with a results analysis, and the found the plaintiffs lacking. Therefore, there was no need to resolve the intent issue. What is important is that, under the results analysis, the First Circuit said at-large systems are not unconstitutional per se, proportional representation is not required, and more than a scintilla of evidence is necessary to prove a violation.
> Multi-member schemes "will be struck down only when the challenger carries a burden of proving that the system was instituted to further racially discriminatory purposes or that the effect of the method is to 'minimize or cancel out the voting strength of racial or political elements of the voting population.'" 565 F.2d at 4, quoting Fortson v. Dorsey, 379 U.S. 433, 439 (1965).

Proportional representation not required.

At-large elections not unconstitutional per se:

> "Any analysis of the at-large system under attack must begin with an acknowledgement that multi-member districts are not per se invalid." 565 F.2d at 4.

More than a scintilla of evidence is required in addition the absence of black elected officials:

> Plaintiffs proved a number of factors, including history of discrimination, large district, no residency requirement, recent racial campaign tactics, no blacks elected, black voter alienation, intimidation of black candidates in the community, and unresponsiveness. Yet this evidence was not enough.

PREPARED STATEMENT OF SENATOR HOWARD M. METZENBAUM

Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the opportunity to testify before the Subcommittee on the Constitution on what I regard as perhaps the most significant piece of legislation we will address in the 97th Congress—the amendment of the Voting Rights Act of 1965.

As Senators, we are keenly aware of the importance of the right of each and every citizen to participate in the political process by voting. The legitimacy of our place in the Senate is derived from the legitimacy of each election and the fairness of the American electoral system. As elected officials, we have a responsibility to preserve and to protect the right of every citizen to vote freely and privately without regard to race, language or handicap. As Senators, our voice in the Congress and throughout the Nation is the voice of the people who elect us. It is this right to vote which makes ours a nation truly of, for and by the people.

This is why we must give top priority to the passage of this legislation. This is why, frankly Mr. Chairman, I was disapointed at the administration's request for a sudden postponement of the initial day of hearings one week ago. We have no time to waste. The core of the current voting Rights Act expires in just over six months. We cannot afford to let this expiration date pass. I hope that the 62 Senators who have cosponsored S. 1992, a bill identical to the one passed overwhelmingly by the House by a vote of 389—24, will prevail. Justice demands that this bipartisan group succeed in its efforts to protect all cittizens' right to vote. Those of us concerned about a meaningful extension of this act will not relax our efforts until that end is achieved.

I might add that I'm pleased the administration has finally given us at least part of its position on extension of the Voting Rights Act. But I'm disappointed that by refusing to adopt a section 2 "reesults test" the administration still has not put itself squarely in favor of meaningful extension of the act.

The Voting Rights Act of 1965 is often called the most effective piece of civil rights legislation this country has ever had. It was enacted to "assure that the right of citizens of the United States to vote is not denied or abridged on account of race of color . . . in any Federal State or local election."

In two years the number of Blacks registered to vote in the six States fully covered under the special provisions of the act increased from 29.3 percent to 52 percent. By 1971, the figure had increased to 71 percent.

The number of black officials elected in the South jumped from less than 100 in 1964 to 1,100 in 1974. Now that figure is estimated at closer to 2,000.

More recent attempts to bring other disenfranchised citizens into the voting booth have had similar positive results. In the past five years, the number of Hispanics registered to vote in New York has risen 20 percent. In Texas in five years the number of Hispanic elected officials has jumped 30 percent.

Since enactment, the act has been gradually strengthened and continually reaffirmed. New provisions have been added to deal with new problems. The bilingual ballot provision is an example of this. And despite the constant attempts to weaken or to destroy it, the original act and all strengthening amendments have always passed the Congress with solid bi-partisan majorities in both Chambers.

Once again, the Congress is addressing this piece of legislation as its provisions are due to expire. And once again we are faced with attempts to weaken this legislation which has been so necessary and so effective.

Ironically much of the case for weakening the act is based on its past success. The act, we are told, has served its purpose. It has brought about the desired improvement. It is therefore no longer needed, we are told.

The reasoning behind this argument is not only faulty, but it is more than a bit disturbing. It resupposes that there is an acceptable level of voting rights violations. Obviously, there is no such thing. If even one person is denied the right to cast a ballot, there is a need for the Voting Rights Act.

The purpose of the Voting Rights Act is not to reward progress against discrimination. Nor is it to punish past discriminatory acts. It is plainly and simply to end all discrimination at the polls and ensure everyone the right to a free vote.

Moreover, contrary to claims of those that want to weaken voting rights guarantees, the continuing need for voting rights legislation is obvious. The days of poll taxes and literacy tests may be mostly behind us, thanks to enactment of the original Voting Rights Act. But though the methods have changed, dicrimination still exists. As the chairman of the House Committee on the Judiciary, Peter Rodino, said during House consideration of voting rights legislation last October:

Time and again we were told by witnesses (at subcommittee hearings) of ingenious schemes designed to deny citizens their rights to vote or to dilute the strength of their ballot. The list of ploys—dual registration, reregistration, gerrymandering, at-large elections, annexations, intimidation, inconvenience to name a few—is limited only by the imagination.

And as the Civil Rights Commission found in a report issued last year:

"In a study of voting problems in 70 jurisdictions covered by the pre-clearance provisions, some minorities found registration officials discourteous, or openly hostile and intimidating when they attempted to register. Requests for unnecessary personal information by officials also were found to intimidate minorities . . . the present attitudes of registrars deter minorities from registering.

". . . registration in the jurisdictions studied often took place in locations or at times that were particularly inconvenient for minorities.

". . . minorities continued to be harassed or intimidated by election officials when they attempted to vote."

The protections of the Voting Rights Act are still clearly needed.

Mr. Chairman, you have before your subcommittee several bills which amend the Voting Rights Act in different respects.

Frankly, three of those bills are grossly unfair and inadequate. S. 53, which repeals the Voting Rights Act's bilingual protections, is totally unacceptable. These provisions are essential to protecting the voting rights of millions of foreign language minority voters.

S. 1761 extends the pre-clearance provisions nationwide. That may sound good on its face, but, in fact, extending the act's coverage nationwide would create such enforcement burdens that the act's effectiveness would be totally destroyed.

S. 1975 is also grossly inadequate. It simply will not protect against the disenfranchisement of voting minorities. The bill is deficient in several respects:

1. It will cripple enforcement of the act by requiring those challenging specific discriminatory practices to demonstrate intent to discriminate. By requiring in essence a "smoking gun" before any practice can be outlawed, the bill would jeopardize the voting rights of millions of Americans.

2. It would not extend the act's current protection for bilingual voters for a sufficiently long period of time. According to House testimony, as I mentioned earlier, these bilingual provisions currently avoid the effective disenfranchisement of countless language minority Americans.

3. And finally, the bill creates a virtual bail-out sieve. It essentially guarantees to jurisdictions whose past discriminatory acts have been challenged, an escape from the act's automatic preclearance provisions. S. 1975's bail-out provisions are the exceptions that swallow the rule.

With all due modesty, Mr. Chairman, the bill that Senator Kennedy and Mathias and I have introduced along with 59 other Senators—S. 1992—is the only way to extend the Voting Rights Act and still provide adequate protection to voting minorities. The bill, which, as I mentioned, passed the House by an overwhelming 389-24 vote, does the following essential things:

1. It extends until 1984 the Act's current section 5 pre-clearance provisions. It then provides for a reasonable and achievable bail-out for political jurisdictions which have complied with the act in the past; have made no use of discriminatory election laws or devices; and have taken positive steps toward including more minority citizens in the electoral process. It is estimated that 20-25 precent of the counties now subject to pre-clearance obligations will be eligible to bail out as soon as the bail-out provisions become applicable.

2. It clarifies the language in section 2 to prohibit practices that have a discriminatory result, without requiring specific proof of a direct purpose to discriminate. This change is made necessary by the Supreme Court's plurality decision in Mobile v. Bolden. It will conform the test for discrimination to that which was in the minds of the framers of the original Voting Rights Act of 1965.

3. It continues until August 6, 1992, the requirement of bilingual election materials and voting assistance.

For many years, millions of nonwhite citizens in this country were forced to earn the right to vote by passing literacy tests—or to pay for this right through poll taxes. Or worse still, they were coerced not to use the right at all rather than have to undergo the intimidation that accompanied attempts to register or cast a ballot.

Ultimately, they were compelled to fight for the right to the ballot box. They marched. They went to jail. They aroused the conscience of this country and forced those in power to guarantee them their civil rights.

The right to vote, guaranteed by the original act of 1965, was a hard won right. We cannot sit by and let its guarantees wither. We have a responsibility to enact the strongest possible voting protection to all citizens of this country. For without the vote, it is meaningless to be called a citizen.

Mr. Chairman, I urge your subcommittee to pass S. 1992 at the earliest possible date and give the rest of us on the committee and in the Senate as a whole an opportunity to do justice.

Thank you.

Senator HATCH. Our next witness will be Prof. Walter Berns, who is resident fellow at the American Enterprise Institute in Washington. We will have three final witnesses after that.

Dr. Berns?

STATEMENT OF PROF. WALTER BERNS, AMERICAN ENTERPRISE INSTITUTE, WASHINGTON, D.C.

Mr. BERNS. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Along with everybody else who has testified on this bill and everybody else who has expressed an opinion on it publicly at least, I believe the Voting Rights Act of 1965 is the most successful civil rights act ever enacted by the Congress.

The 15th amendment declares that the right to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, and it gives Congress the power to enforce this right by appropriate legislation. And the Voting Rights Act, without question, was and is appropriate legislation.

I will not read my whole statement and therefore will skip some parts as they appear in the statement. In that opening statement, I do of course refer to the tremendous success that has been achieved by means of the Voting Rights Act, and I also point out that voting is, in my opinion, the principal security for civil rights. I also point out that I was persuaded by the hearings in the House that there are some jurisdictions, perhaps still more or less remote jurisdictions, where the right to vote is being denied, and I conclude from this fact that Federal supervision continues to be needed.

So I am in favor of extending, as it were, the various provisions of the act that permit this Federal supervision.

Nevertheless—and here I get to the substance of my statement—I am opposed to the bill which has been introduced here, because I gather that bill is identical to the bill that passed the House. My opposition is confined to the amended section 2 of the bill, and in stating my opposition I will do my best to avoid use of the word "intent" and so forth.

In its original form, section 2 was a mere declaration or statutory restatement, as you said, Mr. Chairman, of the 15th amendment. In its amended form, the words "to deny or abridge the right to vote" have been deleted. In their place have been put the words "in a manner which results in a denial or abridgement of the right to vote."

This new language will make section 2 the key section of the act, one that will affect the electoral laws, practices, and arrangements of every political subdivision in the country—Baltimore, Boston, Utah, as well as Rome, Ga.

It will authorize—indeed, it will foster, in my opinion—suits against these jurisdiction, suits alleging that the way they apportion seats, the way they organize their governing units, the way they count their votes, even the way they define themselves, have the effect of abridging not the right to vote but, rather, of abridging the electoral power of a group of voters, and it of course will make the Federal courts the supreme electoral lawgivers.

I find it difficult to believe that this is actually what the Congress wants, and I am rather certain that it is not what the States, the counties, and the cities want. If this legislation is adopted, they will be deprived of the authority to decide for themselves how to organize themselves.

When in 1965 this authority was taken from southern States—mostly southern States—and handed over to the Justice Department and Federal courts, it was understood to be "a draconian measure," necessitated only by the egregious behavior of those States. It was understood to be a temporary measure.

The offending States and local jurisdictions could bail out if they behaved. Now, it will in effect be applied everywhere to every State and with no opportunity of their ever bailing out.

In a very real sense this amended section 2 will make the bailout section, section 4 of the act, superfluous, and it will make the preclearance section of the act superfluous. It will do this by authorizing the Federal judiciary—whose members I do not have to remind this committee are subject to no man's suffrage—to rewrite every law affecting the results of elections.

The House report on this bill makes no attempt to conceal this. This new section 2 language is intended to express the difference between, on the one hand, the right to vote and, on the other hand, what the Justice Department and the Federal courts have made of the right to vote.

And what have they made of the right to vote? Quite simply, for some groups it is the right to be represented in proportion to their numbers in the community. I say this because the amended section 2 is intended avowedly to reverse the Supreme Court's decision in City of Mobile and bring it into line with the Court's decision in City of Rome v. United States.

The latter was a Voting Rights Act case, the former, a 15th amendment case. A Voting Rights Act case applies only to designated jurisdictions; a 15th amendment case applies everywhere. According to Mobile, a plaintiff must show discriminatory intent. According to Rome, a State, county, or city bears the burden of showing that its electoral laws, its practices, and its arrangements do not have a discriminatory effect. And what, according to City of Rome—and to mention one other important case that thus far this morning has not been mentioned in this committee room, at least while I have been in it, and I have been here since 9:30; I am talking now about United Jewish Organizations v. Carey—what, according to City of Rome and UJO v. Carey, is a discriminatory effect?

It is one where the votes of blacks and of language minorities—American Indians, Asian Americans, Alaskan Natives, and persons of Spanish origins—the votes of these groups of persons are not diluted.

When is a vote diluted? When the group is deprived of the opportunity to elect one of the group; for example, to quote from UJO v. Carey, when the number of blacks in a district is not sufficient "to insure the opportunity for the election of a black representative."

As the law now stands, the law that will be part of section 2 of the Voting Rights Act if the amended section is adopted, this authorizes the Federal courts to require States to change their laws so as to insure that minorities will be elected in proportion to their numbers.

For example, New York in UJO v. Carey was required to create districts 65 percent nonwhite. To do this, New York had to engage in blatant racial gerrymandering. In redrawing its district lines, race was the only criterion employed, just as it was some 25 years ago when Alabama redrew the boundaries of the city of Tuskegee and, without removing a single white voter, managed to exclude all but a tiny fraction of Tuskegee's black voters from the city, all but 4 of a total of 400. The Supreme Court, in Gomilion v. Lightfoot, a 1960 case, a 15th amendment case, said that this was a blatant violation of the 15th amendment.

Incidentally, there is a perfect illustration of what one can do with the intent test. The Court employed it there, employed it properly, and found unanimously that Alabama had violated the 15th amendment. What Alabama in 1960 was forbidden to do, New York was required to do, and if the amended section 2 is adopted, every State in the Union—all 50—will be required to do.

One of Chief Justice Warren's legacies to American politics was the aphorism: "Legislators represent people, not trees or acres." That being so, the States were forbidden to apportion seats in either house of their legislatures on any basis other than population.

Now, according to these Voting Rights Act cases, legislators must represent not undifferentiated people, people defined only as individuals living in districts of approximately equal size, but defined as groups of people, defined by their race or language preference, and they can be said to represent them only if they are of that race or if they, if you will, prefer that language.

I am not unmindful of the fact that the amended section 2 contains this disclaimer that: "Disproportionality of results shall not in and of itself constitute a violation of this section." All that means, and all it is intended to mean, is that some factor, in addition to disproportionality, will have to be present before it can be said that a group's vote has been abridged by being diluted.

What factors? Well, they can be found in the cases already litigated, and I will not bother to go over them, especially, Mr. Chairman, since you already have had them in this room today.

Besides, whatever Congress intends, the courts are likely to treat it the same way the Supreme Court treated a somewhat similar disclaimer in the Civil Rights Act of 1964. There, Congress said specifically that nothing in title 7 of that act should be interpreted to require employers "to grant preferential treatment to any person or group because of race, color, sex, or national origin, not even to correct an imbalance which may exist with respect to the total number or percentage of persons of any race," et cetera, "employed by any employer." That was that disclaimer in title 7 of the 1964 act.

That, I would think, is clear enough, but I remind this subcommittee that the Supreme Court paid it no heed. To read this as written—that is to say, "To read this as Congress wrote it," said Justice Brennan, "would bring about an end completely at variance with the purpose of the statute," by which he meant, of course, at variance with the Court's purpose for the statute. Congress says one thing, the Supreme Court says another thing, and then Congress does nothing.

So section 2, as amended, will require proportional representation, and this, as I argue in my prepared statement, will promote racial bloc voting on the part of nonwhites and whites alike, and such voting will have unfortunate consequences.

Without going into detail here, I question whether a black can be fairly represented only by a black and not, for example, by a Peter Rodino, or that a white can be fairly represented only by a white and not, for example, by an Edward Brooke.

And I wonder, if a group's interest is defined by its race, why we bother to hold elections and what we mean by representative government. Here I will read from the concluding section of my prepared statement:

"Representative government does not imply proportional representation or any version of it that is likely to enhance bloc voting by discrete groups. The Framers of the Constitution referred to such groups as 'factions,' and they did their best to minimize their influence. The idea that a legislative assembly should be a 'mirror' or a 'reflection' of the people was advanced and advanced assiduously by the opponents of the Constitution," the group of people we call Anti-Federalists.

As one of them—Melancton Smith by name—Alexander Hamilton's powerful opponent in the New York ratifying convention—as Melancton Smith said there, "The idea that naturally suggests itself to our minds, when we speak of representatives, is that they should resemble those they represent." That is the end of the quote.

"Such an idea may naturally have suggested itself in 1787–8, as it did earlier, but the Framers of the Constitution emphatically rejected it. Representation, as they understood it, was one of the discoveries made by the new and improved 'science of politics'"—I am quoting now from "Federalist 9"—"discoveries that would, for the first time in history, make free government possible. To them, representation was a means of refining and enlarging the public views"—quoting "Federalist 10" now—"by passing them through the medium of a chosen body of citizens," this body and the House of Representatives.

"Under a proper system of representation"—still quoting—"the public voice, pronounced by representatives of the people, will be more consonant to the public good than if pronounced by the people themselves, convened for the purpose."

To conclude, "Whereas the Anti-Federalists called for small districts and, therefore, many Representatives, the Framers called for (and got) larger districts and fewer Representatives. They did so as a means of encompassing within each district 'a greater variety of parties and interests,' thus freeing the elected Representatives from an excessive dependence on the unrefined and narrow views that are likely to be expressed by particular groups of their constituents."

I have taken the trouble, Mr. Chairman, to go into some detail but not, I am sure, sufficient on this question of representative government, because, in my view, the amended section 2 of this Voting Rights Act is destructive of the principle of representation as it is embodied in the Constitution.

I repeat, you were quite right to press Senator Mathias on this point, and I wish that he were here to ask me, as a resident of Montgomery County——

Senator HATCH. Maybe I will ask you.

Mr. BERNS [continuing]. As to what the effect would be in the city of Baltimore. In my opinion, without question, the passage of the amended section 2 will foster such suits and will make it much easier to win such suits, with the result that the city of Baltimore's government will have to be restructured, just as the city of Rome's government was restructured. I think that is the express purpose of this legislation.

You were well advised indeed, it seems to me, to press this question of what are these egregious conditions in Massachusetts, in Utah, in Maryland, in Pennsylvania, in Iowa. What are they that justify the nationalization, in effect, of the Voting Rights Act all over the country?

Thank you.

Senator HATCH. I appreciate your testimony. It has been very articulate testimony. We will put your complete written statement in the record as though fully delivered.

Mr. BERNS. Mr. Chairman, I do not ask you to put that written statement in the record. It was compiled hastily out of a longer piece yesterday, and I read it again this morning.

Senator HATCH. If you would like to finish it up, we would be happy to put it in the record.

Mr. BERNS. I think it would be unjustified to spend the taxpayers' money to put that particular inelegant thing in the record.

Senator HATCH. All right. Your oral statement has been very eloquent; there is no question about that.

To clarify what I was asking Senator Mathias, as I recall, only 22 percent in Baltimore's city council are minorities, despite a 55-percent black population in the city. So when you say they would have to restructure the whole city government if this change in section 2 becomes law, what do you mean by that?

Mr. BERNS. I mean by it, Mr. Chairman, what the district court judge whose name I cannot recall—Pitman?—in Mobile—the order he handed down, which was confirmed on the circuit and then reversed by the Supreme Court, disestablished the city commission form of government and replaced it with a mayor/council system, the council members being elected in single-member districts. That was, as the Attorney General said, dramatic.

I would say it is a rather astonishing exercise of judicial power, assumed in this case to be a power coming out of the 15th amendment, simply to restructure a system of government that—you will have the facts on this, and perhaps members of your staff can inform you right now of the percentage of municipalities in this country that are governed under this particular form of government.

Senator HATCH. Two-thirds of municipalities in this country are at-large municipalities, totally acceptable under the Constitution.

Mr. BERNS. That, I assume, is what a Federal court in Baltimore will do, just as the Supreme Court did, in effect, by upholding the Justice Department in the Williamsburg district of Brooklyn in that UJO v. Carey case.

Here the question was the authority of a Federal court, really, to redraw district lines, to gerrymander. I would have assumed that if the case, Reynolds v. Sims, meant anything, it meant districts of approximately equal size of undifferentiated people and with the implicit assumption that there would be no gerrymandering. To achieve the result in UJO v. Carey, as I say, you had racial gerrymandering of a blatant sort.

Justice Frankfurter referred to the Tuskegee situation, as those lines were redrawn by the Alabama Legislature, as resulting in "an uncouth 28-sided figure." It is entirely possible that the Federal courts will be upholding gerrymandering that will make the city of Tuskegee look, by comparison, to be a perfect ellipse, if we are to achieve the results of some of these Justice Department decisions.

Senator HATCH. I would like to turn to Senator Thurmond, at this time; but just to button this down, how was the Hasidic Jewish community treated in UJO v. Carey?

Mr. BERNS. There was in fact, of course, the Hasidic community, as you say. They were a consolidated community, and they happened to live in a single assembly district, but in order to achieve the 65 percent black proportion of a district, it was necessary to redraw district lines and to split that Hasidic community in two.

In a sense, they would have a Voting Rights Act grievance if the Hasidic community were one of the designated groups under the Voting Rights Act, but of course it is not, and so they had no comparable power.

Senator HATCH. Do you anticipate that many instances like that may arise?

Mr. BERNS. If we are going to ghettoize, which in a sense is what we are doing, with respect to some groups, why not do it for all groups? Why not do it for Republicans in Cook County, Ill., or Democrats in Orange County, Calif., or for that matter Republicans in Montgomery County, Md.?

Senator HATCH. That would be an interesting thing.

Senator Thurmond?

Senator THURMOND. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Professor Berns, I want to commend you for your analysis of this bill. I may have some questions to submit for the record. I have another hearing coming up on judicial nominations, and I will have to leave at this time, but I want to thank you for your presence here and for your testimony.

Mr. BERNS. Thank you, sir.

Senator HATCH. Dr. Berns, can you elaborate a bit on the notion of "dilution" that is developed within the content of the Voting Rights Act? What is "dilution"? What, in your view, would constitute an undiluted vote, as opposed to a diluted vote? What do they look like, and how do we make this distinction?

Mr. BERNS. Quite simply, a vote is understood to be diluted—and here of course we are talking about not the vote of an individual but the vote of a group, and a group's vote is said to be diluted when its legislative representation is less than its proportion in the community. In order to overcome that, to provide the remedy for that, you redraw district lines, as the Justice Department did in UJO v. Carey, and, as I say, you gerrymander. You find people sufficient in number to insure successful representation on the part of that group.

That 65-percent figure is interesting. If a group votes as a bloc, one would suppose that a district 50 + 1 would be large enough to achieve the result desired, but the Justice Department did not settle on 50 percent plus 1; it required the State of New York, which was under pressure of course to hold the 1974 primary and general elections—and I presume that is why they went along with it without too much arguing—it required the State of New York to build districts with 65 percent blacks.

Why a 65-percent ratio if the purpose is not to insure a sufficient number of blacks to insure the election of a black?

As it turned out of course, in four of the five districts involved in that case, in the subsequent election four of them elected whites, because the Justice Department had underestimated the amount of voter nonturnout.

One therefore wonders whether in subsequent cases the Justice Department, with the approval of the courts, will really look at voter turnout, which in those sections of Brooklyn may have been as low as 10 percent and was almost surely as low as 20 percent for certain groups, and will insist that districts be designed that are 80 or 90 percent of a nonwhite group.

Incidentally, if you were, Mr. Chairman, a partisan Republican, a very narrowly partisan Republican, you ought to support this legislation.

Senator HATCH. That is right.

Mr. BERNS. You are not, but if you were——

Senator HATCH. I agree.

Mr. BERNS. You would want to support this legislation because its tendency will be to build black districts, and the more black districts you can build, or—to put it this way—the more blacks you can pack into one electoral district, the more Democratic that district will become, and the more Republican will become the surrounding districts. It is a plain case of gerrymandering.

Senator HATCH. And that is certainly the way it is going to be used if section 2 is passed in its present form.

So the very people that this law is supposed to help are ultimately going to wind up being hurt as far as electoral influence in this country is concerned, if the proposed changes are made. Am I correct in saying that?

Mr. BERNS. Yes indeed, sir.

Senator HATCH. Could you elaborate upon your assertion that the results test is somewhat predicated upon the assumption that only blacks can represent blacks and only whites can represent whites? How is that premise implicit in this test?

Mr. BERNS. I think it is implicit in the Justice Department's order to the State of New York, which is part of the law. I want to make that point clear. This will be part of the law that is embodied in the amended section 2. Those instructions were to build the election districts sufficiently black—nonwhite in this case actually; it was not simply black, it was nonwhite.

And that raises another argument of course, sir, because the Puerto Ricans there objected to the fact that they did not have their district. What do they mean by "their district"? They mean a district where they can elect a Puerto Rican.

The 65 business, which is part of the law or will be part of the law, is intended to achieve the result of electing a member of the group that is packed into an electoral district. That is the only way it can be interpreted. Otherwise, why do it?

Senator HATCH. Proponents of the results test argue that their objective is not the implementation of a system of proportional representation but simply an equal opportunity to participate in the electoral process.

One of our later witnesses, Mr. Hooks, who is head of the NAACP, refers to this criticism as a "scare tactic". How do you account for such fundamental disagreement on whether or not the results test has anything to do with proportional representation?

Mr. BERNS. I acknowledge, as we all did earlier this morning, that I can be wrong, and Mr. Hooks may be right. I would, if I were in your position, ask him how he interprets UJO v. Carey.

Senator HATCH. And the Hasidic Jew problem?

Mr. BERNS. Sure; of course they have a grievance. If it is assumed that a white can only be represented by a white and the Spanish-speaking person only by a Spanish-speaking representative, and so forth and so on, why not a pious Jew represented by a pious Jew or a Republican in Cook County, Ill., represented by a Republican? That would require an upheaval.

Senator HATCH. That would be shocking, I can tell you.

Can you elaborate on what seems to be a rather summary rejection in your statement of the disclaimer provision in section 2 that states expressly that "proportional representation in and of itself is not the object of the results test"?

Mr. BERNS. The question is what did the House mean and what did the 62 Senators who have supported this bill mean when they said, "in and of itself"? That means that disproportionality, in and of itself, is not sufficient to constitute a violation of this section, but disproportionality in addition to one other factor.

Senator HATCH. One other factor?

Mr. BERNS. One other factor, and then the question is, can you find that other factor? The courts have found that other factor. You have made a list of them this morning; I have a list somewhere here culled from cases decided by the Supreme Court of the United States.

Senator HATCH. And in almost every jurisdiction of this country of any consequence or size with minorities you could find at least one other factor, could you not?

Mr. BERNS. I think so.

Incidentally, nothing has been said of this. We have talked constantly as if we were talking about city councils and perhaps State legislatures. I see no reason why congressional districts will not be affected by the amended section 2, not so much in Utah and not at all in Wyoming. Representative Cheney, I think, is safe, since his district comprises the whole of the State. But any State with more than a couple of seats in the Congress will be affected by this legislation, because the voting power of these groups is certainly being diluted as the House is now constituted.

Of course I will not get to the question of the U.S. Senate, where vote dilution amounts to distillation, I think, right now.

Senator HATCH. This would take Reynolds v. Syms to the *n*th degree, would it not? Where now you have to look at population, this section 2 change would add the fact that you must now look at color as well as population.

Mr. BERNS. Of course the only way you can satisfy those two criteria is gross gerrymandering and lines, as I say, that will make Tuskegee look like a perfect ellipse.

Senator HATCH. Let me ask you this: What is wrong with the notion that the Voting Rights Act ought to be directed toward insuring, not merely that citizens can register and vote, but that they are entitled to an "effective vote" as well?

Mr. BERNS. Senator, I suppose you are in a much better position than I am to answer that question, because I think the answer turns on the experience that one gains here through active work in the Senate.

I ask you to imagine a legislative body where every one of the members—every one of you, if you will—represents a discrete group which is understood to have interests that are idiosyncratic and have nothing, in effect, in common with the interests of other groups.

To what extent then would it be possible to find the kind of accommodation that is required to pass laws that have the effect of securing the rights of all? To what extent will it be possible for you to work with your colleagues in that body when, to put it in its grossest form, x percent of a legislative body is made up of blacks in proportion to their number in the population and x percent made up of whites? That is the issue—black/white.

The founders—and I touched on this when I talked about representative government—wanted larger districts precisely to prevent a member from being beholden to one narrow interest within the community, because a representative who represented a diversity of opinion and of interest in his own section would find it easier to accommodate his interests and to achieve accommodation with the representatives of other districts. That is what the founders thought; that is what Madison thought, and I think he was profoundly right in that respect.

Senator, in a way one can find the answer to this question in those Western European assemblies and parliaments that, over the course of years, have been chosen by means of proportional representation. To what extent does a French assembly, for example, under the Third Republic, made up of members chosen in this particular way—to what extent was it possible for that group to function, as we hope the Congress of the United States will function? To what extent was it possible for those people to accommodate themselves to each other and to make the necessary compromises that have to be made in a legislative body? That is really what we are talking about here.

Senator HATCH. One final question: Do at-large systems and municipal government, an apparent target of the results proponents, necessarily discriminate against minority groups?

Mr. BERNS. They discriminate if the definition of "discrimination" is voting results, and so forth.

Senator HATCH. As in section 2 of the House bill and the Kennedy-Mathias bill?

Mr. BERNS. The city of Mobile had a 35-percent black population and had never succeeded in electing a black assemblyman. That on its face might trigger even an intent, and it did, I think, for Justice White in the Mobile case.

Senator HATCH. Right.

Mr. BERNS. On the other hand, if one looks at the situation and if the black voting age population really does vote, it may turn out that the blacks of Mobile have as much influence on the people who represent them. Those who represent them must take into account the interests of those blacks, as for example, the Democratic city council of Chicago does Republicans in the city of Chicago.

Does a resident of the city of Chicago have a legitimate grievance that the city of Chicago is not made up on a proportional representation basis—the city council? Can it be said that he is seriously deprived of a constitutional or Federal statutory right? The important thing here is to insist on the right to vote, and if that is achieved—if minority groups have the right to vote—then it seems to me that their interests can be protected.

Members of this body and Members of the House of Representatives since the Voting Rights Act of 1965—and I think this can be demonstrated—pay more attention to the interests of blacks—for example, southern Representatives and southern Senators—than they did heretofore, and they do so because they depend on their votes.

Senator HATCH. Thank you, Dr. Berns.

Voting Rights and Wrongs

Walter Berns

THE Voting Rights Act of 1965 is surely the most successful civil-rights measure ever enacted by the national government. Everybody—or, at least, everybody who has publicly offered an opinion on the subject—agrees with this judgment, and there is good reason why they should. Among civil rights, that of voting is fundamental because the enjoyment of other rights is likely to depend on it; prior to 1965, however, and despite the Civil Rights Acts of 1957, 1960, and 1964, it was a right denied to most Southern blacks. In Mississippi, for an egregious example, only 6.8 percent of voting-age blacks were then registered to vote; thanks to the Act, that proportion is now almost 70 percent, and in 1980 almost 60 percent of them actually voted. What is more, not only do white candidates for public office throughout the South now actively and publicly solicit black support at the polls, and Southern Senators and Congressmen legislate with a view to the interests of their black constituents, but major Southern cities have black mayors (Atlanta being the most conspicuous of these). Indeed, there are now almost 2,000 black elected public officials in the six states of the Deep South.

So successful has the Act been in achieving its objective (which, as then Attorney General Katzenbach put it, was the removal of barriers to black voter registration), that even some of its devoted supporters began to question whether its "Draconian" pre-clearance provision in Section 5 was needed any longer. Under this provision, some nine states (mostly Southern) and political subdivisions of thirteen others are required to submit all proposed changes in their voting laws and procedures to the U.S. Attorney General for his approval. For states accustomed to referring to themselves as sovereign commonwealths, this is an ignominious position to be in, especially since, in practice, their appeals are made not to exalted political officials, such as Griffin Bell or William French Smith, but to anonymous persons—who knows their names? and who can bring them to account?—in the Civil Rights Division of the Department of Justice. That great civil libertarian, Justice Hugo L. Black, protested that Section 5 treated the states as "conquered provinces" and was unconstitutional. (More recently, the usually soft-spoken Thad Cochran, Republican Senator from Mississippi, put it this way: "Local officials have to go to Washington, get on their knees, kiss the ring and tug their forelocks to all these third-rate bureaucrats.") What, these states ask, are they now doing to deserve this treatment? And why single them out? Is there no voting fraud up north, in Chicago, for example? It may have been in response to this question that Henry Hyde of Illinois, the ranking Republican on the House Judiciary Committee's Subcommittee on Civil and Constitutional Rights, asked, "Shall we extend the mandatory pre-clearance for these 'selected areas' another ten years . . . or is seventeen years in the political penalty box enough?"

Hyde's question was asked last summer when the House was debating proposals to renew or extend the Voting Rights Act. Unless Congress acts before August 6, 1982, some of these states and political subdivisions will be eligible to petition the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia to be removed from this Section 5 pre-clearance coverage; in the words of the phrase coined to describe this procedure, they will be able to "bail out." Rather than permit this, some members of the House proposed that the pre-clearance provision be extended to cover all 50 states and all their political subdivisions; this, at least, would meet the complaint of unequal treatment. At this, Henry Hyde, for one, balked. What is significant, however, is that he ended up voting for the extension. He did so, he explained, because of what he learned during committee hearings on the proposals: "Witness after witness testified to continuing and pervasive denials of ready access to the electoral process for blacks."

Any fair-minded person would have to agree with this assessment. Despite the progress made since 1965, there are still more or less remote areas where state and local officials continue to resist according voting rights to minorities. Without federal supervision, there is no assurance that these practices would not continue or be resumed in other voting districts in some of the states. The price of liberty, as Tom Paine said, is eternal vigilance, and it is unfortunate, but the time has not yet come when we can rely on every local official to provide it.

The House agreed. It passed a bill extending the Act by the overwhelming margin of 365 votes (389-24); and when, on December 16, an identical bill was introduced in the Senate, 61 members of that body, including 8 Republican committee chairmen and several Southern Democrats, immediately indicated their intention to support it. Its easy passage would seem to be assured when it reaches the floor of the Senate, probably in April; as its sponsors, Senators Kennedy and Mathias, were quick to point out, a majority of this size is sufficient to defeat any attempt to filibuster on the bill. It is almost sufficient to overturn a presidential veto, not that there is much likelihood that the President would dare to cast one. Opposition to this bill, even White House opposition, has been conspicuous by its absence, so much so that some Senate staff members have complained of difficulties in finding witnesses willing to testify against it.

This is unfortunate because the bill in its present form is much more than an extension of the current law. Unless it is amended it deserves to be defeated.

II

WHAT is new in this bill is not to be found in Section 5's pre-clearance provision, on which most of the debate has been focused; that section is unchanged. What is mostly objectionable in this bill is not to be found in the new bail-out section, even though its effect will be to make it almost impossible for any jurisdiction to take advantage of the bail-out privilege. What is new and profoundly objectionable is the seemingly innocuous amendment to the text of Section 2 which, by general agreement, was not one of the Act's "key sections." (In one compendium of significant civil-rights laws, this section was omitted from the text of the 1965 Act precisely because, in the editor's view, it was not one of the "key sections.")

In its original form, Section 2 was a mere declaration, or a restatement in statutory form, of the Fifteenth Amendment to the Constitution. Where the Amendment says the "right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged" on account of race or color, Section 2 says, more explicitly, that no "voting qualification or prerequisite to voting, or standard, practice, or procedure shall be imposed or applied [so as to] deny or abridge" the right to vote. Not surprisingly, unlike other sections of the Act, this one has given rise to very little litigation, and in the current debate over extending the Act very little attention has been paid to it. Yet its language was altered in a significant way. The words "to deny or abridge" the right to vote were deleted; in their place were put the words "in a manner which results in a denial or abridgment" (emphasis added) of the right to vote. This new language will make Section 2 the key section of the Act, one that will affect the electoral laws and practices of every state and political subdivision in the nation. There is reason to doubt that this was understood by all the Congressmen and Senators who lined up quickly in support of the bill.

The new language is intended to express the difference between the right to vote and what the federal courts, in voting-rights cases, have made of the right to vote. (It was placed in Section 2 of the bill because that section, unlike Section 5, applies to the entire country, and applies to existing voting laws and practices as opposed to voting changes.) Voting, Chief Justice Warren pronounced in a 1969 case, includes "all activities necessary to make a vote effective," and the effectiveness of a vote is now measured by its results. Thus, a vote can be "diluted"—that is, made less effective—if a city annexes its surrounding territory with the consequence that the proportion of black voters declines from 56 percent to 47 percent of the population; or if, as a result of reapportioning its voting population, a state reduces the percentage of black voters in a district below 65 percent, the proportion calculated by the Justice Department and certain federal District Courts to make it relatively certain that a black will be elected; or if, when changing from a system of plurality to one of majority voting, a city cannot prove that the change will not "dilute the effectiveness of the Negro vote." This last reference is to a 1980 case, City of Rome v. United States, and a consideration of it and City of Mobile v. Bolden, decided the same day, will help to explain what Congress is up to.

Rome, Georgia, had a commission form of government, the commissioners being elected on an at-large basis and by a plurality of the vote. (As the Supreme Court noted, "literally thousands of municipalities and other local government units throughout the nation" have such a system.) In 1966, the state of Georgia enacted new laws affecting municipal governance, among them one providing for election of commissioners by majority vote. Since Georgia was covered by Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act, it had to "pre-clear" this electoral change with the Attorney General. He refused his approval and Rome went to court. The trial court found no discriminatory purpose in the new law, but it ruled against the city because the law was discriminatory in effect. As the Supreme Court repeated in its affirmance of the lower court's decision, the law would deprive "Negro voters of the opportunity to elect a candidate of their choice," by which it meant, a candidate of their own race. More precisely, the city had not proved that the new law would not have the effect of depriving Negro voters of the opportunity to elect a Negro candidate.

On the same day, the Supreme Court reached the opposite conclusion in a case presenting starkly similar facts. Mobile, Alabama also had a commission form of government, the three commissions being elected every four years by majority vote in at-large elections. City of Mobile v. Bolden began when black citizens of the city challenged the legality and constitutionality of the at-large election procedure, alleging that their vote had been "diluted" because, while blacks comprised more than 35 percent of the population, no black had ever been elected a city commissioner. Although the trial court found that Mobile blacks registered and were able to vote without hindrance, it nevertheless held this "dilution" of voting power to be an abridgment of the right to vote in violation of the Fifteenth Amendment, and ordered the replacement of the commission system by a mayor-council system, with council members to be elected from nine single-member districts. A sharply divided Supreme Court reversed, holding that an election law that is racially neutral on its face can be said to violate the Fifteenth Amendment only if it can be shown to have been motivated by a discriminatory purpose and that there was no such showing in this case. A plurality of the Mobile Court held that Section 2 of the Act is coextensive with the Fifteenth Amendment, and, therefore, does require proof of discriminatory purpose.

What accounts for the discrepancy in these judgments? The Mobile case was tried not under the Voting Rights Act but, rather, under the Fifteenth—and, to some extent, the Fourteenth—Amendment. Alabama, like Georgia, was covered by Section 5 of the Act, but Mobile, Alabama, unlike Rome, Georgia, had not changed its election law—it had been in effect since 1911—and, therefore, was not required to "pre-clear" it with the Attorney General under Section 5.

Thus, as the situation stands after these two 1980 cases, anyone challenging old election laws, or new laws in jurisdictions not covered by Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act, must sue under Section 2 of the current Act or under the Fifteenth (or Fourteenth) Amendment, and to prevail he must show discriminatory purpose; to prevail under Section 5, it is the city or state that bears the burden of proof and it must show no discriminatory effect.

The amended Section 2 is intended to reverse the Supreme Court's decision in City of Mobile. By making it clear that, in its judgment at least, proof of discriminatory purpose or intent is not required in cases brought under the Fifteenth Amendment (by way of Section 2), the House Judiciary Committee, as it frankly admitted in its report on the bill, intended to do away with the discrepancy between the law of Mobile and the law of Rome.

If enacted, it would permit voting-rights suits to be filed by the Attorney General or any private litigant against every state, city, county, or other electoral jurisdiction in the country. It would put every jurisdiction on notice that it might have to appear in a federal court to defend its election laws—any law affecting elections—against the charge that they "dilute" the votes of blacks and a few other minority groups. And it would, of course, make these federal courts the country's electoral lawgiver.

III

At the end of his dissenting opinion in City of Mobile, Justice Thurgood Marshall said that if the Court "refuses to honor our long-recognized principle that the Constitution 'nullifies sophisticated as well as simple-minded modes of discrimination' . . . it cannot expect the victims of discrimination to respect political channels of seeking redress." Such minatory statements are singularly out of place in judicial reports—after all, judges are not supposed to provoke or even to excuse lawlessness—but, except in the context in which it appears, Marshall's point concerning sophisticated modes of discrimination has considerable merit. There are ways of abridging the right to vote without apparently denying it.

The paradigm case of this occurred some twenty years ago when Alabama, without removing a single white voter, managed to exclude all but a fraction of Tuskegee's black voters from the city (all but 4 of a total of 400) by redrawing the city's boundaries, transforming its shape from that of a simple square to "an uncouth twenty-eight sided figure," as Justice Felix Frankfurter put it. The Supreme Court was unanimous in its judgment that this was a violation of the Constitution, with all but one member agreeing that it was an abridgment, if not a denial, of the Fifteenth Amendment's right to vote.

But in City of Mobile the Court was not retreating from its position in the Tuskegee case; it was refusing to join Marshall in his insistence that the Constitution requires that "the votes of citizens of all races shall be of substantially equal weight." To the Court—or, actually, to the plurality of Justices who joined in Justice Potter Stewart's opinion—this was a call for proportional representation. "The theory of this dissenting opinion . . . appears to be that every 'political group,' or at least every such group that is in the minority, has a federal constitutional right to elect candidates in proportion to its numbers." This, said Justice Stewart, is not the law of the Constitution.

Marshall angrily denied that he was calling for proportional representation; this charge was, he said, a "mischaracterization" of his position. There is, he went on, a clear distinction between a requirement of proportional representation and the discriminatory effect or vote-dilution test. "The vote-dilution doctrine can logically apply only to groups whose electoral discreteness and insularity allow dominant political factions to ignore them." In like manner, the amended Section 2 of the Voting Rights Act contains this disclaimer: "The fact that members of a minority group have not been elected in numbers equal to the group's proportion of the population shall not, in and of itself, constitute a violation of this section."

Despite these assurances, however, one from Marshall and the other from Congress, the distinction between the vote-dilution test and the proportional representation of at least some minority groups is likely to be no clearer than that between racial goals and racial quotas.

Those words in the amended Section 2—"in a manner which results in a denial or abridgment"—will derive their meaning in part from the Supreme Court's decision in United Jewish Organizations v. Carey, and according to Justice William Brennan, "the one starkly clear fact of this case is that an overt racial number was employed to effect petitioners' assignment to voting districts." In equally stark fact, race was the only criterion employed in the redrawing of district lines. Yet the Court, with Brennan concurring, approved it by a vote of 7 to 1.

At issue in this case was the New York reapportionment statute enacted after the 1970 census, and more precisely, the district lines drawn in three metropolitan counties, Kings, New York (Manhattan), and Bronx. In one of the newly-drawn districts, the nonwhite majority was only 61 percent, and the Justice Department, from whom Section 5 pre-clearance was required,* concluded from this and other facts that the state had not shown that the district lines had not been drawn with the purpose or effect of diluting the voting strength of nonwhites (blacks and Puerto Ricans). Faced with the necessity to have its reapportionment plan in place in time for the 1974 primary and general elections, the state revised the plan as it affected the districts in these counties, increasing the size of the nonwhite majority from 61 percent to 65 percent. This satisfied the Justice Department in Washington but not everyone in the local district, for, in order to find the number of nonwhites needed to achieve the required 65-percent proportion, the state had to reassign to other districts some members of what had been a consolidated Hasidic community. The Hasidim went to court and, as one might expect, lost. They lost because, as Brennan put it in his separate opinion, they had "not been deprived of their right to vote" (which, of course, could also have been said of the nonwhites in the county), and because while their vote may have been diluted as a result of their being divided into separate districts, they do not constitute a group explicitly protected under the Voting Rights Act. Congress at its pleasure has reserved this status for blacks and so-called language minorities: American Indians, Asian Americans, Alaskan Natives, and persons of Spanish heritage. The Hasidim were expected to take their chances along with the rest of the whites, and in this case at least there was no evidence of "cognizable discrimination against whites." Whites could elect their representatives—that is, they could elect whites—in those districts where they were in the majority. UJO v. Carey, like some cases before it, stands for proportional representation, not, admittedly, for every group—the Court did not join Marshall by saying that "the votes of citizens of all races shall be of substantially equal weight"—but proportional for some groups.

ONE of Chief Justice Earl Warren's legacies to American politics was the aphorism, "Legislators represent people, not trees or acres," and, that being so, states were forbidden by the Constitution to apportion seats in either house of their legislatures on any basis other than population. Now it turns out that legislators represent not undifferentiated people—people defined only as individuals living in districts of approximately equal size—but groups of people defined by their race, and they can be said to represent them only if they are of that race. As the Court said, the votes of blacks will be diluted when the number of blacks in a district is not sufficient "to insure the opportunity for the election of a black representative." How many black representatives? That depends on the number of blacks in the county. How many are required in a district to insure the election of a black representative? If one takes it for granted that blacks vote as a bloc, at least 50 percent, and beyond that the number would seem to depend on voter turnout. In Kings County, turnout tends to be low, so 61 percent was deemed insufficient. Why 65 percent? "A staff member of the legislative reapportionment committee testified that in the course of meetings and telephone conversations with Justice Department officials, he 'got the feeling . . . that 65 percent would be probably an approved figure' for the nonwhite population in the assembly district in which the Hasidic community was located. . . ."

Of course, as any well-informed student of voting behavior could have told these anonymous Justice Department Solons (and told them over the phone), 65 percent may not be sufficient to insure the election of nonwhite representatives. In the first place, voters can (and sometimes do) look to factors other than race when casting their ballots, and it is an insult to assume this to be untrue or even uncharacteristic of "nonwhite" voters. In the second place, in some areas (and Kings County is one of them) nonwhite voter turnout is so low that, even if nonwhites voted as a solid bloc, districts on the order of 80 or even 90 percent would be required to insure the election of their candidate. Voter turnout is related to education—the more education, the higher the turnout—and not at all to race, a fact that ought to be pondered by the ideologues in the Justice Department and federal judiciary. Since the nonwhites in these Kings County (which is to say, Brooklyn) districts tend to be very poorly educated, it is not surprising that, judging from the returns in the 1980 congressional elections, their turnout may be as low as 10 percent and surely is as low as 20 percent. Whatever the reason, four of the five districts the Justice Department presumed to be safely nonwhite after the 1974 reapportionment proceeded to elect white representatives in the ensuing local elections.

WHAT, then, can we make of Congress's assurance that Section 2 does not require a group's representation to be equal to its proportion of the population—or that disproportionality does not "in and of itself" constitute a violation of the section? If we assume, surely correctly, that this language is not intended to be a repudiation of UJO v. Carey and the other vote-dilution cases, Congress means that some factor in addition to disproportionality must be present before it can be said that a group's vote has been abridged by being diluted. What factors? Well, for example, the fact that a group's "discreteness and insularity [has allowed the] dominant political factions to ignore [it]"; or the fact that, after a city annexed additional territory, the number of black seats on the council declined; or the fact that there is evidence of racial bloc voting. Where there is "underrepresentation," the presence of any one of these additional factors, or any one of what Justice Stewart in the City of Mobile case referred to as "gauzy sociological considerations," will continue to trigger a violation. So much for the "not-in-and-of-itself" disclaimer.

Besides, whatever Congress's intention in making this disclaimer, the courts are likely to treat it the way they treated a similar disclaimer in the Civil Rights Act of 1964. There Congress said specifically that nothing in Title VII of that Act should be interpreted to require employers "to grant preferential treatment" to any person or group because of race, color, sex, or national origin, not even to correct "an imbalance which may exist with respect to the total number or percentage of persons of any race [etc.] employed by any employer."

Clear enough, one would think, but the Supreme Court paid it no heed. To read this as written, said Justice Brennan in the Weber case, would bring about an end completely at variance with the purpose of the statute, by which he meant, the purpose of the Court.* Congress's disclaimer should be taken with a grain of salt. If the amended Section 2 is adopted, minorities whose voting power has been "diluted" will be able to file suits against jurisdictions throughout the country, and the remedy for vote dilution will prove to be minority representation in proportion to the size of the minority group.

In trying to achieve this, however, the federal courts will encounter a few problems. Where nonwhite voter turnout is as low as it is in Kings County, New York, will the amended Voting Rights Act require districts with populations 80 or 90 percent nonwhite? Some Republicans hope so; they know that the more blacks they can pack into a district, the more Democratic the vote of that district, and, consequently, the better will be their chances to win in surrounding districts. From their partisan point of view, as many districts as possible should be 100-percent nonwhite.

Then, is it not a violation of the Voting Rights Act to combine Puerto Ricans and blacks in the single category, nonwhite? Both are explicitly protected groups and, according to the principle of UJO v. Carey, each is entitled to representation in proportion to its numbers. (Interestingly enough, the Puerto Ricans of Kings County objected to the 1974 redistricting plan precisely because it did not establish a Puerto Rican district.) Perhaps in future cases the nonwhite group will have to be split into its component parts and each part given a district it can call its own. If so, the redefined Tuskegee (that "uncouth twenty-eight sided figure") will, by comparison, look like a perfect ellipse. And, for one more example, it will be interesting to witness the situation where a city is ordered by the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia to concentrate blacks in voting districts in order to "undilute" their voting power at a time when the local U.S. District Court has ordered the city to annex surrounding territory in order to integrate the schools.

IV

A GENUINE system of proportional representation, of the sort sometimes employed in Western Europe, is one where each political group—Union socialiste et républicaine, Gauche indépendante, Jeune République, Rassemblement du peuple français, etc.—is guaranteed a share of seats in the legislature equal to its share of the popular vote. Since these groups are defined by their interests or the opinions they hold, and the popularity of these opinions cannot be known until they are elicited, there have to be elections. But one can learn how many blacks there are in the country simply by consulting the census reports. Why, then, bother to hold elections? Why construct these elaborate election districts to insure that black voters will elect, say, a Charles Diggs rather than, say, a Peter Rodino (chairman of the House Judiciary Committee)?

* See my article, "Let Me Call You Quota, Sweetheart," COMMENTARY, May 1981.

-And indeed, one of the unintended consequences of this enactment of the amended Section 2 would be that the other sections of the Voting Rights Act would, in effect, be made superfluous. Who needs statutes providing Attorney General pre-clearance, or bail-outs, or federal election examiners and observers, when, with a few seemingly innocuous words, the judiciary can be authorized to do everywhere what the Justice Department has been doing only in the few "covered" jurisdictions, such as Houston, where it called off a general election, or New York City, where, merely because it thought it had not been given sufficient information, it prevented the holding of a primary election, or Kern County, California, where it ordered the printing of Spanish-language ballots—67,430 of them, of which number only 174 were actually used—in a 1978 primary election? Government by judiciary can be more efficient—think of school busing, abortion, prison reform—than government by administrative agency, to say nothing of government by local election officials.

Senator HATCH. Senator Grassley?

Senator GRASSLEY. I have no questions, Mr. Chairman.

Senator HATCH. Thank you for appearing. We appreciate the effort you have put forth to present your testimony. It has been very enlightening.

Our next witness will be Benjamin Hooks, the executive director of the NAACP.

Mr. Hooks, we are happy to have you with us today.

I wonder if we could just take a 10-minute break, unless you would rather not. I could use a 10-minute break myself, if no one has any objection.

Mr. HOOKS. Fine.

Senator HATCH. OK. We will recess for just 10 minutes, and then come back, and Mr. Hooks will be our first witness. Our last two witnesses will be Vilma Martinez and Ruth Hinerfeld.

[Recess taken.]

Senator HATCH. We are happy to resume our hearings today, and we are very pleased to have Mr. Ben Hooks with us, as one of the leading civil rights advocates in America. We will be very interested in what he has to say here today.

Mr. Hooks?

STATEMENT OF BENJAMIN L. HOOKS, EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR, NATIONAL ASSOCIATION FOR THE ADVANCEMENT OF COLORED PEOPLE, ACCOMPANIED BY ALTHEA T. L. SIMMONS, DIRECTOR, WASHINGTON BUREAU; AND RALPH NEAS, EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR, LEADERSHIP CONFERENCE ON CIVIL RIGHTS

Mr. HOOKS. Senator Hatch and members of the committee, my name is Benjamin L. Hooks, and I am the executive director of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

In my appearance here today I am also speaking as chairman of both the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights and the Black Leadership Forum, two other organizations vitally interested in this issue, the extension of the Voting Rights Act.

The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People is a 73-year-old civil rights organization with more than 1,800 branches and 600 youth and college chapters. We operate in all 50 States and the District of Columbia.

The Leadership Conference on Civil Rights was founded in 1949, and it is a coalition of 157 national organizations. The Black Leadership Forum is comprised of the chief executive officers of 15 national black organizations.

Today I am accompanied by Ms. Althea T. L. Simmons, on my right, who is director of the NAACP's Washington Bureau—and who may have to leave shortly.

Senator HATCH. We are happy to have you here, Ms. Simmons.

Mr. HOOKS. And Mr. Ralph Neas, on my right, the executive director of the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights.

The organizations that I represent appreciate the invitation to appear before the subcommittee today. We are here, Mr. Chairman, to announce once again our strong and unswerving support of the extension of the Voting Rights Act and specifically to support S. 1992.

I must confess, Mr. Chairman, I was somewhat surprised to hear the Attorney General say, in answer to questions put by Senator Kennedy, that the civil rights community had given the administration word that they would support a simple extension. That statement simply is not factual, and perhaps in all justice the Attorney General has so many things on his mind that he has forgotten it.

But I would like to point out for the record that on April 7, 1981, the Kennedy-Mathias bill was introduced in the Senate, known as the Rodino bill in the House—S. 895 and H.R. 3112. Both of these bills clarified section 2, and immediately upon their introduction the entire civil rights community endorsed those bills in public, in press conferences, in news conferences all over the country.

More specifically, in May I testified before the House committee; Vernon Jordan testified on that same date, other civil rights leaders testified on succeeding dates, and each of us unequivocally supported publicly and on the record the extension of the voting rights measure as contained in the Kennedy-Mathias-Rodino bills.

In May of that same year or June, the staff of LCCR met with the staff of Attorney General Smith, and later on in July I personally led a delegation to meet with Attorney General Smith, and we made it very clear that we supported the Mathias-Kennedy-Rodino bills and those bills did contain the clarification or amplification of section 2 of the Civil Rights Act.

So I know of no time that we have ever given any indication privately or publicly that all we wanted was a simple extension.

Let me also add that, as it relates to the bail-out provision, that was not a provision which the civil rights community wanted. It was a provision which we accepted because we wanted the strongest—not only the strongest possible extension measure, but also the strongest possible bipartisan coalition.

Representative Hyde of Illinois indicated that he wanted that bailout provision, and we reluctantly acquiesced in it. It was not something which the civil rights community proposed.

On October 5, as you know, the House passed that bill, and we again gave the world knowledge that that is a bill which we approved. So we have not changed our position from April 7 to this good date. We have consistently and publicly supported the Kennedy-Mathias-Rodino bills.

Let me say one other thing. It is our position, without any equivocation or hesitation—and I say this from the background of 30 years experience as a practicing attorney, as a former trial court judge called on to make many snap decisions from the bench, that until the Mobile v. Bolden case the law was considered by us to include effect or results. And from the date that the Mobile case was decided, it was the unanimous view of the civil rights community that even though, in the testimony of Attorney General Katzenbach before this committee in direct answer to Senator Fong's question, the 10 select members of the Judiciary Committee, including Senator Robert Griffin and Senator Hugh Scott, when Attorney General Mitchell wanted to add the language that is being added now, it was necessary because, in their judgment, that that concept was included in section 2. We have had a great deal of discussion about that this morning.

So it is our opinion—and we will submit a memorandum which we think will buttress that—that indeed results or effect had been the prevailing standard.

When we talk about the Mobile case, I think we have to take into account the White case and the Whitcomb case, but we also have to remember the intervening situation of Arlington Heights and Washington v. Davis.

It was in that context that the Supreme Court in other matters started dealing with the idea of intent, in the Arlington case, which you have so eloquently cited this morning, and in the Washington v. Davis case.

So the Mobile case came to the Court in a time warp. They had previously decided those earlier cases, and they now had to decide Mobile in light of their decisions in the cases of Washington v. Davis and the Arlington Heights case.

Justice Potter Stewart pointed out that undoubtedly the courts had in prior Voting Rights Act cases—and it really does not matter whether the cases came under title 5 or title 2, because the courts have a tendency to deal with the whole situation. He pointed out in his opinion—and it was a plurality opinion of the four Justices—that perhaps the courts made a mistake. It was to correct, not to write new law from our viewpoint, and not to overrule the Supreme Court.

Let me just say one other thing about the 15th amendment. It has never been said that the Congress was restricted to intent. It could pass legislation coextensive with the 15th amendment which went beyond the narrow interpretation of intent.

Mr. Chairman, as I listened to Attorney General Smith today and the statements made by various Senators, and Dr. Berns, I have a peculiar feeling that I have been here before.

I recall in an old jury case that we were trying in Memphis, Tenn., where there were no blacks serving on the jury. The question came up about intent versus effect or results. We knew what the results were. Finally, somebody asked the jury commissioner, "How do you pick your juries?" His words—I can remember them almost verbatim—"I use the city directory, I use the phone book, and I go down the lists, and I pick people out."

Then we asked, "How does it come that you only pick out white people?" He said, "It is not my intention to exclude Negroes; I just want to make sure that we have got high quality jurors, so I use the streets where I know high quality people live."

He said his intention was not to exclude Negroes, but as a matter of fact the results of his deliberate use of a city directory, where he knew where whites lived and where blacks lived, and his admission that he consciously excluded any streets where black folk lived, but his intent was not to exclude blacks, but make sure that he only got high class people——

Senator HATCH. If I could interrupt you, I think a court could very easily construe that as an intent to exclude blacks.

Mr. HOOKS. I want to move to that point very quickly, but I would just point out that I have been there, Mr. Chairman. I remember when we ran a black for the board of education. You ran at large. As soon as a black came within a 1,000 votes of being elected, the next election they said you had to run by positions.

I can remember when we all were pushing the law that had been in effect for years. In the general election you pulled one lever or made one mark on your vote for the whole Democratic ticket or the whole Republican ticket. But the minute a black was selected in the Democratic primary, they wanted to change the law and said no longer could you push one ticket, you had to individually vote.

I remember when we had all of these questions. I have been there. I have seen my beloved home State and beloved home city deliberately enact run-off laws. If we had to prove intent, they would always say, "That is not our intent."

Now, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that we have here somewhat of a red herring in this whole business of proportional representation of a so-called mirror image. I know of no civil rights group—and I may state unequivocally for the NAACP and for the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights that we are not seeking proportional representation. We are not seeking a mirror image of the ethnic classifications of neighborhoods or cities. We are simply seeking the unfettered right to vote without having to prove that which sometimes is not susceptible to proof.

We maintain that the reason that the whole argument over title 2 and effect versus intent is a red herring—or perhaps I should say more accurately, as some learned man said recently, a Trojan horse—is the fact that the Attorney General has said, and I have heard the distinguished chairman of this subcommittee say over and over again, that in order to prove intent you have to prove that results becomes a substantive part of intent, that in a court of law—and I certainly can attest to that—the results become very important as you try to measure intent.

It seems to me that what we have said in the civil rights community is true. All the administration is trying to do is make it much harder for those who have been outside of the mainstream to get in, because the administration is saying to us, "It is not enough to prove the effects or the results; we want you to prove intent; we want you to have a higher standard; we are going to superimpose upon a civil case criminal standards."

I remember how often I used to read the charge to the juries—"You must find this defendant guilty beyond a reasonable doubt and to a moral certainty," whatever that meant. And in civil cases we talked about a preponderance of evidence.

Now, what this administration is doing is imposing the criminal standard of proof on what is allegedly a civil statute. We have to prove beyond a reasonable doubt and to a moral certainty—people who have been wronged.

Let me say finally that I thought I detected in the brilliant and persuasive arguments of Dr. Berns not so much an argument against the newly written words in section 2, as he talked about the UJO case and some other cases where we had peculiar results. To say the least, those cases were decided under the Voting Rights Act as now written.

So if you are opposed to what happened, it really means it is a transparent argument, not against the new words of section 2 but against the Voting Rights Act, period. Certainly nobody can say that the results reached in those cases were caused by the language proposed by Senator Mathias and Senator Kennedy which has not been enacted into law.

I think—and Senator Metzenbaum said it so eloquently and so clearly—that this administration, if it is concerned about making it known that it is concerned about the desires and aspirations of all of the citizens, would join in support of S. 1992, which is fair.

I know I cannot ask a question, but I would like to pose a riddle. If indeed the proof of results is a substantive part of the evidentiary necessity to prove intent, and if we are saying that proving results will result in proportional representation, then are you not also saying that if you substitute the word "intent" for "results," if indeed we could ever prove intent we must also have proportional representation? It seems to me that that means it is simply a tactic that is designed as a scare tactic and not reality, because I see absolutely no difference, if you were to put the word "intent" there, and then if indeed we could ever prove it—and it would be difficult to prove—that you would then be saying the courts would have to order proportional representation.

Mr. Chairman and distinguished members of this subcommittee, I want to thank you for this time and for this opportunity. I am prepared to try to answer any questions you may have.

Senator HATCH. Thank you, Mr. Hooks.

In your testimony before the House Judiciary Committee, you expressed strong support for an extension of the present Voting Rights Act without change. I will read your quote from that hearing. This is on page 94 of my transcript. "I have not seen any changes that were anything but changes for change's sake. I do not understand it. It is our position that, since it is working well, those of us who proposed it and were the sufferers and forebearers are not coming in at this time suggesting that there be changes. It would be best to extend it in its present form."

"That is what I have said I want to do. Frankly, I think it should be extended in its present form, because it does work and has been the most effective and important civil rights legislation in history." That was your statement.

Why do you come now before this subcommittee today and tell us that the entire civil rights community now strongly opposes this course of action of a simple extension, and why do you accuse those of us who wish to preserve the act unchanged, including the intents test, as using what you refer to as code words of discrimination? Have circumstances changed that much in the past 8 months to justify those statements by yourself?

Mr. HOOKS. Mr. Chairman, I may have to reread my testimony, but I am almost positive—and I did not bring it today, and I am sorry that my testimony was headed "Testimony in support of H.R. 3112," which had the change in it.

We had to deal with that, because the Mobile v. Bolden case was the case that was giving us the most trouble. We were the ones who asked Senator Kennedy and Senator Mathias and Representative Rodino, in the new language, to deal with the Mobile thing. We did not consider that.

Let me be very frank. I do not consider that a change. I consider that simply—putting into the language of the bill what we had conceived the language to be from 1965 to 1978. It was clarifying language. I still do not believe that the language is a change.

Senator HATCH. Let me have my aide bring this up. It is my understanding of what the transcript says.

Senator KENNEDY. As I understand, since we only have one copy of your testimony——

Senator HATCH. We would be happy to provide it.

Senator KENNEDY. If you have an extra copy, I would like to see it.

Senator HATCH. I do not have an extra copy. We will make one for you.

Senator KENNEDY. The question Mr. Hooks was asked was dealing primarily with the bailout provision.

Mr. HOOKS. Section 5; that is what I answered.

Senator KENNEDY. I think the response has to be viewed in that particular way. The record is going to stand for itself, but to try to put words in Mr. Hooks' mouth——

Mr. HOOKS. I would like to say that we did call on Senator Kennedy, Senator Mathias, and Representative Rodino before the bill was introduced on April 7, and asked for clarifying language.

We maintain that the clarifying language is not a substantive change but simply expresses directly what we thought was the will of Congress from 1965 to 1978. We wanted, and expressed openly, the Mobile situation taken care of and in new legislation.

If I have misstated that, I apologize, but I thought my written testimony talked about that. I will check it again to see. But I do know, on the bailout, we said we did not see any necessity for change.

Senator HATCH. Yes, you did do that. But the question was—I do not want to beat this to death.—"There has been some suggestion that the Voting Rights Act, as presently written, does not take into account the changed circumstances that have occurred in the covered jurisdictions." Then you go on to refer to the bailout section in response to that question.

A subsequent question followed: "I also wonder if you have given consideration as to whether a declaratory judgment that has submitted a voting change which is not discriminatory needs to be brought in the district court in the District of Columbia, or might that be brought in any Federal district court."

Your response was, "The thing that puzzles me, again, is that we have a law that has worked very effectively. It has been hailed as a mighty law. It created a tremendous change in a region of the country where, for 100 years, there was outright illegal activity preventing blacks from voting, and in a few short years it brought a major change in this country, in the parts where it was applied as well as where the law did not apply. All those changes have been for the best at a minimum cost in terms of money, machinery, in terms of anything you want. It baffles my imagination as to why we have to consider a change at all when something is working well. As Vernon Jordan said, 'If it ain't broke, don't fix it.' "

Then you go on to say, "I have not seen any changes that were anything but changes for change's sake. I do not understand it. It is our position that, since it is working well, those of us who proposed it and were the sufferers and forebearers are not coming in at this time to suggest that there be changes. It would be best to extend it in its present form."

We will give you a copy of this, so that you may look it over—OK?

Mr. HOOKS. I simply repeat again that we had on many occasions publicly stated our surprise at the Supreme Court decision in Mobile v. Bolden and that we felt that had to be clarified, and we supported publicly the bill as introduced by Peter Rodino, and that bill did change section 2. That is what we had reference to.

In our covering memorandum to the Attorney General, we pointed out all of these reasons, and I still maintain—and I recognize I may be haggling; I do not wish to engage the time of the subcommittee in that—I still point out that it is our position—and if it is not true legally, at least we perceived it to be true—that from 1965 to 1978 we were dealing with an effects and not an intent standard. Therefore, the section 2 change proposed by Representative Rodino was not a change but a clarification to make clear what the law was all of the time.

Senator KENNEDY. If we could just yield on this point——

Senator HATCH. May I make one comment before we do?

Senator KENNEDY. Just on the—— Senator HATCH. Let me make a comment first, if you will, and then I will turn to you.

Mr. Hooks, I have not meant to imply that you have not been strongly for the Rodino-Kennedy-Mathias bills. I understand that, and I accept your statement on that.

Please go ahead, Senator Kennedy.

Senator KENNEDY. In the relevant part of the question to Mr. Hooks, he was asked: "Have you given consideration as to whether a declaratory judgment that has submitted change, a voting change, needs to be brought in the District Court of the District of Columbia, might be brought in any Federal district court?" That, it seems to me, is the essence of the question you were asked—whether you thought that they ought to move the preclearance provisions to other sections of the country or they be continued to be retained in the Federal district court.

My understanding of Mr. Hooks' answer in this case is that he believes in his response that this aspect of the law has worked effectively in being brought under the Federal district court. It seems to me that, in reviewing both the question and the response, that puts it in the correct perspective. I think any suggestion, or any effort to try and indicate otherwise, would not be fair to Mr. Hooks.

If that refreshes your recollection a little bit on the nature of the question——

Mr. HOOKS. I also repeat what Vernon Jordan said; "If it ain't broke, don't fix it." I stand by that. Section 2 was broke, and we had to fix it.

Senator HATCH. Let me just call your attention to the Mobile v. Bolden case, where Mr. Justice Stewart said, "While other of the Court's 15th amendment decisions have dealt with different issues, none has questioned the necessity of showing purposeful discrimination in order to show a 15th amendment violation." He is referring to the Supreme Court's decisions. "The cases of Smith v. Allwright and Terry v. Adams," for example, dealt with the question of whether a State was so involved in racially discriminatory voting practices so as to invoke the amendment's protection. Although their facts differed somewhat, the question in both cases was whether the State was sufficiently implicated in the conduct of racially exclusionary primary elections to make that discrimination an abridgement of the right to vote by a State."

I do not know of any Supreme Court cases where the effects test was institutionalized in the 14th or 15th amendments or even accepted prior to the Bolden case. I might add that the law was no different from 1965 to 1978 than in the 1940's.

Mr. HOOKS. Senator, Justice Stewart in the Bolden case cited Zimmer. These are the words he used: "was quite evidently decided upon the misunderstanding that it is not necessary to show a discriminatory purpose in order to prove a violation of the equal protection clause, that proof of discriminatory effect is sufficient."

Those are the words of Justice Stewart in the Bolden case, in which he admitted—I obviously do not agree with his conclusion, but I have to say this is what he said—that the Supreme Court had in Zimmer decided that effect was sufficient. He has said in effect they were wrong.

Senator HATCH. Zimmer was not a Supreme Court case.

Mr. HOOKS. My research leads me to understand that this is what he said—that the plurality in Bolden was correcting a misunderstanding that, in their judgment, had come into the law about effect versus intent, based on the Washington and the Arlington cases.

Senator HATCH. I would suggest you read it again, and I will read it again also. But he was correcting a lower court case. If I recall correctly, it was the Zimmer case, but let us both look at that again.

Mr. HOOKS. All right, sir, we will look at it again.

I am submitting a memorandum, and I will have the lawyers look at the memorandum again. I confess that the Supreme Court, in its wisdom, is sometimes a little confusing.

Senator HATCH. I have to agree with that.

Mr. HOOKS. I have no hesitance in trying to reread it, but I think that we have amply demonstrated that the White case and the Zimmer case did not require any proof of intent. That was the controlling law until the Mobile v. Bolden case, which came to us. I was one of the lawyers involved. I was shocked out of the blue, because it simply required us to prove what was in the minds of people in 1912, and I do not think we could ever do that. That case has been remanded for the purpose of trying to prove intent.

Senator HATCH. Let me try to shed some light on this. I am reading out of the Mobile v. Bolden case, "The district court assessed the appellee's claims in light of the standard that had been articulated by the Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit in Zimmer v. McKeithen. That case, coming before Washington v. Davis, was quite evidently decided upon the misunderstanding that it is not necessary to show a discriminatory purpose in order to prove a violation of the equal protection clause, that the proof of a discriminatory effect is sufficient."

In other words, I think your people have taken that out of context. This is made very clear within the actual context of the case itself.

Mr. HOOKS. We read the same citation, and I will have to go back and check with the lawyers and see where the citation most appropriately applies. I will be happy to do that.

Senator HATCH. I appreciate that.

Mr. HOOKS. But I do not think that changes the basic thrust of what we maintain——

Senator HATCH. No; it does not change that.

Mr. HOOKS [continuing]. That prior to Mobile v. Bolden, that was the first case under the Voting Rights Act that held that you had to prove intent.

The Attorney General says that was the first case, period, and therefore was the first time the Supreme Court had a chance to speak to it. We do not agree with that. We say there were cases that came under section 5, not under section 2 necessarily, where in a broad way that question was covered.

Senator HATCH. OK.

Mr. HOOKS. At any way, we will re-research that.

Senator HATCH. We will both look it over.

In your House testimony——

Senator KENNEDY. Before we leave that point, does not what Senator Hatch just read really make your point, Mr. Hooks, that prior to the Washington case the proof of discriminatory effect is sufficient? I will get back later into what I think—both the effects test and the intent test were effectively the law prior to this, but prior to the Washington case—the provisions that he just read—the proof of discriminatory effect is sufficient.

It seems to me that this makes the point that you——

Mr. HOOKS. Senator, I read exactly the same passage. I think it makes my point; he thinks it does not, and I do not know why.

Senator HATCH. If your point is that that was the law before the Mobile v. Bolden case, I fail to see how this particular passage could possibly illustrate your point.

Senator KENNEDY. Before the Washington case.

Senator HATCH. Yes, before the 1978 case.

Justice Stewart pointed out only that Washington unambiguously clarified a law that some might have misunderstood earlier, not that Washington represented a departure in the law. Indeed, he said it did not.

Let me move on to another question. In your House testimony you stated, "I would hope, 10 years from now when I come back, I will only be testifying for 10 more years rather than in perpetuity."

The bill passed by the House, as you know, does not extend preclearance for 10 years; it extends it in perpetuity. Based on your House testimony, am I correct that you would be opposed to that aspect of the bill?

Mr. HOOKS. No, I would not. If I recall, Representative Washington or somebody made a statement about how long this should be in effect. My statement was to the effect that I did not believe that in my lifetime—I do not know how it came out—it would ever happen. My hope was that at some point it would not be, but I tried to express the fact that I did not think that was going to be a reality.

It was really a negative statement put in a positive cast. I was saying then what my hope was, not that I expected it to be at all. And of course "perpetuity" is a word that is susceptible to a lot of meanings. The succeeding Congresses who have no reason for income tax 20 years from now can wipe it out. I do not know whether that time will come or not. I would hope I would come here and testify against income tax at some point, but I do not think that I will have an opportunity.

It was simply that I was saying that would be my hope, not that I expected it, and therefore I am not opposed to that.

Senator HATCH. OK. Mr. Hooks, would you be satisfied with a simple 10-year extension of the Voting Rights Act without change?

Mr. HOOKS. No, sir, I would not.

Senator HATCH. You would not at this point?

Mr. HOOKS. No.

Senator HATCH. You indicate that you know of no one in the civil rights community that has advocated proportional representation. Permit me, if you will, to quote from the Greenville, S.C. "News," of December 13, 1981, the remarks of Dr. Willie Gibson, whom I am sure you know. He is the president, I believe, of the South Carolina NAACP. He indicates his opposition to a redistricting plan in South Carolina by stating, "Unless we see a plan that has the possibility of blacks having the probability of being elected in proportion to this population, we will push hard for a new plan."

Can you explain to the subcommittee what Dr. Gibson is talking about here? It appears to me that he is talking about proportional representation.

Mr. HOOKS. I understand precisely what Dr. Gibson is talking about. Those are not unusual statements to be made. I think there is a big difference between proportional representation and representation in proportion to their population. It simply means that we are not looking for 00 percentage points—if we have 42 percent, we want 42 percent representation. But it does mean there must be some appearance of equity—that we would not be satisfied with a plan, for instance——

Senator HATCH. Is that not a form of proportional representation?

Mr. HOOKS. If you get to the nth degree, any representation is somewhat proportional. It is a part of our Constitution. It is not adhered to generally, but the whole business of redistricting was to adhere to the concept of 250,000 members for a Congressperson, 2 for every State no matter what size for the Senate. It was set up like that.

Gerrymandering is something that has been in our language long before black folk got involved. These are not new concepts.

If you understand what happens in South Carolina—that in the State senate even today there is not a single black serving, unless it happened in the last 3 months. We are involved in a lawsuit there, because we do have blacks in the State house of representatives, but not a single black has been elected to the senate because of the way they do it.

What Dr. Gibson was dealing with was a precise situation where somebody said, "There are 30 members of the senate; would you be happy to settle for 1?" In that kind of rhetorical statement to a people, the answer always is, "Certainly not. We want something that resembles our population." That is a far different cry from a mathematical proportional representation, which is the term that is being used here over and over again.

In the human existence of our lives, if I were to go to any State and was asked to put the NAACP seal of approval on a particular plan, like a Democrat in Utah or a Republican in Cook County, I would probably enter that very suspicious about what was happening. I would want to know, "Does it deal with equity?" And equity does not mean exact mathematical proportions.

I know Dr. Gibson. He is the president of the NAACP Conference for South Carolina. He knows NAACP policy. He would not knowingly violate it. That statement—and I have heard him make it many times—has to do with proportions and not proportionate, mathematical, precise representation based on population.

Senator HATCH. To use your illustration, if not 42 percent, what percentage would you be satisfied with?

Mr. HOOKS. Senator, we have had to wrestle with that over and over again, and new occasions teach new duties. Time makes ancient good uncouth. We have never been able to come up with any precise definition.

Just like the standard of granting broadcast licenses, you must serve the public interest, convenience, and necessity. No writer, not the most learned professors like Willesden, have ever been able to explain it. Like the Supreme Court Justice said about pornography, "I may not be able to define it, but I know it when I see it." Equity to us is something we may not be able to define, but we know it when we see it in a given case.

Senator HATCH. I know proportional representation when I see it too. I think anybody who looks at this knows it.

Let me just ask you this: Let us assume that I am right in my belief that this bill will lead to proportional representation and this bill passes. Of course if it has 62 firmly committed supporters; there is no question it is going to pass. If it passes and it does result in proportional representation, will you accept that?

Mr. HOOKS. I did not quite——

Senator HATCH. Let us say this bill passes in its present form and it results in proportional representation. Would you be satisfied with that?

Mr. HOOKS. I do not know how it would result in proportional representation, unless you had a lawsuit that would declare that it meant that. I am simply saying to you, sir, that we propose in the future, as we have in the past, to monitor and look at the practices.

Remember, when we talk about proportional representation, we seem to have forgotten one thing. We talk about that Baltimore example. It does not matter if Baltimore becomes 90 percent black and they elect a white mayor and 19 white council people out of 19. The law says there must be a practice, a condition, something that happens that causes that, something that you can pinpoint that made that happen.

If the cause is the black folk in Baltimore happen to like that white mayor and those white council people, that is not a cause for justiciable arrangement of a grievance.

All I am saying is that I think we have forgotten what precedes the language, and that is there must be a practice, there must be a condition, and in my written testimony I have outlined about 30 things that happen.

If you could prove that voting from midnight until 8 in the morning kept blacks from voting or putting the precincts in the police department—there are all kinds of things—if you could not prove a practice, a custom, or something that happened, you would not ever get to the results. The results trigger looking at practices, and you have to do both.

I have been in these suits, and let me tell you, sir, they are not easy to win.

Senator HATCH. I understand that.

Mr. HOOKS. When you prove the results, you also have to prove what practice caused that result and that practice is iniquitous or wrong. I think we have forgotten all about that.

Sir, may I ask you one other question? I cannot ask you a question, but may I pose one other situation? If indeed the word "results" would lead to all of this, why not then would the word "intent" lead to the same result, except that the proof would be higher? What magic is there about the word "results" or "effect," if we use either one?

Senator HATCH. Because "intent" focuses discrimination analysis upon processes, rather than results.

Mr. HOOKS. Sir?

Senator HATCH. Because it involves an entirely different method of analysis.

Mr. HOOKS. If you could prove that they intended to deliberately discriminate, segregate, to keep blacks out of office, and never let them serve, then would the result be, if the Court finally adopted that finding that, "In this city we find that they deliberately intended never to let blacks be a part of it, and therefore we mandate that they must now get proportional representation, since they have sinned?"

And if they do not have to do it, suppose the Court says, "We find that the result was that they did not let blacks have office, and we therefore mandate proportional representation?" What is the difference between result and intent that would lead to the concept of proportional representation? I do not understand.

Senator HATCH. The difference is, under intent the Court examines the processes which lead to a given results. Under a result test only results, regardless of whether anybody intended to discriminate, are of significance in making a determination as to whether a violation has occurred or not.

Mr. HOOKS. I thought you said that you prove intent largely by results.

Senator HATCH. No. That may be part of the circumstantial evidence in raising the ultimate inference of intent. It is not dispositive in and of itself, however.

Let me just cite the Greenville News about another statement Mr. Gibson made. "South Carolina's population is approximately 30 percent black, and 30 percent of the senate should be black." There is another illustration of a call for proportional representation.

Mr. HOOKS. Yes, sir, I understand that. I can tell you right now that you might find there are many statements that we make in the heat of battle out on the lines and in the trenches that do not have anything to do with the results we seek.

I wonder also if there were not included in the House bill what I think is the Sensenbrenner amendment, if I remember correctly, which says that any language in this bill can never be construed as to ask for proportional representation.

I think the civil rights community even went along with that language, so that we could not be accused of seeking proportional representation. I think that was an amendment to section 2 which was proposed by a very conservative Republican from the State of Wisconsin, if I remember correctly.

Senator HATCH. That that really is no restriction; all you have got to show is one other factor and you have grounds for a violation, whether truly warranted or not.

Let me quote another remark of a colleague of yours in the civil rights community. Rev. Jesse Jackson was quoted in the Columbia Sun on October 25, 1981, as saying, "Blacks comprise one-third of the State of South Carolina's population and deserve one-third of its representation. We believe that taxation without representation is tyranny."

I think that the point I am making, Mr. Hooks, is that maybe these are simply statements made in the heat of battle. But the fact is this: they are being made. And the fact is this: I do not see how anybody interpreting that language in the House bill can interpret it any other way. It would ultimately lead to proportional representation, assuming that the Supreme Court would not find it unconstitutional.

You have made the point here today that the Supreme Court may very well decide—I think it would be improper for them to decide it this way—but that the Court may decide that Congress has the right to set a legal standard of proof in excess of the constitutional standard. I do not think they will find that in the ultimate result, but personally I feel that the country should not have to undergo the experiment in the process.

Mr. HOOKS. Sir, may I make one other statement? I have on many occasions in some cities made the statement that, "This city ought to have a black mayor." Sometimes I make that statement to the white power structure; sometimes I make it to black folk encouraging them to vote and register.

Senator HATCH. I find no fault with that.

Mr. HOOKS. I am not at all sure that Jesse Jackson may not have been talking to a black audience about what they had to do in order to get it.

Proportional representation was not a question, as far as I can see it, between 1965 and 1980, when at least we believed that the effects test was the law. We did believe that.

I must tell you that we were shocked when we discovered in the Mobile v. Bolden case that it required intent. We certainly did not believe that at all in preparing that case and taking it up.

I do not recall proportional representation or the mirror image of the population being a present problem up to that point. I do not think it was; I do not think it will be now.

Senator HATCH. These statements are fine, but the problem we are raising here today is that these statements are being codified into law, in my opinion.

Let me quote from the House report on H.R. 3112. It states there that evidence of lack of proportional representation is "highly relevant."

Mr. HOOKS. I beg your pardon?

Senator HATCH. Evidence of lack of proportional representation is highly relevant in proving a section 2 violation under the results test. Indeed, there is no other factor that they describe in this manner. What does that language mean, in your view?

Mr. HOOKS. It means exactly the same thing to me, Senator, if they had said that proof of proportional representation or lack thereof is very important to prove intent. I just do not think there is any difference at all between intent and results when you talk about proportional representation.

Certainly, if I were trying a lawsuit, or if you were, for some reason, hired by my organization to try a lawsuit—and maybe one day we will be in that happy circumstance—you would not say that even under intent lack of proportional representation deals with the question of results, which deals with the question of intent. I do not think it means any more or less.

I do think certainly, if I were trying a lawsuit, I would deal with the fact that there were five city council people elected and no blacks over a 40-year history, which has to do with representation, whether you put proportional in front of it or not. I would make that same argument whether I was arguing under an intent test or results test. I do not see how I could make any other argument. I would have to use it.

I just fail to see where the word "result" in denying or abridging the rights is any different from intending, except someone tells me that you cannot prove intent, therefore it becomes a nullity.

I think—and I have said before—that the primary difference is that the Administration bill would make it difficult, if not impossible, to ever win a case, because it would demand that you prove intent, and intent is a subjective matter.

I believe, with Senator Mathias, that the Court in Mobile v. Bolden did more or less take a dim view of indirect and circumstantial evidence and demanded intent in the strictest form. Therefore, if result tests resulted in proportional representation, the intent test would if you could prove it.

Maybe--certainly not from your viewpoint, because you would not think like that, but maybe from the viewpoint of some—they are saying, "Let's get intent in there, and since it can never be proven, we won't have to worry about it." But I maintain the results would be absolutely no different, except the standard of proof.

I kept hearing the Attorney General say that the reason he wanted intent was that the standard of proof would be much higher. Yet he kept saying that results would be a part of that standard of proof. You have to look at results, and it may be, in some cases, the only proof you do have.

Senator HATCH. Let me just say this: I appreciate your courtesy to me and your kind remarks, but the issue is greater than that. This is a critical constitutional issue. As a practicing trial lawyer before I came to the Senate, I had very few cases where I did not have to prove some kind of intent. In fact, in every criminal case, I had to demonstrate intent, and beyond a reasonable doubt. And in many of the civil cases I had to prove intent by a preponderance of the evidence. It is done every day in every court of law in this country. If the proposed changes in section 2 would make no difference, then why are you fighting so vehemently for the change?

Let me just add this: You have also indicated that the entire civil rights community strongly opposes a simple extension of the Voting Rights Act. I have not taken a survey, but I believe most of my own mail is running strongly in favor of extending the present law.

Let me also ask you what Mr. A. C. Sutton, president of the Texas chapter of the NAACP, means when he announced in a press conference on January 22 of this year that his organization supports extension of the act "as it is presently constituted," except that there should be a reasonable bailout?

I do not want to be the bearer of bad tidings, but I do not think that there is total unanimity, as you have suggested. I think that most people who have looked at the issue in the civil rights community would be very happy to have the simple extension of this law. After all, every civil rights leader, who has ever talked to me about it has stated that it is the most effective civil rights law in history. This is something I wish to bring to your attention.

Mr. HOOKS. I was simply speaking—I asked Ralph Neas specifically when I came here this morning. We have 157 organizations in our group. They have endorsed the Mathias-Kennedy bill. The 15 civil rights organizations in the black leadership forum have endorsed the Mathias-Kennedy bill.

Obviously, those 157 organizations and those 15 organizations do not represent the totality of the civil rights community, but they do represent the most prominent part of the civil rights community.

When you talked about intent, I kept trying to remember my casebook law—Malum in Se and Malum Prohibitum. I am sure you recognize the fact that intent is proven in some cases if it is prohibited because it is wrong—where it is wrong because it is prohibited or wrong because it is wrong, you prove intent by proving the commission of the act; you do not have to prove intent as a separate element. So if the act was committed, it is Malum in Se; the intent is automatically, ipso facto, proven.

I used to teach a little course in law. I would like to go back and review it. If I am wrong, I will correct it. But I think you will discover that you prove intent in crimes which are considered to be Malum in Se when you prove a commission of the offense. Only in crimes which are Malum Prohibitum, or wrong because they are prohibited, not wrong in themselves, do you have to prove intent as a separate item. If not, there are a lot of people in jail today, that I put in there, that ought not to be there.

And I think we ought to have that same standard over here—that if proof that the effect of the law has been—and when we talk about proportion, that always comes into effect; you can never get away from that. Without some ascertainable, identifiable method of saying what is wrong, you simply cannot deal with it.

In the old days in Tennessee there was no speed law, and the only way you could charge a person with speeding was to prove they were driving recklessly. Today the speed law is 55; when you get above it, that may be proportional; I do not know what it is, but it is a number. When you exceed 55, you have violated the law.

I do not believe that we are going to be faced with a plethora of suits or a multiplicity of actions. I do not believe at all that the courts are going to be any more overwhelmed than they have in the past. I think there was no sinister motive, no hidden agenda in the Mathias-Kennedy-Rodino bills; they simply responded to the overtures of the civil rights community in asking that in extending the present Voting Rights Act you clarify a part which got mixed up in the Mobile case, so there would be no further question about it.

From our viewpoint—and I recognize it as not true from the viewpoint of those who oppose it, but from our viewpoint let me say again, that was not a change but a statement of clarification doing precisely what we thought the law already demanded, but which without any question the Supreme Court had held it did not demand. We wanted that clarified. That is not a substantive change; it is simply clarifying.

I must say, Senator, that we thought from 1965 until about 1978 or 1979 that that was precisely what the law was. We think that all the legislative history will attest to that, and the lower court decisions attest to that. Only when we got the Mobile case did we discover we had a problem, and we wanted that problem remedied. The bailout situation was introduced not by us but by others who felt—and that was sort of a trade off we gave, not anything that we wanted or actively lobbied for.

I support it because I think in good conscience and in honor that having given my word to those who said, "Would you accept this provision of bailout if we vote for it?" I am obligated to support it and to keep credit to my honor and to my word and to those of us who said we would do it. We cannot come here now and suggest that we want to back up on something we agreed to. I think that would be unfair to those with whom we agreed.

Senator HATCH. I have a number of other questions to submit to you. I would like to ask one more at the present time. But, first, let me just make the comment that neither the concepts of Malum in Se nor Malum Prohibitum—has anything to do with intent. We will both look that up and be more sure on it. But I believe Malum in Se is simply a crime, such as a homicide, which is a wrong in and of itself.

Mr. HOOKS. In and of itself.

Senator HATCH. And a crime, Malum Prohibitum, is something like a criminal regulatory statute that statutorily establishes a crime. In other words, most crimes, Malum in Se, were crimes at common law; crimes, Malum Prohibitum were not, but it does not really relate to what we are talking about here today.

Let me just address one other issue and then we will turn to Senator Kennedy. In your testimony, you state that the House of Representatives examined the need for the results standard and concluded on the record before it that it was a necessary change.

Unless I recall the debate incorrectly, there were approximately two witnesses who testified on this issue during the entire hearings, neither of whom had any reservations whatsoever about it. In fact, that balance somewhat typified the entire set of House hearings on this issue.

I hope I am not incorrect on this, but I would like to know where the House record is that you are referring to that makes this case, because to my knowledge none exists.

Mr. HOOKS. I am sorry, you said the House record on the change——

Senator HATCH. The issue of results.

Mr. HOOKS. I do not think I said that. What I was trying to say is that in the civil rights community we went to a number of Senators and Representatives before any bill was introduced and talked about the fact that we were concerned about section 2 and the interpretation of the Court, and that we would like the extension to contain a clarification.

We went to various Senators and Representatives with that statement and did ask specifically Representative Rodino to introduce that change when we got into that. That was what I was trying to say. I did not intend to say—there had been extensive House testimony, and I do not know that I said that. If I did, I misspoke myself. I was saying that we talked with—as we do quite often on bills—to Senators and Representatives before the bill was ever introduced.

Senator HATCH. I am referring to your statement on page 5, for those who would be interested in it, right beneath the indented part.

Let me ask you this, Mr. Hooks: You have gone to the effort of preparing a 17-page statement. I presume you would like me to include that in the record?

Mr. HOOKS. Yes, I would.

Senator HATCH. We certainly will do that, and any other comments you would care to make.

Mr. HOOKS. And the memorandum?

Senator HATCH. The memorandum will also be included in the record immediately following your statement.

I apologize for taking so long here, but some of these issues are just very difficult. I have many more, but, Senator Kennedy, let us turn to you.

Senator KENNEDY. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

As I understand from the House record, there were a number of witnesses who talked about the problems that antedated 1965 and who stressed the importance of the section 2 provision. There was a very extensive amount of information and testimony about the importance of section 2 to reach those particular needs. I think that is important to have on the record.

If I could have the attention of the chairman, as we go through the course of these hearings, Mr. Hooks, I think, very eloquently stated his understanding and the purpose for the provisions under section 2 and was questioned quite intensively about whether this in fact is going to make it a requirement that there be proportional representation in various elections.

There were quite a number of statements read into the record alleging that at least some people might draw conclusions that it would. I thought Mr. Hooks responded to those questions both thoughtfully and with an understanding which is shared by myself and I believe Senator Mathias as to what we intend with the legislation.

I would be interested in asking the Chair whether he differs with that objective that has been outlined by Mr. Hooks. Are we basically talking about altering or changing language to try and achieve what Mr. Hooks has stated, to give minorities an opportunity to participate in a meaningful way in these at-large elections? Are we differing on that point, or does the Chair agree with the objectives that Mr. Hooks has advanced, and are we really trying to find words to achieve that objective?

Senator HATCH. There is no question that I agree with the objectives of stamping out discrimination anywhere it exists in this country. The issue here happens to be whether the Rodino-Kennedy-Mathias revision of section 2 is an appropriate change in the law to facilitate attainment of this end. I vehemently disagree with the implication and remedy suggested in that section.

I am saying that present constitutional law, which I do not believe the Supreme Court will change, requires proof of intent, through direct, indirect, circumstantial evidence, or otherwise, including evidence of the effects or disparate impact of an action. But it does not allow the effects, as defined in this bill, to stand alone and establish a violation.

Whatever the law, I think that the intent test is good policy and ought to continue or be established as public policy. I hope that clarifies my meaning for the distinguished Senator.

Senator KENNEDY. Yes. I was interested in finding out whether the Senator agreed that in these questions, since one of the points that has been stressed and emphasized here today—and there have been a number of individuals whose views have been read into the record, and I understand Mr. Hooks' statement to be an interpretation of what is both my understanding of the language and Senator Mathias' understanding of the language, and those people Mr. Hooks represents and the others who will be testifying—their understanding of what the effect of it will be.

Does the chairman differ with that? If the chairman differs with that, then we have got an area where there can be no—evidently at least, that is an area where there cannot be adjustment. Is it just a question of words, or does he just take issue with the point that Mr. Hooks made?

Senator HATCH. Let me say this: If you were saying that your point, Senator Mathias' point, and perhaps to a degree Mr. Hooks' point, was that this may not amount to proportional representation, yes, I do indeed disagree very strongly. I think it definitely amounts to a call for proportional representation, and I do not see how anyone, who has studied this issue and looks at the ultimate effect of what this section provides, could conclude otherwise.

It means nothing more than is meant by the concept of racial balance or racial quotas. Under the results standard, actions would be judged purely and simply on color-conscious grounds; there is no question about that under this language. This is totally at odds with everything that the Constitution has been directed toward since the Reconstruction amendments, since Brown v. Board of Education, as I said in my statement, and the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

The term "discriminatory results" is Orwellian in the sense that it radically transforms the concept of discrimination from a process or a means into an end or a result.

If it passes, that is the way this bill must be interpreted, and its impact will not just be felt in those States in the South that have had a past practice or pattern of discriminatory conduct; it will affect every municipality of any size and consequence in America, and it is going to permit calls for proportional representation all over America. I do not know how you can conclude otherwise.

Senator KENNEDY. The only point—and then I would like to get to the witness——

Senator HATCH. I would like to get to the witness, too.

Senator KENNEDY. Sure. The Supreme Court effectively made this very finding that the chairman refuses to think that any reasonable person or group of persons might make—both the White decision and the Chavez decision, in 1971 and 1973.

It is our intention to enbrace those decisions which explicitly barred proportional representation based upon percentages, as Mr. Hooks has testified to. It is an attempt to take what the Supreme Court has said in both of those cases and to insure that it would be the standard by which there would be measurement.

Let me move on. Quite frankly, Mr. Hooks, with all due respect, whatever was stated by my good friend and yours, Jesse Jackson, and by others who made comments or statements that were read into the record, they are not going to be codified into the law. They may be expressions of viewpoints, but as you quite appropriately pointed out, the law is what is in the statute; it is more, really, even than what is in the report, although we have heard comments about report language almost as if it were included in the statute itself. My understanding as one of the prime sponsors is in accord with yours and with the cases that you have cited.

I would like to just go back briefly to clarify some matters. They were made here earlier in the day and you made a comment on them, but I think it is important that we have the record complete.

I think you can see quite clearly now that there will be an attempt to at least represent the spokespersons for the civil rights community to basically support a simple extension of the Voting Rights Act as is. That was at least the impression that the Attorney General wanted to give this morning in his statements and his exchange with me, and in his written testimony; I read the provisions of it. There has even been an attempt to suggest that that was your position earlier today.

As I understand it, in the spring of this past year there was a serious effort, while the administration was considering what its position would be on the Voting Rights Act, to alter and change section 5. I think anyone who was reading the newspapers at that time and was following the issue understood that there was a move on by many, both in this body and other places, to subvert section 5—as I understand, that was a very substantial concern to the members of the civil rights community.

At the meetings which took place with the Attorney General—and I had an opportunity to talk to a number of those who were involved in those discussions—they indicated, as you did today, that the efforts to subvert section 5 were very much alive at that period of time, and they wanted to make sure that section 5 would be maintained, and this was a primary concern, but that they also indicated—and you were one of those who participated in those meetings; we will hear from others, and I am eager to hear from them—that the section 2 provisions were very much on the agenda and very much in the minds of those who participated in that discussion. Am I correct?

Mr. HOOKS. Yes, I think we can say that from the very day of the introduction on April 7 of the Kennedy-Mathias-Rodino bill, we in the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights and NAACP came out in support of that bill. That included the change or clarification in 2; it did not include the final change in section 5.

In the meetings with the Attorney General, we pointed out how important it was to clear up the Mobile v. Bolden case. That was one of the primary points we covered.

I have tried to indicate that as it related to section 5, that we were accepting a compromise, and that was a very painful thing. We had to meet in committees, back and forth, by letter and by phone.

I do not think, however, that at the time we met with the Attorney General we had come to a conclusion on that section 5. We were still trying to come out for a stronger sort of bail-out thing.

I think it was subsequent to the meeting with the Attorney General that we accepted the Hyde amendment. I call it the Hyde amendment; he was the principal protagonist in that situation. But on section 2 we did point out very clearly——

Senator KENNEDY. It seems to me, if I could interject at this point, that a good deal of the steam went out from the administration's contemplation of changing section 5 when Mr. Hyde altered his position on that.

Mr. HOOKS. Yes, I think so. It represented, as I recall, a sort of compromise on both sides. I believe that Mr. Hyde did not get all that he was originally seeking and that certainly the civil rights community did not get what it wanted. I thought it represented an honorable and reasonable compromise on that, and we did that in order to get the largest possible bipartisan support for the major portions of the bill.

Senator KENNEDY. Earlier in the day, with the Attorney General, I reviewed at least some of the areas of very considerable concern, not only to me but to a number of citizens in this country, about positions that the administration has taken on the issues of civil rights. I believe those comments are accurate or factual. If they were not, I would have expected there would be some response to them. They were characterized in a certain way, but I think as someone who has followed these issues closely over a period of time, they were factual.

I raised them at that period of time because I think we have to view the provisions of the Voting Rights Act against the performance of the administration on the issue of basic and fundamental commitment to both voting and to other civil rights issues. I am just wondering whether you think that is a fair standard to use as we are considering the extension of this legislation.

Mr. HOOKS. Senator, I must say that I was present this morning when you went down the list of certain, what we consider to be, negative, regressive, or reactionary action on the part of this administration as it referred to either civil rights enforcement or civil rights legislation.

We have protested. Each of those things which you have cited we have talked about with somebody in the administration by phone, letter, or personal conference. In each instance we tried to say to Mr. Reagan personally when he came to the NAACP convention that in one sense the voting rights bill was the litmus test. At that point Mr. Reagan's public statements were not even as much in favor of the bill as they are now. It was nationwide, as I recall.

I thought you very eloquently went down the list, and certainly I would be in complete agreement with the assessment that the perception of the black community is that this administration is not very pro-civil rights. In that context, the Voting Rights Act, which was viewed as a major bill that has worked and performed well, ought to be adopted. That is where all this confusion, I think, has arisen about our statement that it ought to be extended as it was written.

It has been made to appear that the change in section 2 is of such moment that we have somehow changed our position. May I just state again for the record that basically we are still saying it ought to be extended as it was written, with the clarification—and it is our position that all of the accompanying legislative history of this bill indicates that what is being written in the bill now as it relates to effects or results was what was intended. That statement was made back and forth.

Therefore, I make no apology for supporting the bill in its present form, with the statement that we want an extension. But section 5 was something that was added in the give and take of the legislative process.

I cannot agree with Attorney General Smith—and I respect his ability as a lawyer; I cannot agree with Senator Hatch, and I respect his ability as a very powerful and persuasive legislator, powerful Senator, and great lawyer—that this is bad legislation versus good legislation.

I think the only difference—and I want to say that again, for whatever it means—is that the standard of intent that the administration would have us follow is a much more difficult standard to prove and may prove well nigh impossible.

Only to that extent does it change anything. It would mean that the civil rights community would be forced to an impossible burden to achieve any equity and parity in the kinds of procedures that have for so long dogged us.

I might point out, the fight has changed, the status is different. In my earlier days as a practicing lawyer and civil rights advocate, it was outright physical brutality, hostility, aggression, intimidation, fear, even murder, lynchings, and beatings. Today it is much more subtle. It is changing the place where you go to register. It is changing the rules about how you get off the road. It is a matter of changing the places where you vote. There are all kinds of things that have happened. Again, I refer to my written testimony.

It is those practices which can result in the things that we complain of that we ought to be able to deal with. I strongly maintain that that is as much of a standard of proof as we ought to have.

I must confess my inability to read into the word "results" some kind of code word for proportional representation; it just eludes me altogether.

I recognize that since I may be weakening my case, I want to come right back to say one thing. I maintain that whatever the word "results" would do so far as proportional representation is concerned, the word "intent" would do the same thing, the difference being that you put upon the plaintiffs—and the plaintiffs in this case would be those who were injured, those were aggrieved, those who were being shut out, left out, kept out, knocked out, locked out—upon us would be put the burden of an impossible situation.

We have proven that what you are doing has resulted in no black representation, or—let us go a little step further—inadequate black representation, whatever that may be in a given situation. We have proven that your laws have done that, your practices have done that.

And then the Court says, "But that is not enough. You must prove that the mayor, and the council, and the legislators who did this intended that result." The best way to prove intent is to put the person on the stand and say, "What is your intention?"

I agree with Senator Mathias. Any city attorney worth his salt, let alone his salary, is going to protect their principles from the question of intent. The easiest thing in the world to hide is intent.

I just think it puts on us a standard that, in good conscience, ought not to be put on by any administration that is really concerned about any aspect of this civil rights community, and in light of all of the other things we have talked about and which you enumerated this morning, only add salt to the wounds and convince us beyond perhaps any shadow of a doubt that the administration has no real intention of enforcing anything affirmatively in the field of civil rights.

Senator KENNEDY. That is a very eloquent and powerful statement and an accurate one, Mr. Hooks.

I do not know whether this covers a little of the same ground—we have other witnesses we want to hear from—but if it were to be the decision of the Congress for some reason to follow the administration's recommendations in this area, what do you think that would mean to not only the minority citizens of this country, but I just think with regard to the majority citizens as well?

Mr. HOOKS. I think it has two distinct and separate meanings, but they are joined together. The most immediate meaning would be that the legal burden of proving that the Voting Rights Act has not been complied with would be made infinitely more difficult from a legal viewpoint, because intent is subjective; no matter how you spell it, it is subjective. I have practiced law long enough to know the difference between the subjective and the objective.

I understand very well that it is not a matter of what you intend to go 75 miles an hour or did not know you were going 75; it only deals with the penalty; it has nothing to do with whether you are guilty or not; I know that as a fact. That would be the first and most obvious result.

The second result is much more important and devastating. For almost 50 years in this country the black community has had the feeling that either the President, or the Supreme Court, or the Congress has been more or less concerned about the plight of blacks and poor.

If this Congress were to follow the lead of this President and put this much more difficult standard in effect, it would confirm the belief that at this stage of the game, 1982, neither the Congress, nor the Supreme Court, nor the executive branch is particularly concerned about the plight of poor and minorities. If that happens, it further weakens the resolve of minority people to be a vital and viable part of this country.

I think it signals to the white community, whether consciously or unconsciously, whether by deliberation or accident, that civil rights is not a high priority.

It puzzles me, Senator, today that this is one of the highest points of consideration and concern for the civil rights community in this Nation. We have agitated; we have lobbied; we have been up and down the Halls of Congress; we have written letters, sent telephone calls and telegrams; we have been to the Attorney General's office; we have talked to the President, the Vice President, and Members of the Cabinet. Since April this has been the main item on the agenda of black and minority Americans.

Yet, Senator Kennedy and Mr. Chairman, on this date, January 27, the Attorney General still does not know where he stands and does not know where the President stands. To me, that is saying that they do not give a very high priority to the considerations of black people.

I cannot understand how any administration from April to January——

Senator HATCH. I do not want to interrupt you, but I think——

Senator KENNEDY. Can we hear from the witness?

Mr. HOOKS. I am sorry if I went—I am saying though, my viewpoint is that I was flabbergasted when Senator Kennedy asked him, "Where do you stand on it?" From April through January this has been our top priority. We have tried to impress everybody.

We told Mr. Reagan, "This is a litmus test—where you stand on this legislation." And today, on January 27, after all of this talk I am met with the proposition that on the hypothetical question—and I must admit that that hypothetical question was much less detailed than your hypothetical question about Boston; yours was much better prepared. But Senator Kennedy's hypothetical question only involved two things: 389 people in the House had voted for, and 62 Senators are cosponsors. If that is the case, would the President sign it? And Mr. Smith said—and I can understand his answer—"I don't know." I can accept that.

But then he asked the other question, "What will you advise?" And he said, "I don't know until the law is passed." It makes me think that they listen but they do not hear. They are not aware of our anguish, our concern. They are not aware of our deep-felt need to have a definite trumpet sound somewhere in this administration.

I cannot point to one action of this administration that would give any hope or comfort to minority people on any front. That is a sad statement, a tragic statement, but a true statement.

I would have thought—fervently hoped—that at least on this issue—the news came to me in Utah that the President had decided that he would sign whatever bill the Senate and the House could pass. I was at the television station. They said, "What is your reaction to that?" I was about to give the President a glowing, great hand, and some inner instinct said, "Wait, you haven't seen that yet; you have only heard somebody say it." And, lo and behold, an hour later the news was that Attorney General Smith had vetoed that suggestion, and Mr. Reagan said he could not support the House-passed version. I was almost captured on tape for posterity, praising him for an action which he did not take. I am so glad——

Senator HATCH. That would be unique.

Mr. HOOKS. I escaped that fate.

Senator KENNEDY. Finally, the administration is basically urging us to accept their good faith. Is not our job here to make sure that their good faith is written into good law? Are we not under a responsibility as legislators to make sure that it is written into laws, not only for this administration but for any future administration?

Mr. HOOKS. I would say so, yes, very definitely.

Senator KENNEDY. I have other questions which I would like to submit, Mr. Hooks. I want to thank you very much for a fine presentation.

Senator HATCH. Mr. Hooks, the subcommittee counsel would like to ask you one question.

Mr. HOOKS. Yes, sir.

Mr. MARKMAN. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I would just like to ask one brief series of questions that perhaps may illustrate that there is a more significant difference between the intent and effect tests than simply the fact that one may be less difficult or more difficult to prove than the other one.

As Senator Hatch indicated earlier in the hearings, the process by which the Court implements the intent test is to look to the totality of circumstances, put those circumstances, as it were, in a pile before it, and ask itself the question, "Do these circumstances raise the inference of intent?"

This is a clear legal standard for evaluation. It is a standard that has been employed by courts in a variety of contexts for years, indeed centuries. Can you explain to me on the other hand the process by which the "results" test is put into operation?

Let me give you a hypothetical situation, if I could. Suppose you have a community that lacks proportional representation in its city council. That, in and of itself, the House report suggests, is not a violation of section 2. The report, however, indicates—and I think your testimony has suggested—that the addition of some "objective factor of discrimination" would, however, consummate a violation.

The kind of objective factors that the House report mentions, some of which you touch upon in your testimony, include things like bloc voting and at-large systems of government.

Let us assume that this hypothetical community has a lack of proportional representation on its city council and has an at-large system; two-thirds of the municipalities in this country do. Why is that jurisdiction not thereby in violation of section 2? Could you please give me some specifics?

Mr. HOOKS. Yes, sir. I think your question is very good, and it is very to the point. Let me just suggest this: If I were trying the case before a court, and I proved the results—I think that is what you are saying; I hope I am following your analogy—in this particular city there are no blacks on the city council or the city commission, whatever the government body is—on the legislature if it were the State.

You are now asking how I prove those facts to the Court. The Court is now getting ready to make a decision. You are saying, what do they take into consideration?

They would take the results that I have been able to prove to them and then say, "Now, what led to those results? What practices? What kind of situations that are prohibited or illegal, are discriminatory, are wrong? What are the practices that have happened that have prevented it? Or what are the practices that are right?"

Suppose the Court asks, "Did the black folk vote at all?" and I said, "No, they all stayed home that day because it was Martin King's holiday," or because they were angry at something or other—for any reason.

In other words, you have got to find, counsel, as I see it, what the Court takes into consideration. The results stand surely as one part. But coupled with results are the practices, and that has to be tied together.

The only difference between that, as I see it, and intent is that intent takes you to another subjective realm of speculation, and that may not ever be proven to the satisfaction of some courts.

I have had some years of experience sitting as a judge, and I have had to deal with these kinds of problems, and I know the practical results. I would say that—and let me be very frank—simply proven results would not be enough to trigger the mechanism of section 2. It would only trigger it if the results were caused by some practice. Results simply trigger looking at the practices; that is all.

Mr. MARKMAN. You are absolutely right about that, but the premise of my question was that we had one of these additional objective factors that the report refers to that are of the sort that explain the lack of proportional representation. In this case, the explanatory factor is the existence of at-large voting.

Mr. HOOKS. I recognize that the whole issue of at-large voting is a stumbling block or a question that has to be considered, but may I respectfully suggest, it has to be considered in intent. What was the intent of the legislature or the city council in setting up at-large voting? At-large voting is not an end to itself; it is not a be-all and end-all; it is a part of a process.

In 1912—if we were to be honest and the Court were to look at why they set up at-large voting, would you say they set up at-large voting to keep black folk out? One answer would be, "Absolutely no, because blacks were not even running for office then; they would have been lynched; it was unheard of. We did not have to keep them out. It may have been for some other purpose." But if they had been called on to give an intent, they would say, "Oh, yes, that is a part of it too."

All I am saying is that when you deal specifically—the history of official discrimination in registration in voting, other special devices, the absence of a strong State nonracial policy in favor of the practice—there are all kinds of things the Court would have to look at when we have results, the same things they would look at, in my judgment, as they were looking at in intent, except that the standard of proof would at least be susceptible of carrying the burden of proof. The burden of proof in intent may be absolutely impossible. That is why I fail to see.

You may ask me the same question, and I might ask you, "Why are you so set on intent?" You could turn around and ask me, "Why are you so concerned and upset about nothing but results?" But my answer is very simple. The reason I am very upset about the word "intent" is that the standard of proof becomes well nigh impossible.

Mr. MARKMAN. With all due respect, I would just say that you are redefining what the results test is. In the Mobile case it was considered irrelevant that there was no intent on the part of Mobile in establishing their structure to discriminate against minorities.

Mr. HOOKS. Are you saying that in Mobile they did not consider results as a part of the intent test? Is that what you are saying?

Mr. MARKMAN. No, I am saying that I believe you are redefining what the results test is by suggesting that the Court would be likely to look to intent in considering whether or not the existence of at-large voting consummated a section 2 violation. What is your basis for saying that?

Mr. HOOKS. I will have to read that. I do not quite follow. I am simply trying to point out that the whole question of at-large voting has been a thorny political issue for a long time, and that is an issue that may be solved in some instances by the political process. I think it is important that we deal with that and that the intent test as defined by Mobile put a very negative inference on indirect and circumstantial evidence; I think that is a fact.

Senator HATCH. Mr. Hooks, just one final question. Do you favor or not favor abolishing at-large systems generally? Are you for or against that proposition?

Mr. HOOKS. Let me say this. You are probably familiar with the case of Baker v. Carr. You perhaps know that case arose in Tennessee. I was a very concerned participant in that case. We came out with a slogan, "One man, one vote." It should have been "One person, one vote." That indicated our inherent chauvinistic weaknesses at that point.

But I am not necessarily uniformly in favor of district versus at-large elections. I think it is a circumstance to be considered in the totality of all other circumstances. I have been involved personally, and the NAACP has an official position on it. That position is, it depends on circumstance.

We do not say that you have to, in every instance, have a district election rather than an at-large election, except that—I thought I heard something very strange this morning; maybe I did not hear right. I do not have any problem with the fact that Utah has two Senators and my adopted State of New York has two, and we are maybe 10 times your population.

It does not bother me that Mayor Koch is a mayor of a city of 7 million and Johnny Ford is a mayor of a city of 10,000. They are district units that are predetermined. To the extent that Detroit is a city, it has a mayor. But also Grand Rapids is a city and other smaller places. States differ geographically and populationwise. They are artificial districts which we accept, and I do not have any problem with that.

Within the city, whether you have at-large or district elections depends on the circumstances. I certainly think we have to look at that.

Senator HATCH. Thank you, Mr. Hooks.

We will submit any further questions to you in writing.

Mr. HOOKS. Thank you.

Senator HATCH. I personally am grateful that you have taken the time to be here. I respect you as a civil rights leader and as one of the great people in this country. We do happen to differ on this particular issue, however.

Mr. HOOKS. I appreciate having this opportunity. If it is not against the sunshine law, or the Freedom of Information, or getting together on a conspiracy, I would like to talk with you further, not necessarily under all these lights.

Senator HATCH. Yes, I do not think it will be against any of those. Thank you very much.

[The prepared statement of Benjamin L. Hooks and additional material follow:]

PREPARED STATEMENT OF BENJAMIN L. HOOKS

Mr. Chairman, and members of the Subcommittee, I am Benjamin L. Hooks, Executive Director of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. In my appearance here today, I am also speaking as Chairman of both the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights and the Black Leadership Forum--two organizations vitally interested in this issue - the extension of the Voting Rights Act.

The National Association for the Advancment of Colored People is a 73-year old civil rights association with more than 1800 branches and 600 youth and college chapters. We operate in all 50 states and the District of Columbia. The Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, founded in 1949 is a coalition of 159 organizations. The Black Leadership Forum is comprised of the Chief Executive officers of 15 national black organizations.

I am accompanied today by Ms Althea T. L. Simmons, Director of the NAACP's Washington Bureau and Leadership Conference officials, Ralph Neas, Executive Director and General Counsel, Joseph L. Rauh.

The organizations I represent appreciate the invitation to appear before the subcommittee today. We are here, Mr. Chairman, to announce once again our strong and unswerving support of the extension of the Voting Rights Act and specifically to support S 1992.

There is no doubt in my mind that the Voting Rights Act is the single most effective piece of legislation drafted in the last two decades. As significant as this legislation is, its potential has not yet been realized. We believe that the Voting Rights Act is as essential in the 1980's as it was in the 1960's. It is still needed to provide the mechanism to do what then President Lyndon B. Johnson envisioned when he made his remarks at the signing of the Act on August 6, 1965:

> "This Act flows from a clear and simple wrong. Its only purpose is to right that wrong. Millions of Americans are denied the right to vote because of their color. This law will ensure them the right to vote. The wrong is one which no American in his heart can justify. The right is one which no American, true to our principles, can deny..."

We are all too aware that there are those who say the civil rights community is too difficult to deal with on the question of the Voting Rights Act; some question the continued need for this legislation and argue that it has served its purpose--that a 10-year extension, at most, should be satisfactory.

Some posit that the Act is punitive toward certain sections of the country; others say we ought to give the states an opportunity to show that they no longer have barriers to deny blacks and other minorities the right to cast a ballot or run and be elected to office. Some propose deleting the language minority provisions; others champion nationwide coverage. Still others resort to scare tactics either stating or implying that a vote for this measure is a vote for proportional representation. Mr. Chairman and members of this committee, I know of no group in the civil rights community that has advocated proportional representation.

Some challenge the bailout provisions as being unfair and "exceedingly difficult to meet"; and we cannot ignore the position taken by the Chairman of this Subcommittee that "intent" should be the standard of proof in discrimination cases.

Mr. Chairman, and members of the Subcommittee, these are the obstacles we face in 1982 as we try to guarantee the most fundamental of all rights to Americans--the right to vote.

The entire civil rights community strongly opposes a simple 10-year extension of the Voting Rights Act for several reasons. First, such a measure would incorporate the "intent" test, a standard of proof of discrimination that would jeopardize the voting rights of millions of Americans. Second, a simple extension would not extend until 1992 the bilingual provisions of the Voting Rights Act. The comprehensive record developed in the House of Representatives demonstrates conclusively that these provisions protect the voting rights of millions of language minority Americans.

The House-passed bill, H.R. 3113, and S. 1992, the measure before this Subcommittee, satisfy these two vital prerequisites. Some have suggested that the House-passed bill is too strict. The record indicates just the opposite. After more than five months of comprehensive hearings, intense and lengthy negotiations, mark-ups and floor debate, the House passed a compromise measure by the overwhelming vote of 389-24. And even more significant, every weakening amendment offered--amendments which are resurfacing once again--was defeated by at least a margin of two to one.

One crippling amendment which was resoundingly defeated in the House was an amendment which would ratify the Supreme Court's conclusion in City of Mobile v. Bolden, 446 U.S. 55(1980), that discriminatory intent or purpose must be proved to establish a violation of Section 2 of the Act.

Section 2 applies nationwide and prohibits the imposition or application of voting qualifications or prerequisites to voting, and the use of standards, practices or procedures which deny or abridge the right to vote. All challenged election practices or procedures adopted prior to 1965, and all challenges to practices of jurisdistions not covered by Section 5 of the Act, must be brought under Section 2.

Rejecting the "intent" amendment, the House found that the Supreme Court had misinterpreted the scope of Section 2--that it was not the intent of Congress that a discriminatory purpose be proved to establish a Section 2 violation. Moreover, the House found that the history and purpose of the Act, and the persistent voting rights violations, dictate that the Act retain the pre-Bolden "results" test. See Voting Rights Act Extension House Report, 97 Cong. 1st Sess., Rept. No. 97-227, pp 28-31 (1981).

Mr. Chairman and members of this Subcommittee, I urge you to reject the intent standard as did the House. The organizations I represent and the civil rights community, without exception, oppose the "intent" test. It is not only a difficult test---it is almost impossible, and is oftimes a code word for allowing discrimination to continue, even when discrimination is there for everyone to see.

The proponents of the "intent" standard suggest that the "results" test, which the civil rights community advocates and the House adopted, is contrary to the history of legal precedent; unconstitutional; would make voting rights violations too easy to prove; and would create a right to proportional representation. An examination of each of these contentions, belies them.

First of all, we need not guess at the legislative intent. Testifying for the Justice Department which drafted the Act, Attorney General Katzenbach expressly stated during the 1965 Hearings that Section 2 was to reach any practice or procedure "if its purpose or effect was to deny or abridge the right to vote on account of race or color." Hearings on S.1564 before the Committee on the Judiciary, U.S. Senate, 89th Congress, 1st Session, pp. 191-92 (1965) (Emphasis supplied).

The language in the legislative history referenced by proponents of the intent standard, indicating that Congress intended Section 2 to track the prohibition of the 15th Amendment, does not suggest a contrary interpretation. For, at the time the Voting Rights Act was enacted, it was not at all clear that intent had to be proved to meet the constitutional standard. The Supreme Court had not then taken that position. To the contrary---in 1965 the Court took the position that an electoral scheme was unconstitutional because, "designedly or otherwise," it worked to dilute black voting strength. Forston v. Dorsey--U.S.--(1965). It was not until recent years that the Supreme Court stated unequivocally that to make out a case of discrimination under the Constitution one must prove intent. See Village of Arlington Heights v. Metropolitan Housing Development Corporation, 429 U.S. 252 (1977); Washington v. Davis, 426 U.S. 229 (1976).

At the time Congress adopted the purpose or effect standard, it was, in fact, tracking the Fifteenth Amendment as it was then interpreted. This accounts for the apparent difference between Congress' expressed purpose to outlaw in Section 2, voting practices or procedures with a discriminatory purpose or effect, and its intention to track the Fifteenth Amendment.

The remarks of Senator Javits attest to the unequivocal intent of Congress, in Section 2, to reach not only intentional voting rights violations, but also those which have a discriminatory result:

> "The bill was designed not only to correct an active history of discrimination, the denying to Negroes of the right to register and vote, but also to deal with the accumulation of discrimination... the bill would attempt to do something about those accumulated wrongs and the continuance of the wrongs." 111 Cong. Rec. 8395 (1965).

Opponents of the "results" test argue that even if Congress intended Section 2 to reach purposeful violations as well as those resulting in discrimination, such a standard is unconstitutional. Nothing could be further from the truth.

The Supreme Court has stated beyond peradventure that Congress has power to enact legislation which goes beyond any constitutional requirement (intent), in order to protect rights secured by the Constitution. City of Rome v. U.S., 446 U.S. 156, 64 L. Ed. 119 (1980); Fullilove v Klutznick, 448 U.S., 448; 100 S. Ct. 2758, 2774 (1980); South Carolina v. Katzenbach, 383 U.S. 301 (1966). The enactment of legislation which goes beyond the specific requirements of the Constitution is appropriate where the legislation is designed to remedy the effects of past and present constitutional violations. See, id. Where a fundamental right has been denied or abridged over the years, as has been the case in the area of voting rights, there is a compelling reason for Congress to enact statutory provisions which impose a "more rigorous" standard, to ensure the victims' protection against continued Constitutional violations, and to remedy the present effects of past and present violations. This is particularly true where, as in the case of voting rights, the constitutional standard has proven ineffective to remedy the malady.

Proponents of an "intent" test also suggest that the "results" test should be rejected because it would make it too easy to prove voting rights violations, and that such violations should not be made easy to prove because they provide a basis for intrusive interference by federal courts into state and local processes. This argument is of the tenor of reverse psychology, for no court has found a "results" test, such as the one in S.1992,which requires an examination of an aggregate of objective factors, to be "too easy". The Supreme Court has, however, often noted the difficulty of proving intent.

Even in those cases where the High Court has required a showing of intent, it has nonetheless recognized the difficulty and often impossibility of meeting such a standard. Village of Arlington Heights v. Metropolitan Housing Development Corporation, supra; Washington v. Davis, supra; Dayton Board of Education v. Brinkman, 433 U.S. 406 (1971). The Court has stated that "discriminatory intent" is not "amenable to calibration". Personnel Administrator of Massachusetts v. Feeney, 332 U.S. 256 (1979); Hazelwood School District v. United States, 433 U.S. 299, (1977); Arlington Heights, supra; Washington v. Davis, supra.

The right to vote is the most fundamental of all rights secured by our Constitution. It is "the essence of a democratic society and any restrictions on that right strike at the heart of representative government." Reynolds v. Sims, 377 U.S. 533, 561-62 (1964). The difficulties inherent in establishing discriminatory intent should not be imposed as a barrier to free and unabridged participation in the political process, particularly since a results standard can accomplish the goal of the Voting Rights Act to eliminate discriminatory voting practices.

The House of Representatives examined the need for the more rigorous standard in Section 2 and concluded on the record before it, which was replete with examples of the need for a "results" test, that requiring a showing of discriminatory intent to prove a Section 2 violation would run contra to the legislative history of the Act, the purpose of the Act, and that such a test could not adequately meet the voting rights violations which remain manifest.

The testimony during the House hearings revealed, as the Senate records will by the close of the hearings, that the discriminatory results of at-large elections, racial gerrymandering; majority vote run-offs, full slate voting requirements, annexations, malapportionment and the like, remain manifest. It would be difficult to show that these election schemes or official actions were adopted for a discriminatory purpose. There is usually little or no evidence of the purpose of an election scheme or official action--many of which are decades old. There may be no record of the proceedings at which the discriminatory election scheme or action was adopted, particularly in small, rural areas. If there is a record of the proceedings, it is rare that someone will have stated for the record that the action taken was for a discriminatory purpose. The sequence of events leading up to the discriminatory action may or may not be telling. Often the historical background reveals nothing out of the ordinary. See, Arlington Heights, supra, and its progeny.

What is always "amenable to calibration", Mr. Chairman, is the result of a challenged election scheme. In many instances, no black will have been elected in the district's history despite the fact that there may be racial bloc voting and a minority population of fifty percent or better. In Jackson, Mississippi, no black has been elected to any city council position although blacks make up 40 percent of the city's population. Testimony in the House of Representatives revealed that in Virginia there are four counties where blacks make up 40 percent of the population yet there are no blacks on the board of supervisors of those counties. There are many other instances of this kind in the covered jurisdictions, Mr. Chairman. These two are cited as examples.

We are not suggesting, as the opponents of the "results" test would have you believe, that minorities have a right to proportional representation. The "results" test will not establish a quota of minority elected officials. The amendment to Section 2 expressly disavows these notions. It provides that:

> "the fact that members of a minority group have not been elected in numbers equal to the group's proportion of the population shall not, in and of itself, constitute a violation."

Under a "results" test, minority representation will likely be a factor in establishing that an election scheme has a discriminatory effect; however, minority representation is not the central focus of the inquiry and in some instances, may not be a factor at all. Under a "results" test, the focal point of the inquiry would be on the dilution of black voting strength, not the ability of black candidates to get elected. There may be instances, as is the case with the 10th Congressional District of New Jersey (D-Rodino), where a black electorate elects a white candidate. The failure of that predominantly black district to elect a black candidate, without more, certainly would not lead to a finding of discriminatory result.

To prove that an election scheme has a discriminatory result, an aggregate of objective factors would have to be proved, such as:

- a history of discrimination affecting the right to vote.
- the use of devices or procedures designed to ensure that only the majority will get elected, such as a majority vote requirement, anti-single-shot provision, at-large elections, numbered posts, or purging of voter registation rolls;
- racial bloc voting
- all-white or predominantly white political organizations which control the slating process and exclude minorities or employ racial campaign tactics;
- access of minorities to the majority (whether minority candidates were afforded equal access to forums, public space, etc.)
- equal accommodation of minority voters (whether absentee ballots were provided for minority citizens in the same manner and under the same circumstances as whites; whether the polling places are accessable in the communities where the minorities reside, and times convenient for the voters.)

All of these factors need not be proved to establish a Section 2 violation. What would have to be clear, however, is that the persons challenging the scheme were effectively shut out of the electoral process--that they were denied equal opportunity to participate in the political process--or that their voting strength was effectively diluted.

Mr. Chairman, and members of the Subcommittee, while H.R. 3112 and S. 1992 are good and fair bills, it must be understood by this Committee and the Senate, that those who favor a strong Voting Rights Act view it as a major compromise because of the new bailout provision which will allow covered jurisdictions to bail out, either as entire states, or even separately by counties. This new bailout provision was agreed to by civil rights supporters, after agonizing consideration and lengthy negotiations, as an incentive for covered jurisdictions, even though the thorough House hearings (which included numerous opponents of the Act's extension) did not demonstrate any basis for changing the bailout provision that is currently in the law.

Nonetheless, there are those who would like to ignore the major accommodation represented by the liberalized bailout, and who now criticize the bailout provision as "exceedingly difficult to meet". In fact, the bailout standards are equitable and reasonable. Each of the provisions in S.1992 is necessary to insure that only those jurisdictions bail out that have (1) complied with the Act; (2) abandoned discriminatory voting procedures and practices; and, (3) taken positive steps to include minorities fully in the political process. These standards are achievable.

According to projections made on available data by the Joint Center for Political Studies, more than 20% of the counties in the covered jurisdictions will be eligible to apply for bailout in 1984.

When the Voting Rights Act legislation was introduced last year in the House of Representatives, my organization adamantly opposed any new bailout provision, because, despite the gains made in the enfranchisement of blacks in the covered jurisdictions, the promise of the Act has not yet been realized. Despite the legal protections presently afforded by the Act, problems of grave magnitude are still encountered by those seeking full voter participation. NAACP branches in Alabama, Florida, Georgia, Mississippi, North and South Carolina, Texas and Virginia report that current barriers to voter participation include:

- . failure of covered jurisdictions to preclear election changes;
- . insufficient voting hours and facilities;
- . permissiveness in the location of rotating books;
- . change of single member districts to multi-member districts;
- . limited use of deputy registrars;
- . racial gerrymandering of district lines;
- . annexation of white suburbs or subdivisions to previously majority black districts;
- . subtle intimidation of black voters at the polls;
- . use of voter re-identification procedures in some areas to purge voter rolls, necessitating re-registration;
- . lack of adequate notice regarding changes in polling places;
- . inadequate publication of procedural rules for voting;
- . lack of availability of registrars outside the 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. work day;
- . certification of absentee ballots of non-residents;
- . majority runoff requirements in areas where there is no districting;
- . physical location of registrar's office in places not conducive to minority participation (in segregated clubs; close proximity to sheriff's office, etc.);
- . lack of black deputy registrars;
- . "open primaries" which require a majority vote to win office;
- . racial bloc voting;
- . prohibition of "single shot" voting
- . increased filing fee;
- . numbered post requirements with staggered terms.

Though there was no evidence presented during the House hearings regarding any counties eligible to bail out now, the civil rights community, against its best judgment, agreed to a new, vastly modified bailout provision to serve as an incentive to covered jurisdictions to comply with the law and eliminate the need for a Voting Rights Act.

We support the continued jurisdiction for bailout suits being in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia rather than in local District Courts in the covered jurisdictions. When the Congress enacted the Voting Rights Act of 1965, it vested exclusive jurisdiction of bailout suits in the District Court for the District of Columbia to ensure uniform application of the bailout standards and impartial judicial decision-making free of local biases and political pressures. The U.S. Supreme Court, in South Carolina v. Katzenbach, 383 U.S. 301, 331-32 (1966) upheld this limitation of jurisdiction as an appropriate exercise of the constitutional authority of Congress to "ordain and establish" inferior federal tribunals (U.S. Const. Art. III, § 1).

The purposes of the bailout provision would be seriously undermined if jurisdiction were vested in local District Courts and the interpretations of the legal standards governing bailout applied in New York were different from those applied in Mississippi. Further, the 1965 legislative history of the Act shows that the extraordinary remedies provided by the Act (including administrative preclearance) were required because relief in voting rights cases filed in Southern District Courts was extremely difficult and sometimes impossible to obtain, and numerous appeals were required, even in cases presenting the most compelling facts. Testimony before the House Subcommittee on Civil and Constitutional Rights last year has demonstrated that, in significant instances, this is still the case. For example, the Mississippi legislative reapportionment case (Connor v. Johnson) went on for fourteen years--including nine trips to the Supreme Court--before effective relief for voting rights denials was finally obtained.

We therefore believe, Mr. Chairman, that, in addition, the D.C. District Court now has extensive experience in voting rights matters and that the experience coupled with a dispassionate forum for the litigation of bailout issues supports our position that there is a continued need for uniform application of the bailout standards.

Some have questioned the feasibility of considering the bilingual provisions at this time since those provisions do not expire until 1985. We strongly support their consideration at this time because we believe that there is no logical reason for the difference in expiration dates and because the bilingual provisions are now under attack. S. 53, a bill to repeal bilingual provisions of the Voting Rights Act is now pending before the Senate.

We have been told that bilingual provisions are too costly, yet the testimony in the House of Representatives showed, without concrete refutation, that such is not the case where "targeting" is used by local registrars. In Los Angeles, during the 1980 General Election, the cost of providing bilingual materials to more than 45,000 persons was only 1.9% of the total costs of the election.

Mr. Chairman and members of the Subcommittee, we say to those who argue that providing bilingual materials is too costly--how much is the right to vote worth? No price tag can be put on this right, said by many to be the cornerstone of all other rights. We have never seen any reliable figures on how much the First Amendment rights are worth, or how many dollars could buy the 11th Amendment rights of the states. At such time as price tags can be put on these other fundamental protections, we will be more sensitive to the need to place price tags on the right to vote.

For the Hispanic adult who cannot speak or read English fluently, the right to vote has no meaning if it cannot be used. Against this backdrop, the mere inconvenience or costs of printing pales into insignificance.

Since the 1975 extension of the Act when the bilingual provisions were enacted, the political process has been opened up to many who were previously excluded and we believe that this protection is essential to preserve the rights of a group of citizens to participate fully in all aspects of American life.

The suggestion has also been made that coverage under the Voting Rights Act should be extended to all 50 states. Senator Cochran has introduced S. 1761, an amendment which would create a new preclearance procedure making the preclearance requirement under the Act nationwide. We oppose this amendment. The preclearance provision now covers all or parts of 22 states, including parts of California, Connecticut, Massachusetts, Michigan, New Hampshire and New York. States are "captured" for preclearance coverage based on a neutral triggering formula. The formula automatically applies to any state or political subdivision which had a literacy test for voter registration and where less than 50% of the voting age residents were registered or voted in presidential elections. The Act is nationwide now. It bans literacy tests and the poll tax nationwide and requires preclearance of any voting changes in any state or political subdivision covered by the triggering formula. In addition to the preclearance provisions in Section 5, the Act contains two other sections which apply nationwide. Section 2 provides a basis for challenging discriminatory voting practices through a lawsuit in federal court. Section 3(c) authorizes preclearance of voting changes by a jurisdiction upon a judicial finding of voting discrimination. Sections 3(c) and 2 can be used to reach patterns of voting rights violations in areas not currently covered by Section 5.

We have serious doubts as to the constitutionality of nationwide coverage of Section 5. Secondly, nationwide preclearance would be an administrative nightmare. Every political subdivision--state, county, city, school board, water district, etc. would be required to submit every single change in their voting or election procedures for preclearance by either the Justice Department or to a Federal District Court in the District of Columbia. It would not be cost effective.

The Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, the NAACP and the Black Leadership Forum must disagree with those who oppose or question the value of the Voting Rights Act or who suggest that a presumption of legality should lead to ending coverage of the Act to see if former lawbreakers have now reformed. To state the proposition is to reject it. Once, as here, violations of the fundamental democratic rights of suffrage have been shown, the burden is upon those who were lawbreakers to prove they have turned the critical corner. We contend that the easiest way for that proof to be given is to operate electoral systems which are immune from the kind of challenges which the Voting Rights Act permits.

It is our contention that no jurisdiction which is free of the problems of voter exclusion will be bothered by the minor preclearance requirements imposed by this Act. We suggest that any covered jurisdiction which operates for the period between now and the changes effected by the 1990 census will have shown its eligibility for removal. Against a backdrop of generations of outright exclusion, showing the capacity to operate within the law for the generation of coverage from 1965 to 1992 is the least which should be required.

Mr. Chairman and members of the Subcommittee, the civil rights community is gravely concerned regarding the enforcement of the Voting Rights Act. The philosophical shift in interpretation of the role of the U. S. Department of Justice by the Attorney General and his assistants raises real concerns inasmuch as the new bailout provision of the Act will place an increased workload on the Department. Although in the past year, the Justice Department has objected, properly, to several high profile state redistricting plans, this should not obscure the fact that overall there has been a serious failure by the Department to enforce the law and a serious politicization of the Department's responsibility of protecting voting rights. In 1981 the Department filed only 1 voting rights suit and 1 amicus brief. In contrast, the Department was involved in more than 80 cases for the period January 1, 1975, the last time the Act was extended, to December 31, 1980. Mr. Chairman we believe in preclearance, but we do have a problem when the Department preclears whether or not it moves or how it moves in voting rights matters in elected officials counties or states. Such a procedure circumvents the law. Examples include the stillborn amicus brief re Edgefield County, South Carolina; the withdrawal of an objection re Jackson, Mississippi; the watering down of a complaint in intervention filed in the Mobile, Alabama case and the withdrawal of an objection in Virginia after limited modifications were agreed upon with Virginia legislators.

Mr. Chairman, one of our organizations' principal goals is to have the strongest bipartisan measure enacted into law as the Voting Rights Act of 1982. A strong measure has been passed by the U. S. House of Representatives. Two of the four principal authors of the House-passed bill, H. R. 3112, are Representatives James Sensenbrenner (R-Wisc.) and Hamilton Fish (R-N.Y.). A substantial number of Republicans supported the bill against all weakening amendments. This is not a partisan measure. The Voting Rights bills of 1965, 1970 and 1975 were all bi-partisan and the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and the Black Leadership Forum believe that the U. S. Senate will duplicate the overwhelmingly bipartisan consensus that emerged from the U. S. House of Representatives. As you know some 60 senators are co-sponsors of S.1992 and we hope that in the weeks to come more will join as co-sponsors to send a strong and democratic signal to the world that the Congress is fully and irrevocably committed to protecting the most fundamental of all rights - the right to vote.

Thank you Mr. Chairman and members of the Subcommittee for affording us this opportunity to appear before you on the extension of the Voting Rights Act.

MEMORANDUM

To: Participating Organizations

From: Ralph G. Neas, Executive Director

Subject: Amending Section 2 of the Voting Rights Act: "Intent" vs. "Result"

SUMMARY

Section 2 of the Voting Rights Act is the general prohibition of practices which deny or abridge the right to vote. S. 1992, like the House-passed bill, would add clarifying language to Section 2 so that it would explicitly state that any practice which "results" in such denial or abridgement is prohibited.

If the Attorney General or private plaintiffs challenge a practice in a jurisdiction not covered by the preclearance obligation of Section 5, they must sue under Section 2. In addition, Section 2 is the only recourse even in areas covered by Section 5 for laws or practices adopted prior to 1965. (Preclearance is required only for changes attempted after the Act was passed in 1965.)

An effective, usable Section 2 is an essential part of the Act. However, the recent Supreme Court decision of Mobile v. Bolden has cast a heavy cloud over Section 2's availability to challenge discrimination. A statutory amendment is needed to clarify the section and return the law to the original understanding of Congress that Section 2 would reach discriminatory results, whether or not plaintiffs proved a discriminatory purpose.

Minority voters do not view this needed amendment of Section 2 as a technical side issue to renewal of the Act. To blacks and Hispanic Americans, the need for a meaningful Section 2 remedy is just as crucial as is the need to maintain a strong Section 5 and to extend the bilingual election provisions of the Act. The effort of opponents of the amendment to substitute a "purpose" requirement in Section 2 would be a radical change in the law which has governed discriminatory vote dilution cases since the passage of the Act. It would be -- and would be clearly seen as -- a severe crippling of the Voting Rights Act.

The issues have been confused by opponents through persistent misstatements of what the law has been and of what the amendment would do. But merely repeating inaccurate statements over and over does not make them correct.

Specifically, the Justice Department and Senate opponents of the amendment assert that it would introduce a new and unprecedented standard; that it departs from the original intent of Congress and that it is unconstitutional. Most of all, in the face of repeated statements of the amendment's scope, they persist in the false assertion that the proposed "results" test would constitute a "quota requirement" of proportional representation.

This memorandum rebuts those distortions and explains why the Section 2 amendment in fact:

--reflects the original understanding of Congress in 1965;

--restores the legal standard that applied for most of the past 16 years;

--is clearly constitutional; and

--would not require quotas.

It would not make mere failure of minorities to win proportional representation a violation, even if that came as the result of at large elections. Plaintiffs would have to prove additional factors establishing that, in the total circumstances, minority voters not only failed "to win, but were effectively shut out of a fair opportunity to participate in the political process".

The amendment would codify the legal standard used by the courts until very recently.

For almost 15 years under this standard, the few cases which were brought were long and arduous. Even fewer were won. That track record simply belies the scare tactic claim that local governments across the land could be overturned left and right under a new and untested standard.

I. Legislative History of the 1965 Act

Section 2 of the Voting Rights Act provides that:

"No voting qualifications or prerequisites to voting or standard or practice or procedures shall be imposed or applied by any State or political subdivision to deny or abridge the right of any citizen of the United States on account of race or color."

Opponents of the proposed amendment cite statements in the legislative history to the effect that Section 2 was thought to track the prohibition of the 15th Amendment. Since a plurality of the Supreme Court in the Mobile case has now said that the 15th Amendment requires proof of intent, they argue that the Congress must have meant to include an "intent" requirement when it enacted Section 2.

It is true that the legislative history contains statements that Section 2 was patterned after the 15th Amendment. But this representation of that history is so incomplete that it is badly misleading. In 1965, there was no general understanding that constitutional litigation of voting discrimination required proof of intent.

Therefore, it was possible for Congress both to view Section 2 as tracking the 15th Amendment, and also to intend that it reach either discriminatory purpose or discriminatory results. And that is precisely what the complete legislative history shows Congress did.

Attorney General Katzenbach testified for the Justice Department which had drafted the Act. In response to Senator Fong's question as to the scope of Section 2, he replied;

> "I had thought of the word 'procedure' as including any kind of practice of that kind if its purpose or effect was to deny or abridge the right to vote on account of race or color." (Emphasis added.)

The Supreme Court subsequently cited this exchange in its analysis of Section 2. The Supreme Court also has recognized Attorney General Katzenbach's extensive role "in drafting the statute and explaining its operation to Congress." 1/

In 1970, then Attorney General John Mitchell proposed repealing Section 5 and offered in exchange language explicitly authorizing the Attorney General to challenge any practice

> "which has the purpose or effect of denying or abridging the right to vote on account of race or color . . . . " (Emphasis added.)

The Joint Views of Ten Members of The Judiciary Committee rejected his proposal on the ground that it added nothing to the Act. 2/ The Views stated that:

> "The Attorney General already has the authority to bring such suits [under Section 2.]"

Thus, when Congress enacted Section 2, and when it reenacted the law in 1970, it regarded Section 2 as a restatement of the 15th Amendment, but also viewed it as reaching discrimination whether or not intent was proved. There simply was no need in 1965 for Congress to choose between those two understandings.

In addition to their incomplete analysis, there is a time warp in the logic of those who oppose the amendment. What four justices said in 1980 the 15th Amendment requires is hardly evidence of what Congress intended in 1965 when the Court had not yet ruled that the Constitution required proof of discriminatory purpose. Congress must now decide whether to clarify Section 2 in order to maintain its original plan to reach discriminatory results. The Section then would no longer parallel the 15th Amendment. But it is untrue to say that such a clarification would be a departure from Congress' understanding in 1965.

II. The Legal Standard Under the Case Law Before Mobile

For 14 years, the courts heard allegations that districting and other practices illegally diluted minority voting strength, without applying an intent requirement. In 1965 the Supreme Court observed in Fortson v. Dorsey that a districting system might be unconstitutional because it worked to cancel out a racial minority's strength,

1/ U.S. v. Sheffield, 435 U.S. 110, 131 (1978).

2/ Those ten members of the Committee, including Senators Hugh Scott and Robert Griffin, sponsored the Scott-Hart extension of the Act which became law. The Supreme Court has cited their Views as the committee report on the bill which was enacted. Seven of the ten Senators were sponsors of S. 1564, the bill enacted as the Voting Rights Act in 1965.

"designedly or otherwise." In Whitcomb v. Chavis (1971) and White v. Regester (1973) the Court looked to the "totality of the circumstances" to determine whether the challenged system effectively shut racial minorities out of the process. Whitcomb upheld at large elections in Indianapolis even though the dilution of black voting strength prevented blacks from electing candidates in proportion to their share of the electorate. The Court noted the lack of proof of discriminatory purpose. But its analysis focused on whether blacks had less opportunity than others "to participate in the political process and to elect legislators of their choice." 403 U.S. 124, 149 (1971).

White struck down at large elections in two Texas counties. The Court affirmed the trial court's "intensely local appraisal" of the total circumstances. Justice White (who also wrote the Whitcomb opinion) stated for a unanimous court that the right protected was not a right to proportional representation, but only the right of equal access to the process:

> "The plaintiff's burden is to produce evicence...that the political process leading to the nomination and election was not equally open to participation by the group in question." 412 U.S. 755, 766 (1973).

The Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals elaborated upon the factors found relevant by the White decision in the case of Zimmer v. McKeithen, decided the same year. White amd Zimmer did not require any proof of intent. They remained the controlling law until Mobile.

Meanwhile, however, the Supreme Court had decided two cases in 1976 and 1977, which held that the Constitution required proof of intentional discrimination to establish a violation. Washington v. Davis, 426 U.S. 229 (1976); Arlington Heights v. Metropolitan Housing Development Corp., 429 U.S. 252 (1977). The legal community regarded that development as a major change in the requisite for constitutional challenge to discrimination. The Fifth Circuit then tried to harmonize Washington and Arlington with the earlier vote dilution cases. In Mobile and companion cases, the Fifth Circuit for the first time reinterpreted the factors controlling in White and Zimmer as circumstantial evidence of intent.

Simply put, this was a basic change in the legal standard for vote discrimination cases.

The Supreme Court in its Mobile decision reversed the lower court order striking down Mobile's at large elections, although only four justices did so on the ground that there was insufficient evidence of intent and more direct proof was required.

The opponents of the "results" test in Section 2 try to suggest that there always had been an "intent" test in the pre-Mobile cases such as Zimmer. That is demonstrably untrue. The Supreme Court's plurality opinion in Mobile, itself, acknowledged that proof of intent was not understood to be required before Washington necessitated a reinterpretation of the earlier cases. Justice Stewart explained:

> "/Zimmer v. McKeithen/ coming before Washington v. Davis, . . . was quite evidently decided upon the misunderstanding that it is not necessary to show a discriminatory purpose in order to prove a violation of the Equal Protection Clause -- that proof of discriminatory effect is sufficient." (Slip Op. at 14) (Emphasis added.)

It is important to keep in mind the ultimate significance of this history. It is this. For many years prior to 1978, the legal standard was the same as the test which the proposed amendment to Section 2 would codify -- a "results" test measured in the totality of the circumstances -- and without any intent requirement. It is not a new or untried standard. Yet during that long period, the White and Whitcomb standard posed a very difficult hurdle for any would be plaintiff. There were relatively few cases -- an average of about three to four per year. And there were no more than two dozen victories over a fifteen year period.

The cases were difficult, lengthy and costly. Under such a tough standard, civil rights groups with limited financial and legal resources did not waste them on frivolous challenges. And with ever increasing constraints on their resources today, they would not do so in the future.

In summary, the track record under the standard embodied in the amendment is a reassuring indication that only a selective number of truly eggregious situations would be successfully challenged, and that none could be challenged simply on the basis of election returns.

III. Consequences Of The Mobile Decision

The cases litigated since Mobile show that even blatant discrimination can be invulnerable if proof of intent is required. Those who discriminate do not commonly advertise that fact. Many of the practices go back decades and no records are available. Those involved may not even be alive. As the Birmingham Post Herald put it: "It would be quite a trick for anyone to subpoena them from their graves for testimony about their racial motivations." In the case of more recently adopted practices, there are problems of legislative immunity to scrutiny of the motivation behind an enactment. In a very recent case, the Fifth Circuit has ruled that decisions by the general electorate also are immune from such inquiry. Therefore, systems adopted or maintained by referendum votes would stymie even the most peristent lawyers' effort to meet the Mobile standard.

In one case, in Edgefield County, South Carolina, Judge Robert Chapman (recently elevated to the court of appeals by President Reagan) found the election system was discriminatory. His ruling was on April 17, 1980. Five days later Mobile was decided, and Judge Chapman was forced to reverse his decision and uphold the county election law.

The Justice Department misleadingly suggests that Section 2 "has been successful" in its present form and therefore need not be changed. In past litigation the parties and the courts focused overwhelmingly on the constitutional claims, rather than on Section 2. But to the extent litigation was successful on either level it was prior to the Supreme Court's decision in Mobile that both lines of attack required proof of intent. Without the proposed amendment, Section 2 will now become a useful avenue of relief in any but the most flagrant cases in which plaintiffs fortuitously find a "smoking gun" piece of direct evidence of intent. 1/

The Justice Department also claims that even under Mobile plaintiffs might win with traditional circumstantial evidence of intent. But the plain fact is that Mobile rejected the traditional elements of indirect evidence as having negligible weight. The clear result of Mobile is that plaintiffs will have little chance of prevailing in this Supreme Court without direct proof of intent.

1/ Even when some records are available, the effort required by insistence on proof of discriminatory purpose is like chasing rainbows. After the Supreme Court's decision in the Mobile case, that case went back to the district court for a new trial on the issue of purpose. That trial has been held and is now awaiting decision. It is estimated that the time necessary for all attorneys in the case was over 6000 hours, with another 7000 hours for paralegals, expert witnesses and research assistants. The total expenses not counting attorneys fees, are estimated at $120,000.

How Would the Proposed Amendment of Section 2 Operate?

Beyond their misreading of the legislative and legal history, the Justice Department and the Senate opponents of the proposed amendment to Section 2 make the flat assertion that the text of the amendment will inevitably mean a quota approach and would establish a "right" to proportional representation.

This is once again a distorting scare tactic.

The legislative history in the House of Representatives made clear that the language is a return to the "totality of circumstances" approach of the earlier cases such as White and Whitcomb which repeatedly held that there was no such right to win offices or a particular proportion of seats.

More directly, the amendments to Section 2 expressly disavows any test of proportional representation:

> "the fact that members of a minority group have not been elected in numbers equal to the group's proportion of the population shall not, in and of itself, constitute a violation."

Opponents of the amendment suggest that this disclaimer might not apply in the case of at large elections. There is simply no basis for that assertion. The disclaimer was specifically added to meet the question raised in the House of whether at large elections would be vulnerable merely because of the election results.

Indeed the sentence is taken almost directly from the Court's refusal in White to strike down at large elections because the minority's strength was not reflected in the returns.

The Senate Committee Report will be unequivocally clear that even in the case of at large elections, the mere failure of minorities to elect a proportion of the winners because of racially polarized bloc voting would not, without more establish a violation of Section 2, as amended. Additional proof of other factors would be required before a court would be empowered to find from the "totality of the circumstances" that plaintiffs had been denied equal opportunity to participate in the process.

CONSTITUTIONALITY OF THE AMENDMENT TO SECTION 2

The proposed amendment to Section 2 of the Voting Rights Act is a constitutional exercise of Congressional power.

The Court in Mobile said that only intentional discrimination is prohibited by the 15th Amendment.

However, the Court has long held that Congress need not legislate coextensively with the 15th Amendment, as long as there is a basis for the Congressional determination that the legislation furthers an enforcement objective related to the evils addressed by the Amendment. South Carolina v. Katzenbach, (383 U.S. 301, 317, 326 (1966)).

The Voting Rights Act is the best example of Congress' power to enact implementing legislation which goes beyond the direct prohibitions of the Constitution itself.

Congress clearly does have the power to enact measures going beyond the direct requirement of the 15th Amendment, if such measures are appropriate and reasonably adapted to protect citizens against the risk that the right to vote will be denied in violation of the 15th Amendment. That point was clearly established in South Carolina v. Katzenbach, and has not been seriously challenged in subsequent years.

The amended Section 2 of the Voting Rights Act will not stand as a Congressional definition of what violates the 15th Amendment. It will be a separate additional statutory protection which Congress believes necessary and proper to ensure full enjoyment of the voting rights guaranteed by the 15th Amendment. The same day that Bolden was decided, the Supreme Court in Rome, Georgia v. U.S. (466 U.S. 156, 173-177 (1980)) reaffirmed that Congressional power, even though it had just said that the litigation under the 15th Amendment itself requires intent.

Congress' reasons for amending Section 2 are that: (1) there is great difficulty in proving purposeful discrimination or its absence; (2) to require each Section 2 lawsuit to litigate the issue of intent to discriminate would create the risk that purposeful discrimination would go undetected, unpunished and undeterred; and (3) for those reasons, a results test contained in an amended Section 2 is necessary to protect 15th Amendment rights of minorities throughout the country.

In addition, this amendment is perfectly consistent with opposition to Congressional efforts to overrule Supreme Court interpretations of the Constitution.

The amendment to Section 2 of the Voting Rights Act is not an attempt to overrule the Supreme Court's interpretation in Mobile of what the 15th Amendment itself reaches or prohibits.

Congress cannot and should not attempt to overrule specific Supreme Court decisions interpreting the Constitution.

Unlike legislation proposed in other areas, S. 1992 does not attempt to restrict the federal court's jurisdiction in any way. It does not direct the result or the remedy that courts may reach with respect to claims brought under the 15th or 14th Amendments. Nor does it purport to redefine terms in either Amendment for purposes of constitutional adjudication.

Understandably Congress would, and should be reluctant about "overturning" Mobile.

Amended Section 2 does not overturn Mobile. The constitutional issue presented by the proposed amendment is not whether it prohibits practices that would violate the 15th Amendment. As explained above, the only constitutional question is whether the amended version of Section 2 is "appropriate legislation" pursuant to Congress' power to enforce the 15th Amendment.

Senator HATCH. Our next witness will be Vilma Martinez, the general counsel and executive director of the Mexican American Legal Defense and Educational Fund.

Ms. Martinez, we are very happy to have you here. We will proceed with your testimony at this time.

STATEMENT OF VILMA MARTINEZ, EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR AND GENERAL COUNSEL, MEXICAN AMERICAN LEGAL DEFENSE AND EDUCATIONAL FUND

Ms. MARTINEZ. Thank you, Senator, for your very kind invitation to testify.

If I may, I would like to submit my entire comments for the record but briefly summarize them.

Senator HATCH. Without objection, they will be placed in the record.

Let me get one other housekeeping matter out of the way before we proceed.

Statements by Senator Biden and Senator DeConcini will follow the statement of Senator Metzenbaum in the record, without objection.

Ms. Martinez?

Ms. MARTINEZ. Thank you.

Since the Voting Rights Act was expanded in 1975 to protect the voting rights of Mexican Americans and other language minority citizens, MALDEF has made enforcement of the act in Texas and elsewhere in the Southwest a major responsibility. Since 1975 we have participated in approximately 50 lawsuits under the Voting Rights Act in Texas, Arizona, California, and Washington State.

Mexican Americans are the victims of pervasive practices of voting discrimination in many parts of the United States. We are excluded from the political process today, not so much by prohibitions on voting or running for office as by election methods that minimize or even cancel our voting strength.

I am here today in support of S. 1992, a bill which, as H.R. 3112, passed by a vote of 389-24 in the House of Representatives in October. This excellent bill would extend with some amendments all the major features of the Voting Rights Act, some of which would otherwise expire in August of this year.

S. 1992 would extend the Federal preclearance requirement now applicable to those jurisdictions and States which have egregious histories of voting discrimination, but it would permit jurisdictions down to the county level to be released from the preclearance requirement if they can demonstrate a genuine record of nondiscrimination in voting and compliance with the Voting Rights Act for the previous 10 years.

It would, further, extend the bilingual voting assistance requirement until 1992, and it would incorporate a results test in section 2 of the Voting Rights Act to clarify standards of evidence needed to establish a section 2 violation. All of these provisions are important to Hispanics, because they are essential to an effective Voting Rights Act.

The importance of section 5 has always been considered the heart of the Voting Rights Act and cannot be overemphasized. It requires the submitting jurisdiction to prove its change will not cause discrimination.

In 6 short years Texas has received more letters of objection to its submissions than any of the States covered under section 5 for 16 years, giving credence to the very eloquent statement made by social scientist Dr. Charles Cotrell who said, "Texas yields to no State in the area of voting rights violations."

The 85 letters of objection issued to Texas have included objections to proposed changes at the State, county, city, and school district levels in north, south, east, and west Texas, in rural areas, and in urban areas. There have been objections issued to statewide purging laws, annexations, redistricting plans, majority vote requirements, and polling place changes.

Officials who seek to minimize the voting strength of Mexican Americans and blacks in Texas have found ways to manipulate virtually every type of election change covered by section 5, even those which appear innocuous.

By dwelling on the need for section 5 in Texas, I do not mean to minimize the importance of retaining section 5 coverage for the Southern States with large black populations. Even after 16 years of section 5 coverage, the need and the justification for section 5 remain present in those States.

Turning to bailout, although we insist that section 5 must remain in effect in Texas and many other jurisdictions still eager to deny minorities voting rights, we recognize that some jurisdictions that have long abandoned discriminatory election practices should be allowed to exempt themselves from section 5 coverage upon a sufficient showing.

The new bailout provisions propose a substantial relaxation of the bailout provisions in the current law and would permit counties within a fully covered State to bail out independently of the State. I urge the Senate to adopt the bailout contained in S. 1992 and to reject attempts to weaken it further. Any voting rights practitioner would recognize, for example, S. 1975 as a thinly veiled effort to gut the act.

Turning to section 2, no less important than preclearance is section 2 of the Voting Rights Act, the basic prohibition against discriminatory voting and election practices. The continuing vitality of section 2 depends upon an amendment contained in S. 1992 and passed by the House in H.R. 3112 that would permit judicial findings of section 2 violations upon proof of the discriminatory effects or results of voting practices.

Recognition of an objective standard not dependent on proof of invidious motivation is critical to the efficacy of the Voting Rights Act because, as I have stated, the most devastating forms of voting discrimination are not overt but facially neutral, often highly technical election systems, and also because sensitivity to the judicial system has grown increasingly sophisticated, and racial motivations are diligently and effectively cloaked.

Early in the recent redistricting process in the Texas State Senate, an attorney pointedly warned members of the senate that statements made by the senators would be subject to discovery in litigation. To require direct evidence of a kind that is rarely, if ever, available in order to prove a violation of what has consistently been held to be a fundamental right is to ask the impossible of victims of voting discrimination.

In my judgment, the section 2 amendment reflects the original understandings of Congress in 1965, restores the legal standard that applied for most of the past 16 years, is clearly constitutional, and would not require proportional representation or quotas. Therefore, we are asking Congress to clarify its original aim in enacting section 2 by amending the statute, as 61 Senators have proposed in S. 1992, and adopting the results-effects standard for section 2.

With regard to bilingual elections, the bilingual election requirements, added to the Voting Rights Act in 1975, have brought the right to vote to uncounted numbers of non-English speaking U.S. citizens of Hispanic, Asian, Eskimo, and American Indian descent who have the right to vote as their birthright.

An extensive hearing record established during the recent House hearings on the Voting Rights Act reveal that bilingual elections are cost efficient, necessary, and capable of easy implementation by local election officials. Bilingual elections have indeed broadened the franchise for Mexican Americans, yet bilingual elections were greeted with hostility by the public. Unfounded charges that they are not needed and that they will foster cultural separatism continue to be made.

In an effort to examine these charges, MALDEF and the Southwest Voter Registration Education Project conducted an extensive survey, the preliminary findings of which I would like to share now with the subcommittee. The results of our survey will be published in final form in February, and with your permission, Mr. Chairman, submitted for the record at that time.

Senator HATCH. Without objection, they will be included in the record.

Ms. MARTINEZ. The continuing need for bilingual voting assistance is demonstrated by the fact that 16 percent of all respondents, all U.S. citizens, in our survey speak Spanish only, and 33 percent requested that the interview be conducted only in Spanish, suggesting that even though an individual may be bilingual, he or she may be more comfortable speaking Spanish.

According to our survey, 96 percent of Mexican-American voters think it is a good idea to provide help in Spanish for registering and voting. Yet, as you know, one of the most frequently asked questions on this subject is, "If they are citizens, why don't they speak English?" The inability of many adult Mexican-American citizens who were born here or who came here as young children to speak English is a direct consequence of the denial of educational opportunities to them as children.

Federal courts have recently found such segregation in dozens of localities across the State of Texas. In January 1981, a Federal court found that the Mexican schools were invariably overcrowded and inferior in all respects to those open exclusively to Anglo students.

The history, by the way, of segregation of Mexican-race students in separate schools is not limited to the State of Texas. A Federal court struck down segregation of Mexican Americans in Orange County, Calif., in 1946. Another did likewise in Oxnard, Calif., in 1974. Federal courts found that Arizona school districts had segregated Mexican Americans in cases from Tolleson, Maricopa County, and Tucson; and the same segregation has been found in Colorado's largest district, Denver.

In conclusion, Hispanics and other language minority citizens have had the protections of the Voting Rights Act for only 7 years, a short time in which to remedy generations of exclusion. I urge the subcommittee and the Senate to support S. 1992 without amendment.

Senator HATCH. Thank you.

Ms. Martinez, in your testimony before the House Judiciary Committee, you note that the city of San Antonio, which has a Mexican American majority, has only elected a handful of city councilmen when elections were conducted on an at-large basis. Can you explain to me how at-large elections can ever be held to be discrimination against a minority?

Ms. MARTINEZ. Can I explain to you what, Senator?

Senator HATCH. Can you explain to me how at-large elections can ever be held to be discrimination against a majority? Excuse me.

Ms. MARTINEZ. Easily. This majority is a minority in terms of how people are treated, viewed, and what kinds of educational opportunities and political opportunities have been afforded them by the jurisdiction.

You are not asking me to explain, I understand, how it is that an at-large system may result in discrimination against a minority group?

Senator HATCH. No.

Ms. MARTINEZ. Do you want me to? I could.

Senator HATCH. That would be fine too. Go ahead.

Ms. MARTINEZ. Yes, because I think that is a terribly important question, and you have raised it.

Senator HATCH. First let me raise a preliminary question. Do you feel that at-large elections should be outlawed?

Ms. MARTINEZ. No; I do not take the position that at-large elections, per se, discriminate against minority people. I think that one needs to look at facts in any and all instances.

In looking at the facts, and in looking in particular at our litigation in Texas; for example, we filed that White v. Regester lawsuit, in conjunction, I might add, with the Republican Party in the State of Texas, to challenge the at-large method of electing people to the Texas State Legislature, because of the very extensive factual record that we compiled showing that the at-large method excluded minority voters, Republicans, Mexican Americans, and blacks.

The court in White v. Regester ultimately encouraged and required the Texas State Legislature to go from an at-large to a single-member district.

I am sure that you as a politician know better than I that it is much easier to run in a particular isolated geographic location; it is much less expensive to run in a single-member district, as opposed to being asked to run at large, when you are part of a minority group within that large community, when you do not have the money to run an at-large campaign.

This, coupled with all kinds of findings of discrimination against Mexican Americans and blacks in Texas, is what led to the dismantling of the at-large method of electing people to the State legislature in Texas.

Senator HATCH. In your statement you support limiting Federal jurisdiction on section 5 issues to the Federal courts in the District of Columbia. You state in part that this is necessary to insure "impartial decisionmaking free of local biases and local political pressures."

If you have any evidence to this effect, about Federal courts of the United States in any particular area, I can assure you that this committee will be interested in looking at those courts. Do you have any evidence to this effect?

Ms. MARTINEZ. I certainly have a lot of indirect evidence to this effect. In all of our school desegregation cases, for example, Mr. Hatch, we argued that Mexican race students had been segregated into Mexican race schools and that under Brown v. Board of Education we were now entitled to a desegregation education.

The school board members lawyers argued that they had always considered Mexican Americans white and had never segregated us. We lost all of those cases except one in the district courts. It was only on appeal that we were able to reverse those findings of local judges.

Senator HATCH. Yes.

Ms. MARTINEZ. And I said it was indirect.

Senator HATCH. But let me limit it to section 5, since we are talking about the Voting Rights Act. Do you have any evidence of courts that really would not enforce section 5?

Ms. MARTINEZ. I would be glad to put that together for you. I think we could come up with instances of courts that have not implemented clear mandates of section 5.

Senator HATCH. I would like to have chapter and verse of any evidence of any instances, such as you describe.

Ms. MARTINEZ. And Joaquin Avila, the director of our voting rights litigation, will be here, I am told, on the 4th.

Senator HATCH. If you will do that for us, I think that will help the committee, and personally I would like to review it.

Do you support each of the provisions of S. 1992?

Ms. MARTINEZ. Pardon me?

Senator HATCH. Do you support every provision in S. 1992?

Ms. MARTINEZ. We certainly support the provisions of S. 1992. As you know, it was something that we worked on diligently, that represented a compromise for many of us, that does have a good bailout.

This was not something we came recommending, but in part because of the genuine concerns of people such as yourself—certainly Congressmen Hyde and Sensenbrenner—that people who have behaved properly should be permitted to bail out, and that they should be permitted to bail out even at the county level.

We heard them, we worked with them, and we have something that we can live with, that we are proud of, that we would like to see you support, that we would like to see the Senate support, and that we would like to see the President sign.

Senator HATCH. The reason I ask that question is because I wonder if you support section 208 which reads that "Nothing in this act shall be construed in such a way as to permit voting assistance to be given within the voting booth unless the voter is blind or physically incapacitated."

I ask this question that is because of your efforts in Garza v. Smith, where MALDEF succeeded in having a Texas trial court declare unconstitutional a State law denying assistance at the polls to illiterates. So I wonder if you yourself believe that section 208 is constitutional.

Ms. MARTINEZ. I believe that we need to look very carefully at section 208, and I would like to submit something at a later time for the record on what we think about section 208.

Senator HATCH. All right.

In your statement you indicate that, "without action by Congress, some of the major features of the Voting Rights Act are scheduled to expire this year." Can you tell me which, if any, provisions of the act are scheduled to expire?

Ms. MARTINEZ. My understanding is that section 5 coverage would end as of this year if no action is taken by the Congress.

Senator HATCH. Section 5 would not expire; some jurisdictions, however, would be allowed finally to bail out after 17 years of good conduct. You have been extremely critical of the legislation, S. 1995, introduced by our colleague, Senator Grassley, because you say its provisions are vague. Perhaps this may be the case. I am studying it and will have to study it further.

Ms. MARTINEZ. Good.

Senator HATCH. Can you tell me, however, what the House bill means when it states that no jurisdiction shall be permitted to bail out unless they have demonstrated that they have engaged in "constructive" efforts at expanded opportunity for minorities in the election process? What does that all mean, in your view?

Ms. MARTINEZ. I would think there would be a variety of ways to do that. A jurisdiction could say, "Look, we took the bilingual election provisions seriously," for example; "We have reduced how much it costs us to insure that people have access to this;" "We have targeted voters who need bilingual materials;" "We have made them available."

They could show, for example—they now are very aggressively, in Spanish and other needed languages to reach citizens, talking to them about how to register to vote and telling them what the vote is in our society. It seems to me that there are a variety of things that a jurisdiction could do to show constructive efforts.

Senator HATCH. I am glad that that is not "vogue." We are very happy that you came. We appreciate your testimony, and we will place it in its entirety in the record.

Ms. MARTINEZ. Thank you very much.

Senator HATCH. Senator Kennedy is on his way here. We will wait for a minute until he comes.

Ms. MARTINEZ. Thank you.

Senator HATCH. Let me just ask one more question. It is my understanding that in San Antonio, the Texas State director for LULAC, Mr. Oscar Moran, last week endorsed straight extension of the Voting Rights Act without any change at all. Is that true? Do you know about that?

Ms. MARTINEZ. I really do not know, but you can rest assured, Senator, that I will be in touch with him and urge him to qualify that statement. [Laughter.]

Senator HATCH. That is one thing I like about you; you are energetic, and you are a good student.

Ms. MARTINEZ. No, no, this is a serious issue for us; it is a terribly important issue for us. We have worked very hard on it; we have compromised on it; we feel we have something that is workable, that meets the concerns of people such as you who want good jurisdictions to bail out; we feel we have done all of that. We would really like to have your support, and we would like to have the support of the administration.

Senator HATCH. All right. Thank you.

Senator Kennedy?

Senator KENNEDY. Thank you.

You are very welcome here before the subcommittee. I have had the good opportunity to work with you on a number of different issues affecting the Hispanic community. No matter what committee you appear before, we always benefit from your statement and comment. I am very much aware from personal knowledge of the very noble efforts that your organization makes in terms of eliminating discrimination in our society. I just welcome very much your presence here.

I think it is important to recognize the group that you are speaking for. I know that you will be in touch with the LULAC and perhaps the other Hispanic organizations, so that we get comments or statements by their leaders, because I think it is extremely important that we understand how those that are going to be the most affected by this legislation—what their view about this program is.

We have heard Ben Hooks speak and we have heard you speak. It is my understanding, with regard to not only the minorities in this country who have been most affected by the 1965 act as it was interpreted up to 1978, that they are in strong support of what Senator Mathias, I, and the House of Representatives have attempted to do.

I think it is important that there be no confusion within the Senate about what the views are among the Hispanics in this country, and you may be able to help us on that in just your own contacts with some of the various groups. Maybe we can talk about that later.

Let me just ask you what your own interpretation of the enforcement of the Voting Rights Act is by the Justice Department at the present time. We had a statement by Mr. Hooks about his very considerable concern that there is not vigorous enforcement. I did not get into that area of inquiry with him, but he does indicate that in his formal statement.

I would be interested in what the view of your organization, that has been so active in this issue—what your own understanding is of the attitude of the Justice Department in pursuing the Voting Rights Act as it has affected Hispanics.

Ms. MARTINEZ. As you know, Senator, we take very seriously our job of looking to see what any and all administrations are saying about issues that would affect us. Based on that careful examination of the record of this administration, I would have to say that I have little confidence in the commitment of this administration and this Department of Justice to enforce the civil rights laws, including the Voting Rights Act.

This administration and its Attorney General have subverted equal employment opportunity and affirmative action by inviting the Supreme Court to overrule Webber, and by refusing to seek meaningful remedies for employment discrimination.

In my judgment, they have reinstituted "separate but equal" as the goal for minority educational opportunities, they have taken the outrageous position that the U.S. Government has no interest in whether the equal protection rights of several thousand alien schoolchildren are violated in the Plyler v. Doe case, and have recently overlooked a court order by granting tax-exempt status to private schools that practice racial discrimination.

Given this record of indifference or hostility to civil rights of minorities, we view with suspicion the administration's real intentions with regard to the Voting Rights Act. I wish I could say to you that I see in our Attorney General a moderate supporter of the act. I do not. I see a skillful and subtle opponent.

Senator KENNEDY. Well now, I think if the Attorney General was here, he might comment that that was a political statement, as he did when I——

Senator HATCH. I think he might just have that feeling.

Senator KENNEDY. But I think what you are stating, what I have stated this morning, and what Mr. Hooks stated are basically facts.

Ms. MARTINEZ. These are facts.

By the way, Senator Hatch, I want to reassure both you and Senator Kennedy that I have worked over the years with Attorney General Smith. We are both members of the board of regents for the University of California. I said hello to him this morning. I informed him we would be disagreeing.

Senator KENNEDY. This is the background in which members of your organization view at least the attitude of this administration on the Voting Rights Act.

What will be the reaction, do you think, among the Hispanics in this country should the administration's view prevail and if they were to get their way in terms of their position on the title 2 recommendations? What would be the attitude among Hispanics, and what, most importantly, would be the effect, do you think, on the involvement of individuals who are Spanish speaking and American citizens from participating in the voting process?

Ms. MARTINEZ. Yes, that is a very good question. The reaction will be mixed. Those of us who have for so long worked so hard for an effective extension of an effective Voting Rights Act will have to thank the administration and the Congress for the bilingual provisions, because they are included in the extension to 1992. I would have to say thank you for that.

However, you are asking me a tougher question. You are saying, "What will people on the street think? How will they act?" My judgment is that the person on the street will say, "Well, score one more loss for civil rights in this country. Those people who argue that this country really doesn't want us and doesn't want to take us seriously"—they will start believing that, and they will not participate.

That, of course, is what I fight and will fight most vigorously, because I believe that it is not only a privilege but an obligation to vote, but I fear that the reaction will be, "Oh, well, those who told us they really don't want us in the system were right."

Senator KENNEDY. Do you feel as strongly then about the sections 2 and 5 as well as the bilingual provisions?

Ms. MARTINEZ. Oh, yes, very strongly. You know, I have had to work with this act. We have tried lawsuits. I do not have the fears that the Attorney General has been articulating about what this extension of section 2 means. I would remind him that section 2 has been there since 1965. There has been nationwide coverage since 1965. And I would further argue legally with him that preclearance in section 5 is terribly different from having a right to go into a Federal court, make your case, sustain a burden of proof, and win.

There are very few of us who have the resources, and those of us who do can only do so many cases. I do not think that people ought to be that fearful that every jurisdiction is going to be challenged about everything overnight. That is just not reality.

Senator KENNEDY. Let me ask you this: It has been suggested that these bilingual provisions are extremely costly in terms of the establishment of the rules, regulations, and other paperwork. That is contrary to my understanding. I am interested in your response.

Ms. MARTINEZ. We have studied this issue, and we have found that there are cost effective ways to have bilingual ballots. In fact, Representative McCloskey, who continues to oppose the bilingual provisions, nonetheless admits and agrees that cost very simply is not a factor.

In Los Angeles for example, the registrar there, Mr. Pannish, substantially decreased the cost of bilingual ballots from one election to the next by doing what is called targeting—finding out who are the people in the population who need and want bilingual materials and providing it only to those members of the population. So certainly cost cannot be an argument for saying we should not do it.

Senator KENNEDY. Can you comment upon the intent test that is proposed by the administration? Mr. Hooks has indicated what in his understanding would be the effect on registering and encouraging black Americans to participate in the electoral process. If that were to be adopted, do you think that, looking at it from the point of view of Hispanics, there would be similar kinds of problems in proving the intention of those individuals who may or may not still be alive who have developed various procedures to discriminate against Hispanics? Do you have the same kinds of concerns? I know you were here when he testified. Would those same concerns be true about Hispanics?

Ms. MARTINEZ. Those are the same concerns that I would have, and they would be, frankly, aggravated by other factors. For example, not too many people in this country understand the history of pervasive discrimination against Mexican Americans. There are very few people who would say that blacks were not subjected to slavery. In that sense, we would have an even tougher time.

The other factor which would greatly aggravate the situation for us is that we are challenging discrimination that is subtle and sophisticated, hard to articulate, and hard to remedy.

If you leave us with only an intent test, then we will not succeed. That is why those of us who have litigated in this area believe that what the 1992 language does is to, frankly, reflect the original understanding of Congress in 1965, that it would restore the legal standard that we all used for the past 16 years, except for the time we have had since Bolden. We argue that it is constitutional, and we certainly argue that it would not require proportional representation or quotas.

Senator KENNEDY. How do you respond to the question of the chairman that in every phase of court procedures, whether it is criminal procedures or even civil, that intention of violations of the law have to be proven?

Senator HATCH. If the Senator would yield, I did not say in every case.

Senator KENNEDY. All right. If the Senator wants to pose the question——

Senator HATCH. No, you may ask the question, but I would like to make it clear that I did not say "in every case. To be specific," I said, "in all criminal cases and in many civil cases."

Ms. MARTINEZ. I would appreciate your restating the question.

Senator HATCH. In criminal cases you have a standard of proof of intent beyond a reasonable doubt. In many civil cases you have to prove intent by a preponderance of the evidence. That is true, is it not?

Ms. MARTINEZ. But the Mobile standard, as we read it and as we have been living with it, is tougher than that, and it goes beyond that. That is why we oppose it, and that is why we recommend what you are now calling the results test.

What I would like to do is request that this question be raised with our voting rights litigator, Joaquin Avila, when he comes here on the 4th. If you do not raise it, I certainly will ask him to address it.

Senator HATCH. We will be happy to.

Senator KENNEDY. Fine. I hope he will.

Senator HATCH. I look forward to that myself.

Ms. MARTINEZ. Good.

Senator KENNEDY. I want to thank you very much. I am very grateful for your effective presentation.

Ms. MARTINEZ. Thank you.

Senator HATCH. Thank you, Ms. Martinez.

[The prepared statement of Ms. Martinez follows:]

PREPARED STATEMENT OF VILMA S. MARTINEZ

Mr. Chairman, Members of the Subcommittee, my name is Vilma S. Martinez. I am President and General Counsel of MALDEF, the Mexican American Legal Defense and Educational Fund. MALDEF is a national civil rights organization dedicated to the protection of the civil and constitutional rights of close to 15 million Mexican Americans and other Hispanics—nearly 7 percent of the U.S. population. Since the Voting Rights Act was expanded in 1975 to protect the voting rights of Mexican Americans and other language minority citizens, MALDEF has made enforcement of the Act in Texas and elsewhere in the Southwest a major responsibility of our San Antonio office, where two attorneys and two paralegals work full-time on voting rights litigation. Since 1975 we have participated in approximately 50 lawsuits under the Voting Rights Act, in Texas, Arizona, California, and Washington State.

Mexican Americans are the victims of pervasive practices of voting discrimination in many parts of the United States. We are excluded from the political process not so much by prohibitions on voting or running for office as by election methods that minimize or even cancel our voting strength. To combat these practices, we have been involved in redistricting at the local (school board, city council, county commissioners), state and Congressional levels. We have challenged a myriad of subtle and blatant techniques adopted and maintained to dilute minority voting strength, such as majority vote requirements, at-large elections, numbered posts, polling place changes, and rules against single shot voting.[1] The Voting Rights Act has been our best and often only legal armor in those battles.

I'm sorry to say that we have not witnessed a notable decline in any of these discriminatory practices since 1975. Without a Voting Rights Act which requires close federal scrutiny of the actions of state and local election officials and which permits effective legal challenges to discriminatory election practices, there is every reason to believe we will see an increase in voting discrimination. I am happy to say that the Senate has before it exactly the bill that is needed.

I am here today in support of S. 1992, a bill which, as H.R. 3112, passed by a vote of 389-24 in the House of Representatives in October. Provisions of the bill have received the endorsement of Republicans and Democrats, conservatives and liberals, the American Bar Association, the National League of Cities, the Catholic Church, the American Jewish Congress, the League of Women Voters, and hundreds of other large and small organizations. Indeed, to my knowledge, there is no organized public opposition to S. 1992. I urge the Subcommittee on the Constitution and the Senate to pass S. 1992 expeditiously and without modification.

This excellent bill would extend, with some amendments, all the major features of the Voting Rights Act, asome of which would otherwise expire in August of this year. The bill addresses potent but fair remedies to each of the major types of voting discrimination which still afflict minorities in the United States. S. 1992 would extend the federal preclearance requirement now applicable to those jurisdictions and States which have egregious histories of voting discrimination; but it would permit jurisdictions, down to the county level, to be released from the pre-clearance requirement if they can demonstrate a genuine record of non-discrimination in voting and compliance with the Voting Rights Act for the previous ten years. It would extend the bilingual voting assistance requirement until 1992. And it would incorporate a "results" test in Section 2 of the Voting Rights Act to clarify standards of evidence needed to establish a Section 2 violation. Each of these provisions is important to Hispanic voters, and taken together, they will permit us, in time, to realize the promise of the Voting Rights Act.

President Reagan has generally endorsed re-enactment of the Voting Rights Act, and has particularly endorsed the extension of the bilingual elections provisions. We were pleased to receive the President's support of bilingual elections.

As important as the bilingual provisions are to Hispanics, they do not represent the extent of our interest in this bill because, quite simply, they do not reflect the extent of the voting discrimination we face. President Reagan's support of the bilingual provisions stops far short of addressing the breadth of the problem.

SECTION 5 PROVISIONS

The importance of Section 5, the federal preclearance requirement[2] which has always been considered the heart of the Voting Rights Act, cannot be overempha-

[1] "At-large" election systems allow all voters in a political jurisdiction to vote on candidates for all positions, rather than dividing the jurisdiction into smaller districts or wards. In such a system, minority voting strength is submerged. The effect is compounded by majority vote requirements, which prevent election by a plurality and require runoffs where necessary for one candidate to win an absolute majority and by "anti-single shot" rules which prevent minority voters from increasing the effective strength of their vote by casting ballots for only one minority candidate in an election involving several positions. "Numbered places" turn several at-large contests into a series of head-to-head choices which similarly frustrate minority voters' ability to focus their votes on one candidate.

[2] Section 5 requires covered jurisdictions, which are those portions of the country that have a history of voting discrimination, to obtain federal approval of election law changes either by administrative action of the Attorney General or by declaratory judgment of the District Court for the District of Columbia. 42 U.S.C. § 1973c.

sized. One of the provision's most important features is the shifting of the burden of proof from the victim of discrimination to the jurisdiction proposing to make an election change. Instead of requiring proof of discrimination by affected voters as do the legal standards governing constitutional litigation, Section 5 requires the submitting jurisdiction to prove that its change will not cause discrimination. Minority citizens are thereby released from the often insuperable legal and practical burden of policing the entire election process in jurisdictions bent on denying minority voting strength. The inadequacy of litigation as a means of resolving these problems is shown by two cases which MALDEF was forced to litigate in Texas before imposition of the pre-clearance requirement. These cases' histories illustrate the wisdom and efficiency of the pre-clearance procedures. In one case the trail court found unconstitutional a law that denied illiterates assistance at the polls which was given to blind persons and others with physical handicaps. It required several years of litigation and two separate appeals to secure the constitutional rights of illiterate citizens—most of whom were minorities—to vote.[3] In another case, a state law which required voters to register every year during a four month period was held to disenfranchise a large class of citizens—again, disproportionately minorities—arbitrarily and without justification.[4] The State's response to this ruling was to enact a series of alternative measures to purge the voter rolls in an attempt to evade the court's ruling. These measures would undoubtedly have continued for years, with severe impact on minority registration, had Section 5 not become applicable.

One of these alternative purging measures, SB 300, enacted in 1975, became subject to Section 5 pre-clearance. It was, in fact, the first proposed election change in Texas to which the Attorney General objected. SB 300 would have purged the voter rolls for the entire State of Texas and would have had a devastating effect on the political participation of the 33 percent of Texas' population who are minorities—21 percent Mexican Americans and 12 percent blacks[5]—for years to come because all the obstacles to minority registration would have been confronted anew. Because of the new Section 5 coverage, SB 300 was invalidated within months of its enactment and before it could decimate minority voter registration.[6]

SB 300 was only the first of the approximately 85 letters of objection Texas and its subdivisions have received since 1975.[7] In six short years, Texas has received more letters of objection than any of the states covered under Section 5 for 16 years,[8] giving credence to the very eloquent statement made by social scientist Dr. Charles Cotrell who said, "Texas yields to no state in the area of voting rights violations. . . . When attempting to describe Texas' long train of voting abuses, one is faced with the imposing challenge of where to begin."[9]

Mexican Americans in Texas have been barred from equal access to the political process by laws such as those I have described above as well as by at-large election systems, racial gerrymandering, violations of the one person/one vote principle and by extensive racially polarized voting.[10] A recent MALDEF survey of 100 Texas counties revealed that all of them were gerrymandered to dilute the Mexican American vote. These practices and conditions, singly and together, created the need for Section 5 in Texas in 1975. As these practices continue unabated, so must Section 5 be continued.

The 85 letters of objection issued to Texas have included objections to proposed changes at the state, county, city and school district levels in north, south, east, and [8] Texas' objections account for over 20 percent of all Section 5 objections, although Texas is only one of 9 states covered in toto and 25 states affected by Section 5, and even though most other covered jurisdictions began to submit election changes ten years before Texas.

[9] See, for example, White v. Regester, 412 U.S. 755 (1972), where the Court upheld findings of "the history of official racial discrimination in Texas, which at times touched the right of Negroes to register and vote and to participate in the democratic processes," and of a long history of invidious discrimination against Mexican Americans in many areas including voting, 412 U.S. at 766–769.

west Texas, in rural area and urban areas. There have been objections issued to statewide purging laws, annexations, redistricting plans, majority vote requirements and polling place changes. Officials who seek to minimize the voting strength of Mexican Americans and Blacks in Texas have found ways to manipulate virtually every type of election change covered by Section 5, even those which appear innocuous.

For example: Since 1975, Jim Wells County, Texas, with a 67.2 percent Chicano population, has tried three times to adopt a county redistricting plan which discriminates against Mexican Americans, and three times the Department of Justice has objected to the plans. There has never been more than a single Mexican American county commissioner. Because of this series of objections—resulting from the recalcitrance of the county commissioners' court—there has not been an election in Jim Wells County since 1976.[11]

Frio County, Texas, with a Mexican American population of 68.2 percent, had never elected a Mexican American to the county commissioners court until 1974. In early 1976, following letters from MALDEF and the Department of Justice, Frio County submitted for pre-clearance a 1973 county redistricting plan. In April 1976, Justice objected to the plan because it discriminated against Mexican American voters. Frio went ahead to implement the plan; MALDEF had to file a lawsuit to prevent the County from conducting elections under the plan, which was invalid.[12] Frio County Commissioner, Adolfo Alvarez, elected in 1980, testified before the House Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights that "It is only because of the VRA that Chicanos in Frio County have representation. The county still would like to weaken our voting strength, and if not for the VRA, they would get away with it. The Chicano community in Frio County does not earn a great deal of money and we cannot afford the time and money it takes to ask the courts for help each time the county tries to do something to weaken us."

In Terrell County, Texas, the redistricting plan in effect in 1973 has grossly malapportioned and discriminated against Mexican Americans. In 1975 when the Voting Rights Act passed, we notified the county, and in 1976 we contacted the county and reminded it of the Section 5 submission requirement, but it submitted nothing. The 1976 election went by and we continued to wait. In 1978 we filed a successful lawsuit to force the county to submit the 1973 plan, secured a letter of objection, and finally obtained a fair redistricting plan.[13]

In Texas' three largest cities—Houston, Dallas, and San Antonio—minority representation on the City Council was dramatically enhanced as a result of Section 5 application.[14] San Antonio contains Texas' largest concentration of Mexican Americans and is a majority-minority city (in 1980, 53 percent Mexican American and 7 percent Black in population). Yet until 1977, San Antonio's Anglo community, although a numerical minority, effectively monopolized political power through at-large districting. A Section 5 objection to local annexation plans brought an end to this discriminatory system of political control, and since 1977 Mexican Americans and blacks have held a majority or near-majority on the City Council. In 1981, the first Mexican American Mayor, Henry Cisneros, was elected. Without Section 5, none of this could have been possible.

By dwelling on the need for Section 5 in Texas I do not mean to minimize the importance of retaining Section 5 coverage of the Southern States with large Black populations. Even after 16 years of Section 5 coverage, the need and the justification for Section 5 remain present in those states. Indeed, for us Mexican Americans whose major stake in Section 5 is in Texas, perhaps the main lesson of the experience of blacks in Georgia and the other covered states is that voting discrimination is far too entrenched to be rooted out in only seven years.

BAILOUT PROVISIONS

Although we insist that Section 5 must remain in effect in Texas and many other jurisdictions still eager to deny minority voting rights, we recognize that some jurisdictions that have long abandoned discriminatory election practices should be allowed to exempt themselves from Section 5 coverage upon a sufficient showing. The new "bailout" [15] provisions adopted by the House and proposed in S. 1992 meet both objectives: they ensure continued coverage of discriminatory jurisdictions without burden to other entities. They would prevent jurisdictions like Terrell County, Frio County, and the many others "deserving" of pre-clearance requirements from prematurely bailing out. They would, at the same time, permit jurisdictions with a genuine record of non-discrimination in voting to gain release from the pre-clearance requirement.[16]

Under current law, Texas and Arizona could bail out in 1985, and have only to prove that they had not used a discriminatory test or device for ten years. While we had originally sought to extend the year of the bailout until 1992, political pressures in the House were such that House members compromised with the greatly softened bailout contained in S. 1992. This continues to protect minority voting rights while permitting jurisdictions with clean records to bail out without further delay.

The new bailout provisions propose a substantial relaxation of the bailout provisions in the current law, and would permit counties within a fully covered state to bail out independently of the state. Of the more than 800 counties now covered, approximately one fourth of them would meet the objective criteria for bailout in 1984 and 1985. This measure fully answers the need for greater flexibility that some Section 5 critics have called for. The record before the House strongly supported the need to continue Section 5, not to weaken it. In light of this record, the generous provisions for bailout contained in S. 1992, which may permit 200 counties to be released, cannot fairly be called "impossible" or "unreasonable". Therefore, I urge the Senate to adopt the bailout contained in S. 1992 and to reject attempts to weaken it further.

I am particularly concerned by one such attempt introduced by a member of this Subcommittee, Senator Grassley. His bill, S. 1975, would permit almost every jurisdiction now covered to bail out on August 7, 1982. S. 1975 permits a jurisdiction to bail out if it can show that for the previous five years it has not used a "test or device" as that is defined in the Act; that for the previous five years it has "made all substantial submissions in compliance with Section 5" and that "there remain no unremedied objections by the Attorney General to any submission made" under Section 5. This is a meaningless standard because literacy tests were permanently banned in 1975, and English-only elections were prohibited in areas with large non-English speaking voting populations.

Nowhere in this bill is a "substantial submission" defined: have some discriminatory voting changes been more "important" than others, contrary to the intent of previous Congresses, as approved by the U.S. Supreme Court? [17] And if so, which ones, and why? Is a polling place change which prevents 800 Mexican Americans from voting more or less important than a redistricting which splinters the Mexican American population among four districts so that this otherwise contiguous community cannot elect a representative of its choice? In sum, a bailout provision which can be met by every covered jurisdiction is merely an excuse for repealing Section 5 by subterfuge.

Sen. Grassley's bill makes no mention of letters of objection. Clearly, it would permit Medina County, Texas, which has received three letters of objection to its county redistricting plan within two years to bail out as long as the county had "remedied" the objection by the Attorney General. Along with Medina would go Frio County, Bexar County (San Antonio), Jim Wells, Harris County (Houston), Jefferson, and almost every other county in Texas and Arizona whose election changes have been found to have a discriminatory impact on Mexican Americans and Blacks. Release of such jurisdictions from their Section 5 obligations would break the promise of voting equality made so recently to minority citizens, and would imperil the fragile gains made in some of these places. The bill would make litigated

[16] The House-passed bailout provisions of S. 1992 would allow termination of Section 5 coverage when a jurisdiction demonstrates that it meets a number of criteria, including most significantly, that: it has not discriminated and has complied with the Voting Rights Act including Section 5 coverage for ten years; it has eliminated election methods and structural barriers that dilute minority voting strength; it has not been subject of a judgment, decree, or settlement necessary to remedy voting discrimination.

[17] See, Allen v. State Board of Elections, 393 U.S. 544, 556 (1969); Perkins v. Matthews, 400 U.S. 379, 387 (1971) ("all changes, no matter how small, [shall] be subjected to §5 scrutiny").

final judgments in dilution lawsuits a bar to bailout, while permitting jurisdictions which have entered into consent decrees or settlements to bail out, even if these settlements have resulted in the abandonment of a discriminatory voting practice. A consent decree, settlement, or agreement resulting in the abandonment of a voting practice challenged as discriminatory is generally considered to constitute a de facto admission that the challenged practice was, in fact, unlawful and discriminatory.[18] To adopt this proposed measure would be counter-productive. It gives strong incentive to private plaintiffs and an enforcement-minded Government to eschew settlements and insist on obtaining a litigated judgment. Where adequate relief could be obtained through settlement, this extra litigation would be a needless drain on public and judicial resources and would artificially prolong lawsuits which at best cast uncertainty onto the electoral process.[19]

Finally, S. 1975 would move bailout suits from the District Court for the District of Columbia to local district courts. It would require a three-judge panel, made up of judges from outside the covered jurisdiction; appeal would be made directly to the U.S. Supreme Court. These changes would greatly weaken the Voting Rights Act. Limiting bailout jurisdiction to the D.C. District Court is necessary to insure uniform application of the bailout standards and impartial judicial decision-making, free of local biases and local political pressures. While a three-judge panel may have the appearance of impartiality, it is still "too close to home" for such sensitive assignments. Uniform results are not assured by the requirement that appeals be directed to the Supreme Court because the Court will, of necessity, limit the number of cases that can be considered on appeal. The Supreme Court reviews only a fraction of the cases that are brought before it, and will certainly not grant plenary consideration to more than a few bailout suits. Moreover, to remove bailout suits from the District of Columbia court at this point in time would waste the extensive and valuable experience, research, and familiarity with bailout actions accumulated by the distinguished judges of that court.[20]

Any voting rights practitioner would recognize S. 1975 as a thinly veiled effort to gut the Act, and I urge you to reject it as unworthy of consideration in a democracy that holds dear the right of all persons to cast an equal vote.

No less important than pre-clearance is Section 2 of the Voting Rights Act, the basic prohibition against discriminatory voting and election practices. Section 2 was intended by Congress to prohibit all forms of voting discrimination throughout the Nation, and reaches voting practices not subject to pre-clearance because they were enacted prior to 1965 (in the States originally covered by Section 5) or (in Texas and other areas brought under Section 5) 1972. In concert with pre-clearance, Section 2 permits the Voting Rights Act not only to "correct an active history of discrimination, the denying to Negroes of the right to register and vote, but also . . . [to] deal with the accumulation of discriminaton. . . . The bill would attempt to do something about accumulated wrongs and the continuance of the wrongs." 111 Cong. Rec. 8295 (1965) (Sen. Javits). Section 2's application was not geographically limited; it was also intended to protect Blacks outside the covered jurisdictions. When the Voting Rights Act was amended for the second time in 1975, Section 2 coverage was extended to language minority citizens in all areas.

The continuing vitality of Section 2 depends upon an amendment, contained in S. 1992 and passed by the House in H.R. 3112, that would permit judicial findings of Section 2 violations upon proof of the discrimnatory "effects" or results of voting practices. Recognition of an objective standard not dependent on proof of indious motivation is critical to the efficacy of the Voting Rights Act because, as I have stated, the most devastating forms of voting discrimination are not overt but facially neutral, often highly technical election systems.[21]

[18] See, e.g., United States v. Columbus Municipal Separate School District, 558 F.2d 228, 230 n. 8 (5th Cir. 1977), cert. denied 434 U.S. 101 (1978).

[19] An amendment to H.R. 3112 which would have changed the bailout provision as Sen. Grassley proposes in S. 1975 was defeated on the House floor by a vote of 285-92; many House Republicans opposed the amendment. 1981 Cong. Record, House of Representatives, H. 6948 (daily edition, October 5, 1981).

[20] The same transfer of jurisdiction was proposed as a floor amendment to H.R. 3112. It was defeated by a vote of 277-132 with many Republicans voting to retain exclusive jurisdiction in the Court here in Washington. 1981 Cong. Record, supra, n.19, H. 6996.

The confusing and seemingly contradictory 1980 U.S. Supreme Court opinions in City of Mobile v. Bolden, 446 U.S. 55 (1980) a constitutional challenge (not decided by a majority of the Court under Section 2), threatens to obliterate the original intent of Congress as it moved in 1965 to correct the effects of almost a century of disenfranchisement of Blacks. By requiring proof of discriminatory purpose, a plurality of Justices in Mobile cast doubt on not only the original intent of Section 2 but also the prevailing standards of evidence that had been required to prove the denial or abridgement of a voting practice or procedure.[22] Indeed, the standards required to prove a violation of the Constitution under the Mobile plurality opinion are nearly impossible for victims of voting discrimination to meet. If applied to Section 2, they would render it meaningless and would leave minority citizens in the U.S. speechless and voiceless when they look to the courts for justice that is promised them under the Voting Rights Acts.

Under Mobile, the victims of discrimination must prove, in order to prevail in a constitutional attack, that the challenged election practice was established or is maintained with a discriminatory purpose. Direct evidence of discriminatory intent is required. Challenges brought under Section 2 often, as in Mobile, might involve laws that were passed decades ago, sometimes laws that were passed in the last century. The burden of having to prove what was in the minds of legislators who passed a law in 1980 is nearly impossible: it is a rare public official who will admit publicly and on the record—or even put to paper—the racial motivation behind one of his bills. Rarer still might be the historical document, dated 1903 or 1921, that told us the "real reason" behind a decision by the city council to opt for at-large elections, or the "real reason" why the county commissioner precincts were drawn the way they were. The federal court most familiar with such cases has noted this dilemma.[23]

Indeed, "sensitivity" to the judicial system has grown increasingly sophisticated, and racial motivations are diligently cloaked. Early in the recent redistricting process in the Texas State Senate, an attorney pointedly warned members of the Senate that statements made by the Senators would be subject to discovery in litigation. Later, Senator Ogg, Chairman of the Subcommittee on Redistricting, told his colleagues: "We have to be very careful as to what we do and say, particularly prior to these public hearings." [24]

To require direct evidence of a kind that is rarely, if ever, available, in order to prove a violation of what has consistently been held to be a fundamental right, is to ask the impossible of victims of voting discrimination. It is also to ask these victims to suspend any faith in the ultimate logic of the law or the viability of legal actions to defend civil and constitutional rights. An observer has noted:

"Inquiries into congressional motives or purposes are a hazardous matter . . . What motivates one legislator to make a speech about a statute is not necessarily what motivates scores of others to enact it, and the stakes are sufficiently high for us to eschew guesswork." H.R. Rep. No. 97-227, 97th Cong., 1st Sess., at 29 n. 97 (Sept. 15, 1981).

There is an unquestionable need for Section 2 to challenge methods of election and voting practices which dilute and, in many cases, exclude, minority participation, and which are not subject to federal scrutiny under Section 5. For example, in my own State of California at-large voting is used for most local city council and school board elections, while at the state legislative and congressional levels district lines have historically been gerrymandered at Hispanics' expense. The result has been a drastic under-representation of Hispanics at all levels of government with less than half the percentage of Hispanic officials elected even in Texas.[25] Yet, because the "smoking gun" of overt discrimination is rarely left visible in California, and because for decades California politicians with an eye to their multi-ethnic electorate have assiduously avoided open reference to ethnic considerations, we are legally powerless to sue successfully under the Constitution as interpreted in Mobile.[26] Likewise, consider the case of a jurisdiction which does not change but continues to discriminate as it always has; such an election system would remain beyond Section 5's reach.[27] Indeed, many jurisdictions which utilize at-large election schemes and therefore need not reapportion every ten years can escape effective review in this manner.[28]

Even those who might otherwise be inclined to create such documentation have become sufficiently sensitive to the operation of our judicial system that they would not do so. Quite simply there will be no 'smoking gun'." Lodge v. Buxton, 639 F.2d 1358, 1363 n.8 (5th Cir. 1981), cert. granted O.T. 1980 No. 80-2100.

There is also unquestionable need to amend Section 2 to clarify and assure the meaning originally intended by Congress and therefore to give minorities a foot in the door to political participation. The language and legislative history of Section 2 leave little room for dispute as to the intent of Congress in enacting this section of the law. Attorney General Katzenbach testified in 1965 that Section 2 reached all procedures with the "purpose or effect" of discrimination.

"I had thought of the word 'procedure' as including any kind of practice of that kind if its purpose or effect was to deny or abridge the right to vote on account of race or color." Hearings on S. 1564 before the Committee on the Judiciary, U.S. Senate, 89th Congress, 1st Sess., (1965).

Though the language of Section 2 does not specifically incorporate either an intent or a result/effects test, in six other provisions of the Act, Congress did condemn "tests and devices" and "voting practices" used "for the purpose or with the effect" of "denying or abridging the right to vote on account of race or color" (Sections 3(b), 3(c) 4(a), 4(d), 5 and 10(a) (iii)) (emphasis added). Proof of purpose in addition to effect was not required in any of these sections, and it cannot fairly be read into the original meaning of Section 2.

S. 1992 would incorporate a "result" standard in Section 2 and thereby clarify the Voting Rights Act by specifying its adoption of pre-Mobile standards of evidence.[29] Using the result standard, victims of discrimination would be required to show "an aggregate of objective factors, such as a history of discrimination affecting the right to vote, racially polarized voting, discriminatory elements of the electoral system, such as at-large elections, a majority vote requirement, a prohibition on single-shot voting, and numbered posts which enhance the opportunity for discrimination, and discriminatory slating or the failure of minorities to win party nominations." See H.R. Report No. 97-227, 97th Cong. 1st. Sess., at 30 (Sept 15, 1981). This "totality of circumstances" approach was endorsed by the U.S. Supreme Court in White v. Regester, 412 U.S. 755 (1973), a landmark "dilution" decision severely eroded by Mobile.

Critics of this amendment and this standard incorrectly contend that we seek to enact a requirement of "proportional representation" of minorities in governmental bodies. Clearly the standard outlined above requires far more than proof of lack of "proportional representation." At a minimum, minorities would have to show racially polarized voting together with other objective factors which effectively preclude their participation in the political process or dilute the value of their vote.[30]

The issue then, is not proportional representation, but equal access to the political process. This does not guarantee that minorities will be elected to office; it does guarantee that minorities who are barred from holding office or whose votes are debased because of their race or membership in a language minority group will have legal channels through which to challenge their exclusion. By exclusion I mean far more than an outright bar on voting or running for office. The Supreme Court has consistently held that "the right of suffrage can be denied by a debasement or dilution of the weight of a citizen's vote just as effectively as by wholly prohibiting the

Although Lockhart is 55 percent minority (41 percent Mexican American and 14 percent Black), it never elected a Mexican American to the local governing board until 1978. In a case pending before the Supreme Court, Lockhart contends that it can continue to use its discriminatory election practices because they have not changed. City of Lockhart v. United States, F. Mexican Americans are excluded from the political process, by racially polarized voting in combination with methods of election that minimize and, in many cases, cancel out their votes. A result-oriented Section 2 is critical to our ability to address this pervasive type of discrimination.

The prevalence of racially polarized voting cannot be over-emphasized. "It is a situation where, when candidates of different races are running for the same office, the voters will by and large vote for the candidate of their own race." City of Rome v. U.S., 472 F. Supp. 221 (D.D.C. 1979), aff'd, 100 S. Ct. 1548 (1980). When combined with an otherwise neutral method of election, such as an at-large election, numbered posts, or majority-vote requirement, racially polarized voting can guarantee that a minority candidate will not be elected, unless the candidate's race makes up far more than half of the population.

Racially polarized voting in Texas extends throughout the state. Letters of objection to proposed voting changes under Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act are not issued unless there is evidence of racially polarized voting. The 85 letters issued since 1975 bear witness to the prevalence of polarized voting.[32] In addition, numerous studies of local Texas elections in which electors voted overwhelmingly for candidates of their own race in November 1981 were presented during a trial challenging the redistricting of the 23rd Congressional District in Texas.[33]

Legislation cannot change the way people vote; our hope in amending Section 2 to incorporate an effects test is rather to give victims of discrimination a reasonable and fair opportunity to challenge official election practices and methods of election adopted prior to the Voting Rights or outside Section 5 jurisdictions which—when combined with racial bloc voting—shut minorities our of the political process.

Congress has the constitutional authority—and the obligation—to clarify its original aim in enacting Section 2 by amending the statute as 61 Senators have proposed in S. 1992. This body is well within its power to amend the statute pursuant to its authority to enforce the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments. It "has the power to enact legislation which goes beyond the specific prohibitions of the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments themselves so long as the legislation is appropriate to fulfill the purposes of those constitutional provisions.[34] The Supreme Court was confusingly splintered in Mobile. Only four Justices held that discriminatory motivation was required to prove a Fifteenth Amendment or Section 2 violation and that the plaintiffs had not met that burden; one Justice held that the plaintiffs had met the burden of proving intentional discrimination. One Justice held that the standard of proving a violation should be based on objective rather than subjective, motivational factors. Three Justices dissented and agreed that the plaintiffs had met the burden of proving intentional discrimination. One Justice reasoned that proof of discriminatory effect is sufficient to prove a violation of this fundamental right. The confusion brought about by these conflicting or, at fest, bewildering opinions results, in words of Justice White, in leaving "the courts below adrift on uncharted seas with respect to how to proceed on remand", 446 U.S. at 103 (White, J., dissenting).

It is up to the Senate now to set the course straight and to adopt the results/effects standards for Section 2, as contained in S. 1992.[35]

BILINGUAL ELECTION REQUIREMENTS

The bilingual election requirements added to the VRA in 1975 have brought the right to vote to uncounted numbers of non-English speaking U.S. citizens of Hispanic, Asian, Eskimo and American Indian descent who retain the right to vote as their birth right. Long held as "a fundamental right because it is preservative of all [31] Although the plurality purported not to disturb this principle in its Mobile decision, Justice White dissented because he felt that the "dilution" principle was being threatened. See City of Mobile v. Bolden, supra, 446 U.S. at 102 (White, J., dissenting).

[32] Of course, polarized voting, while the sine qua non of Section 5 objections, does not itself invalidate submissions. A far larger number of submissions, approved by the Attorney General on other grounds, has demonstrated racially polarized voting.

[33] Social scientists testified to the existence of racial bloc voting in elections for city councils, county commissioners courts and justices of the peace in countries throughout the challenged 23rd Congressional District. Seamon v. Upton, E.D. rights,"[36] the right to vote had effectively been denied these citizens until 1975, except in a handful of instances where federal courts had ordered bilingual elections[37] and, the unique case of New Mexico, where the state's long tradition of bilingualism extended to the polling place.

An extensive hearing recorded established during the recent House hearings on the VRA revealed that bilingual elections are cost-efficient, necessary and can be implemented with ease by local election officials. Leonard Panish, Registrar of Voters in Los Angeles County, one of the largest election districts in the country, has developed a system for providing bilingual election materials that is one of the most efficient we have seen.

In the 1980 general election over 45,000 voters requested Spanish language materials in L.A. County; the cost to the county was 1.9 percent of the total election cost. Figures like these forced Rep. Paul McCloskey, a long-time opponent of bilingual elections because they were too costly, to concede during his testimony at the House hearings that "It seems to me that it can no longer be argued that the cost is excessive for the bilingual ballot. I do not make that argument."

Nevertheless, bilingual voting assistance was the subject of intense, extended debate on the House floor during consideration of the Voting Rights Act. Yet two amendments, one of which would have repealed all bilingual assistance—that is, oral and written—and another, which would have repealed only the bilingual ballot requirement, were defeated by margins greater than 2 to 1. Members of the House, Republican and Democrat, were convinced overwhelmingly of the need for the bilingual election requirements. The votes seemed to echo the words of House Majority Leader, Jim Wright, who said during the debate, "We have never made a mistake when we broadened the franchise."

THE MALDEF SURVEY

Bilingual elections have indeed broadened the franchise for Mexican Americans. Yet bilingual elections were greeted with hostility by the public; unfounded charges that they are not needed and that they will foster "cultural separatism," continue to be made. In an effort to examine these charges, MALDEF conducted and extensive survey, the preliminary findings of which I would like now to share with the Subcommittee. The results of our survey will be published in final form in February and with the permission of the Chairman of the Subcommittee submitted for the record at that time.

Our study consisted, in part, of indepth interviews begun in December, 1981 with 749 U.S. citizens of Mexican descent who live in East Los Angeles, Bexar County (San Antonio), and Uvalde County, Texas. The interviews reveal the extent of the need and usage of bilingual voting materials, and the value of these materials to Mexican American voters. We found that bilingual materials were particularly valuable to the elderly citizen, who, because of poor and often non-existent educational opportunities when he or she was a child, was never educated in English.

NEED FOR BILINGUAL VOTING ASSISTANCE

The continuing need for bilingual voting assistance is demonstrated by the fact that 16 percent of all respondents—all U.S. citizens—in our survey speak Spanish only, and 33 percent requested that the interview be conducted only in Spanish, suggesting that even though an individual may be bilingual, he or she may be most comfortable speaking Spanish.

Looking more closely at our respondents, we see that: 13 percent in San Antonio speak only Spanish; 15 percent in East L.A. speak only Spanish; and 21 percent in Uvalde, a rural county, 80 miles southwest of San Antonio speak only Spanish.

USAGE OF BILINGUAL VOTING ASSISTANCE

The Voting Rights Act requires both oral and written bilingual assistance during registration and voting. In addition to bilingual ballots, bilingual poll workers are required to assist voters, many of whom are unfamiliar with the voting process because of their long exclusion from it.

Oct. 9, 1873); Ortiz v. New York State Board of Elections, Civil No. 74-455 (W.D.N.Y. Oct 11, 1974) (Buffalo); and Arroyo v. Tucker, 372 F. Supp. 764 (E.D. Pa 1974) (Philadelphia).

MALDEF's survey reveals that 26 percent of all respondents who voted in the 1980 general election received Spanish assistance and 23 percent of those who voted used Spanish language materials when voting. The latter figure was higher for Uvalde (33 percent) and lower for the urban areas (San Antonio: 18 percent; East L.A. 12 percent).

The elderly in Uvalde accounted for the majority of those who used bilingual voting assistance and materials in the 1980 general election. Seventy-four percent of those over 65 years old used the Spanish language ballot in Uvalde, and 56 percent took advantage of Spanish language oral assistance at the polling place.

VALUE OF BILINGUAL VOTING ASSISTANCE

According to our survey, 96 percent of Mexican American voters think it is a good idea to provide help in Spanish for registering and voting. Those over 65 years old in Uvalde are unanimous on this issue. Perhaps more revealing are the following figures:

35 percent of all respondents would be less likely to register if there was no one to help in Spanish (among those over 65 years, 44 percent agreed with this statement),

33 percent of all respondents would be less likely to vote if there were no ballot in Spanish (among those over 65 years, 43 percent agreed with this statement).

Again, the elderly in Uvalde seemed to be among the most enthusiastic supporters of the bilingual provisions. Sixty-four percent said they would be less likely to register if there were no one to help in Spanish; 64 percent said they would be less likely to vote if there were no ballot in Spanish.

I look forward to presenting to the Subcommittee the results of our completed survey and hope that they, along with other testimony you receive on this issue, will lay to rest many of the misconceptions that have surrounded the issue of bilingual elections and caused confusion and often hostility in the minds of legislators and the public.

One of the most frequent questions asked on this subject is, "If they're citizens, why don't they speak English?" I would like now to turn to some of the reasons why there are significant numbers of U.S. citizens who do not speak English and for whom bilingual election assistance was intended.

The inability of many adult Mexican American citizens who were born here or came here as young children to speak English is a direct consequence of the denial of eductional opportunities to them as children. Many Mexican American children have been denied a chance to learn English by virtue of their confinement, as a result of de jure segregation practices to predominantly or completely Mexican American schools, known colloquially as "the Mexican schools." Federal courts have recently found such segregation in dozens of localities across the state of Texas. Early last year, a federal judge who surveyed this sorry record has twice concluded, in separate decisions, that the State of Texas has practiced intentional discrimination against Mexican American students on a statewide basis.[38] In many of these cases, the former existence of one or more "Mexican schools," expressly maintained to isolate Mexican American students in Spanish speaking schools, was proved. In January 1981, a Federal Court found that "the 'Mexican schools' were invariably overcrowded and were inferior in all respects to those open exclusively to anglo students."[39] The decision goes on to say that "There can be no doubt that the principal purpose of the practices described above was to treat Mexican Americans as a separate and inferior class."

Nor is the history of segregation of Mexican Americans into separate schools limited to the State of Texas. A federal court struck down intentional segregation of Mexican Americans in Orange County, California in 1946,[40] and another did likewise in Oxnard, California in 1974.[41] Federal courts found that Arizona school districts had intentionally segregated Mexican Americans in cases from Tolleson, Maricopa County,[42] and Tucson.[43] And the same segregation has been found in Colorado's largest district in Denver.[44]

The eradication of discriminatory educational practices will not automatically produce well-educated, well-adjusted students. In Texas, for examples:

While many of the overt forms of discrimination wreaked upon Mexican Americans have been eliminated, the long history of prejudice and deprivation remains a significant obstacle to equal educational opportunity for these children. The deep sense of inferiority, cultural isolation, and acceptance of failure, instilled in a people by generations of subjugation cannot be eradicated merely by integrating the schools and repealing the 'No Spanish' statutes . . . . The severe educational difficulties which Mexican American children in Texas public schools continue to experience attest to the intensity of those lingering effects of past discriminatory treatment.[45]

The effects of educational policies such as the ones we have worked to eliminate can be seen most clearly in statistics which characterize our population, particularly older Mexican Americans. I would like to submit for the record two tables which examine educational achievement levels for Hispanics and non-Hispanics Only 7.1 percent of all Mexican Americans 65 years or older have completed four years of high school or more compared to 38.6 percent of all non-Hispanics. These figures improve considerably for younger Mexican Americans. Fifty-one percent of Mexican Americans between 25–29 years old have completed four years of high school or more. Yet, this figure is shockingly low compared to non-Hispanics in this age group, 87.1 percent of whom have had four years or more of high school.

Using another measure, again, older Mexican Americans are the least well-educated of any group of Hispanics and fall far below the educational achievement of non-Hispanics. Sixty-five percent of Mexican Americans 65 years or older have had less than five years of school compared to 8 percent of non-Hispanics. Younger Mexican Americans, those between the ages of 25 and 29, fared much better than their parents and grandparents but fell significantly below their non-Hispanic counterparts. More than seven percent of Mexican Americans in this age group had fewer than five years of school, compared with non-Hispanics, who accounted for only .6 percent of those with fewer than five years of school.

When Congress enacted bilingual election requirements in 1975, it did so based on a series of judicial findings which can be summarized in this decision in Torres v. Sachs:

"In order that the phrase 'the right to vote' be more than an empty platitude, a voter must be able effectively to register his or her political choice. This involves more than physically being able to pull a lever or marking a ballot. It is simply fundamental that voting instructions and ballots, in addition to any other material which forms part of the official communication to registered voters prior to an election, must be in Spanish as well as English, if the vote of Spanish-speaking citizens is not to be seriously impaired."[46]

Also significant was the Seventh Circuit affirmation of the lower court holding in Puerto Rican Organization for Political Action v. Kusper, which found that "if a person who cannot read English is entitled to oral assistance, if a Negro is entitled to correction of erroneous instructions, so a Spanish-speaking Puerto Rican is entitled to assistance in the language he can read or understand."[47] Based on this decision and others brought on behalf of Puerto Ricans under Section 4(e), which was part of the original Voting Rights Act, bilingual elections have been conducted in New York, parts of New Jersey, Philadelphia and Chicago since the mid-1970's.

Senator Hayakawa and other opponents of bilingual elections have alleged that bilingual election materials discourage non-English speaking U.S. citizens from learning English. When Congress enacted the bilingual provisions in 1975, this issue was considered. The House Judiciary Committee concluded that the purpose of bilingual election assistance—or its absence—was not educational:

"To be sure, the purpose of suspending English-only elections and requiring bilingual elections is not to correct the deficencies of prior educational inequality. It is to permit persons disabled by such disparities to vote now. [Bilingual elections] are a temporary measure to allow such citizens to register and vote immediately; it does not require language minorities to abide some unknown, distant time when local election agencies may have provided sufficient instruction to enable them to participate meaningfully in an English-only election." [48]

I would only add that when this Congress suspended the use of literacy tests in 1965, it did not send out a message advocating illiteracy. It was not suggested that any person should be satisfied with not knowing how to read or write. Similarly, bilingual election materials do not limit the primacy of the English language. To the contrary, they stimulate interest and participation in a system in which voters felt they have a voice. This feeling of belonging further stimulates and encourages active citizens to improve their English language skills.

In the meantime, Spanish speaking citizens have ample opportunity to become informed voters through our extensive Spansih language media. Today there are 139 Spanish language radio stations throughout the country, thirteen Spanish-language television stations, eight Spanish daily newspapers and scores of weekly and biweekly newspapers and magazines. The Spanish International Network has a nightly broadcast each night from Washington, D.C. In San Antonio and Uvalde, 70 percent of the respondents in our recent survey said they watched Spanish language television and 68 percent said they listened to Spanish language radio. More than 50 percent tune into the Spanish media more frequently than the English media.

CONCLUSION

Hispanics and other language minority citizens have had the protections of the Voting Rights Act for only seven years—a short time in which to remedy generations of purposeful exclusion. But in that short period of time, we have begun to enter the mainstream of American political life, not without obstacles but with the protective shield of the Voting Rights Act. Now is not the time to diminish these protections and retreat from the national commitment to minority voting rights embodied in the Voting Rights Act of 1965 and reaffirmed in 1970 and again in 1975.

I urge the Subcommittee and the full Senate to support S. 1992 without amendment.

Senator HATCH. Our final witness today—and we apologize to you for it has been a marathon session, is Ruth Hinerfeld, who is president of the League of Women Voters. I assure everybody that tomorrow we are going to limit witnesses in total time on both sides of this issue. We cannot spend this time every day, but I felt today was particularly important, meriting additional time to establish the groundwork for this debate.

We are delighted to have you here, and we look forward to your testimony at this time.

Senator KENNEDY. May I also join in welcoming you? I have had a good opportunity to meet with the league in recent days. They are very, very actively involved in the Voting Rights Act matters. You are a credit to the organization for making the efforts you have on this issue.

Senator HATCH. Proceed, Ms. Hinerfeld.

STATEMENT OF RUTH J. HINERFELD, PRESIDENT, LEAGUE OF WOMEN VOTERS OF THE UNITED STATES, ACCOMPANIED BY SALLY LAIRD, DIRECTOR, LEGISLATIVE ACTION DEPARTMENT

Ms. HINERFELD. Mr. Chairman and Senator Kennedy, I am Ruth Hinerfeld, president of the League of Women Voters of the United States. With me today is Sally Laird, who is the director of our Legislative Action Department.

May I begin by requesting your permission to submit my full testimony for the record?

Senator HATCH. Without objection, we will put your full statement in the record.

Ms. HINERFELD. Thank you.

We appreciate this opportunity to present the views of our members about the Voting Rights Act and S. 1992, the Voting Rights Act Amendments of 1981.

Ours is an organization whose very existence is based on citizen participation in government and especially on expanding and protecting voting rights. The league was established, in fact, by women who had finally won the battle for female suffrage in 1920, and league members today are as committed as they were at that time to making the right to vote a reality for all citizens.

I come before you in support of S. 1992, the bill that as H.R. 3112 was passed by the House with such an overwhelming majority that there can be no doubt of the widespread support it commands in all regions of our country. And I come before you to remind this subcommittee of the range of remedies that S. 1992 provides and some of the problems it addresses.

We support those remedies. We support extension of section 5 and believe that the proposed bailout provisions are both tough and fair, and should not be weakened. We support extension of the bilingual elections provisions to assure that all eligible voters have access to the ballot.

We support the language in section 2 of the bill that, in effect, provides that both existing and new acts of voting discrimination be held to the same results standard of proof; and let the record show that we supported that language in our House testimony last May.

Furthermore, the league believes that S. 1992, as it stands and as it was so unequivocably endorsed by the House of Representatives, is both workable and effective.

The purpose of my testimony is to share with you examples of discriminatory attitudes and practices as told to us by our local leagues in covered jurisdictions. Based on their findings, those leagues have concluded that their local governments are still unwilling to recognize or accept the concept of full participation of minority citizens in the political process.

Their findings attest to the fact that the Voting Rights Act and section 5 coverage must continue to play a major role in our elections system in order to remove subtle and invidious barriers to effective minority representation.

I would particularly like to point out to the subcommittee that our findings substantiate many of the criteria in the proposed bailout procedures contained in S. 1992.

We surveyed local leagues in areas covered by section 5 to determine the manner in which voter registration and voting is conducted in their communities. Based on their information, we have reached the conclusion that the persistence of discriminatory practices and attitudes toward registering minorities in covered jurisdictions still inhibits progress toward the goal of full minority political participation.

These practices and attitudes are indicative of a climate that is still hostile to the idea of minority participation and representation. They are also indicative of the continuing need for special protections to preserve the fragile gains made in minority registration and voting.

Leagues in covered jurisdictions report that barriers to registration remain high. Inconvenient registration times and places, lack of outreach to minority communities, and unwillingness on the part of registration officials to cooperate or work with community groups, or voluntarily take steps to make registration more convenient and accessible continue to discourage minority registration. These practices work hardships on all potential voters, but the hardships fall most heavily on the minority population which is more likely to be poor, transient, and undereducated.

One does not need to be black nor a member of a language minority to recognize the latent hostility of some officials to minority registration and political participation. Patronizing treatment and laggard service are all too familiar tactics for discouraging minority citizens from registering and voting. Let me give you two examples.

The first one involves the obstructive attitudes minorities often encounter in the registration process. The League of Women Voters of New York City told us that in New York, minority groups that request quantities of the voter registration forms for a planned registration drive report that the board of elections is unwilling to cooperate with them or comply with their request. Yet, a telephone call from the League of Women Voters usually suffices to obtain the form.

The second anecdote is an example of the kind of subtle harassment common in the voting process. This incident was reported to us by the Edinburg-McAllen, Texas League of Women Voters as follows: "In north Mission [Texas], the business manager of the school district ordered only one [voting] machine, even though the turnout was predicted to be high. That machine was filled up by 3:30 p.m. For about 45 minutes, until another machine was brought in, voters were not able to vote in the school election. The election judge for the school told us all the trouble started last year when "those Mexicans started to vote." Too many election judges and clerks are untrained and racist; they are not cooperative; in some cases they don't know enough about Spanish pronunciation and spelling to find names of minority people on the registration lists. Training sessions are not mandatory and are pretty much of a joke anyway."

Leagues also reported that even when local election officials are empowered by State law to authorize deputy registration, institute Saturday or evening registration hours, or set up satellite registration sites, all steps that would make registration easier and more accessible to minorities, they rarely choose to exercise this option.

While such examples may not be express violations of the act, I have cited them in order to convey to you a sense of the climate in which voter registration is administered in covered jurisdictions despite the act's protections.

The factors which contribute to this climate are very important in considering whether or not a community is indeed ready to come out from under the protection of section 5. Violations of section 5 do occur, of course, yet section 5 continues to serve a positive function in protecting minority voting rights, as illustrated by recent events in De Kalb County, Ga. In that county, the board of elections has persistently acted to restrict the registration of minority citizens, contrary to the purposes of the Voting Rights Act.

When we testified before the House Subcommittee on Civil and Constitutional Rights last May, we described in detail one such incident. For several years, the league and other citizen groups—most notably the NAACP—have conducted registration drives in De Kalb County. Those drives, conducted in more accessible locations and at more convenient times than registration provided by the county board of elections, have resulted in significant increases in voter registration.

For example, league volunteers registered over 1,300 citizens at 4 major shopping centers on 1 day, February 2, 1980, while only 2,700 were registered at the 115 established county sites in the whole month of January of that year.

During the 1980 general election year, the board of elections abruptly discontinued its practice of authorizing the League and other civic groups to register voters in such places as supermarkets and libraries. This policy change had the effect of making voter registration less accessible, particularly to minority citizens.

The De Kalb County board of elections, in defiance of section 5 of the Voting Rights Act, had failed to submit this change in policy to the Department of Justice. The De Kalb County League of Women Voters and the De Kalb County chapter of the NAACP filed a lawsuit and in June, 1980, obtained an injunction based on the preclearance violation. When the board finally submitted the change, the Department of Justice rejected it, and the board rescinded its policy.

When we testified before the House subcommittee in May, we believed, as did the De Kalb league, that this was the end of the story. We were wrong. In September, 1981, the county board came up with a new restriction on registration drives by civil organizations. This new policy would permit these organizations to continue conducting their registration drives in election years but would no longer allow them to conduct drives in off-election, odd-numbered years.

But registration lists are purged in odd-numbered years, and civic groups have been highly successful in registering and reregistering voters during these years. As an example, over 3,800 voters were registered during a 3-month period in 1981, 3,000 of them black voters. The proposed change has been submitted to the Department of Justice, and the De Kalb County League of Women Voters has filed a lengthy objection.

The De Kalb County story illustrates our major point, which bears repeating. Even in the area of voter registration, where we know that the greatest progress has been made, it is coverage by section 5 that protects and preserves those gains. Without it, the changes in De Kalb County and probably a number of other discriminatory changes in policy, practices, and procedures would go into effect.

The league believes that the best argument for retaining the act's highly effective administrative enforcement mechanism is the remarkable success it has had in increasing minority registration and removing many of the barriers to minority political participation.

Although the statistics show progress, they also show that there is still a long way to go before all traces of the discriminatory systems of the past are erased. If increased registration rates are to be meaningful, they must go hand-in-hand with increased participation in all facets of political life.

I would like to quote the League of Women Voters of Georgia, which said.

> The Voting Rights Act has been the most far-reaching, beneficial piece of civil rights legislation that has come along in recent history. It must be extended. We are being dragged, kicking and screaming, into the 20th century, but there can be no other way of doing it. Attitudes toward blacks have not changed. We still have a long way to go to educate the electorate and remove the fears of the blacks, whose jobs may depend on the degree of political activity they engage in.

Adding my own words to those of the Georgia league, in closing, I must emphasize the league's belief that at a time when many covered jurisdictions are still marked by racially polarized voting patterns, unequal and inconvenient registration opportunities, and persistent attempts by State and local officials to make discriminatory changes in voting and election procedures, there is little evidence that covered jurisdictions are ready to accept full minority political participation without the effective protections of the act's special provisions. Those that are ready, those that do not continue to discriminate, those that do remove barriers to voting and election participation, those that engage in outreach activities to make registration in voting more accessible to minority citizens, will meet the criteria set forth in the bail-out section of S. 1992.

S. 1992 will provide a strong, positive incentive to many jurisdictions covered by section 5 that wish to comply fully with the letter and the spirit of the Voting Rights Act.

Senator HATCH. Thank you, Ms. Hinerfeld.

In your testimony before the House Judiciary Committee, you indicated the support of the League of Women Voters for a 10-year extension of preclearance. The House instead chose to make those provisions permanent. What is the league's present position with regard to these provisions?

Ms. HINERFELD. Yes, Mr. Chairman, we supported a 10-year extension at that time and had no position in support of bail-out provisions at that time. I believe that in our mind, as in perhaps the minds of many others who have developed this legislation, one was the corollary of the other.

When we saw that it would in fact be possible within a reasonable period of time for jurisdictions under coverage to bail out if they met fair and effective criteria, we then recognized that the need for the 10-year time period had been obviated by the fact that the provision for bailing out was meeting that need.

Senator HATCH. In your statement you state that the Voting Rights Act is still needed because of "continued threats to minority voting rights." This is illustrated by the fact—and I will quote you again—"that minorities remain "under-represented" on elected bodies at all levels of government." How is this under-representation evinced, in your view?

Ms. HINERFELD. In the full statement we have submitted, we have citations by individual leagues who are of course speaking to the situations in their communities. They are most familiar with the size of the representation of minorities on their local governing bodies, be they school boards, town councils, or whatever, and the size of the minority population. I think they are drawing conclusions from that that continued protections of the act are still necessary for the next stages of political maturity in terms of minority political participation.

In other words, the doors to political participation perhaps have been opened by voting registration, which has been made more equitable and accessible, but the next steps we have begun to see happen—and those next steps are, I think, logical next steps—will be increased representation in the full political life of a jurisdiction.

Senator HATCH. How, precisely, will we know when minorities are no longer under-represented?

Ms. HINERFELD. Mr. Chairman, I do not think that there is any single formula whereby this determination can be made. Of course, it is a question that will depend on the particular community and the situation in the community, and a whole host of considerations—the full range of the kinds of things that will have to be taken into account under section 2, which I believe is what you were speaking to, when determinations under section 2 are made.

Senator HATCH. There was a fairly common understanding with regard to the House debate that any vote for any amendment to the revised Civil Rights Act on the House floor was considered a vote in opposition to civil rights. What is your position on this in the context of the present Senate debate? As I view your statement, you are at least somewhat flexible with respect to changes and modifications of the House bill. I hope it will not be billed as a legislative matter where any and all changes in the Senate bill will be considered "wrong" votes.

Ms. HINERFELD. I think I will have to comment on our view as to what is right and what is wrong here. If my statement conveyed to you the impression that we are open to modifications in the House bill, then my statement misrepresented our view.

Senator HATCH. In other words, you do not think any amendment in any way, shape, or form, is acceptable, or do you believe that any vote for any amendment to the bill is a vote against civil rights?

Ms. HINERFELD. I will not be that doctrinaire or arbitrary.

Senator HATCH. That was the attitude on the House side, by the way.

Ms. HINERFELD. But I will say that in terms of the main provisions that we discussed—the provisions that are primarily at issue, the provisions that I have just cited in my testimony—we will undoubtedly look not very kindly on any attempt to modify what the House has done.

Senator HATCH. The express constitutional justification for preclearance procedures in section 5 in the case of South Carolina v. Katzenbach was of course the existence of extraordinary conditions in the South. Do these "extraordinary conditions" continue to exist today? And, I might just ask as an extension of that, how will we know when they no longer exist?

For instance, I have heard some southern Senators and Congressmen say that in their States they do not believe these extraordinary conditions continue to exist. How long will the South have to be subject to the will of the rest of the country with regard to the Voting Rights Act?

They have also interpreted the present bailout as providing no opportunity to bail out at all, because its requirements are so stringent that there is in reality little way that any community could bail out once they come under the onus of section 5.

My question is, do you know of any extraordinary conditions that continue to exist today such as those that were considered in the Katzenbach case?

Ms. HINERFELD. The extraordinary conditions that existed at that time, of course, are not the conditions that exist today, and I think we are all grateful for that fact.

However, it was the intent of my statement today to indicate that, while those conditions of the bad old days no longer prevail, we have a new set of conditions which, while not as overt, not as blatant, not as—well, I guess I would have to use the word "obscene" in political terms—as they were at that time, certainly do present obstacles to full minority participation and are in need of correcting.

If I may add a footnote to what you said about the conditions in the South and covered jurisdiction, coming from the State of New York as I do, I think I would have to remind you that New York City itself is covered under section 5, and it is not only the South that remains under section 5 coverage.

Senator HATCH. Of course some of these people feel that there is much more discrimination in areas of the North than there is in the South. Whether that is true or not I cannot say, but some of them feel very deeply that the very people who are imposing what they consider onerous obligations on them come from areas of the country where the conditions are just as bad if not worse. I cannot be the judge of that. All I can say is that those are the arguments that I hear on both sides of this issue.

Although New York may be covered in part, there are of course many other jurisdictions where much discrimination exists that are not covered.

Ms. HINERFELD. I agree with you that I cannot judge that. Just for the record, it is not all of New York City. It is a limited number of boroughs in New York City.

Senator HATCH. Maybe it should cover all of New York City.

Ms. HINERFELD. That is not for us to decide right now.

I would like to return, however, to your question of how you know when it is time to bail out. How do you know when we have reached what you have characterized as perhaps a state that is very difficult to reach?

Senator HATCH. Can it be reached at this point?

Ms. HINERFELD. We think it can be reached. As I indicated, we believe that the bailout provisions, which would insure that the kind of thing that entailed coverage in the first place is no longer occurring and has not occurred for 10 years, are fair. They are tough; they are intended to be tough.

Senator HATCH. I think they are impossible. I am not saying that preclearance should not be there because, as you must have noticed, my argument is with section 2. I am for a simple extension of the bill.

I think the changes in section 2 are very bad, and I think there are other inadvisable changes too, but I think section 2 is a particularly bad provision. I think it is particularly detrimental to the entire country, not just the South. Even if it only applied to the South, I think that the way section 2 is rewritten by this particular bill is not only unconstitutional but reprehensible.

Its constitutionality is predicated upon the same theory as the so-called "Human Life Bill," opposed by so many constitutional observers.

It is amazing to me that the very same people now, because it personally pleases them or appeals to their sense of social justice, want to overrule a Supreme Court decision which seems to be based in the law that has always existed in this country and yet find so much fault with others who want to do the same on other issues. I find fault with both positions, to be honest with you.

Ms. HINERFELD. Mr. Chairman, I have neither the legal background nor the inclination to debate you on——

Senator HATCH. I do not want a debate, I just want your ideas.

Ms. HINERFELD. On the Supreme Court interpretation and the relation of this proposed legislation to that interpretation. However, I think that what both my predecessors here on this stand, Benjamin Hooks and Vilma Martinez, said would represent my point of view very well.

Coming back to your point on bailout, I understand that among the witnesses who will be before you, there will be someone who will make a presentation based on examination of the situation in covered jurisdiction which will ascertain those jurisdictions which are probably ripe for bailout right now, and will so cite them.

Senator HATCH. I will be very interested in that.

In your testimony you discuss in some detail the sort of subtle discrimination, or nonovert discrimination, which still exists in the country, but you make no reference to the continued existence of the sort of overt and explicit discrimination against which the act was originally directed, except that in your answers you have indicated those conditions no longer exist.

Just to be sure on that point, do you know of any incidents in recent years of persons who have actually attempted to register and been denied that right or of persons who have actually attempted to vote and who have been denied that right? Do you know of any specific instances in those two areas?

Ms. HINERFELD. I know of no instances because that kind of overt practice is what was outlawed by the act, and the fact that such instances do not come to my mind is, I think, a ringing endorsement for the success in bringing us to where we are today.

Senator HATCH. Does that mean that we now have to go far beyond where present law currently is?

Ms. HINERFELD. Mr. Chairman, again I would have to reaffirm what Benjamin Hooks said before me—that in his view and in ours as well, what S. 1992 purports to do is not take us well beyond where we were in forging new grounds in terms of the extension of rights where rights were not intended to be extended by the Voting Rights Act of 1965.

What it does is try to keep us where we are today and hold us in a pattern whereby future progress and the prevention of remission to the practices of the past is possible.

Senator HATCH. The thing that bothers me on this issue, is the assertion that it is all right for certain interests to advocate overruling Supreme Court decisions, but it is not all right for other interests to advocate that same course of action. There are not two sets of constitutional theory based upon the "progressiveness" of the Supreme Court decisions in question.

You speak about direct and indirect evidence of discriminatory effect on page 3 of your testimony. Could you give me some illustrations of each category of evidence—for instance, some examples of direct evidence of discriminatory effect and indirect evidence of discriminatory effect? I am not sure that I understand either concept.

Ms. HINERFELD. I think that was perhaps a paraphrasing of the terms "intent" and "result" in terms of the rules of evidence.

Senator HATCH. On page 5 of your testimony you allude to "wondrous tales of discrimination" including instances of voting registrars asking potential voters to interpret constitutional provisions. I am a little bit confused on that. Are you still suggesting that this is taking place, and, if it is, where is it taking place?

Ms. HINERFELD. No, you are citing the example given by one of the leagues. It was the Norfolk-Virginia Beach, Va., league. What they were talking about in that instance—and I think a careful reading would reveal that—was what had been true in the past.

Senator HATCH. In the past—I see.

Ms. HINERFELD. Yes. And contrasting that with that—— Senator HATCH. So you are not claiming that this is presently the case?

Ms. HINERFELD. No, no.

Senator HATCH. OK. You speak at length about what you refer to as psychological pressures facing potential voters. You observe for example that "persons in low income projects are fearful of registering to vote because they feel information obtained will be given to the housing authority and the Department of Social Services."

I have to admit, I am personally sorry that these psychological circumstances exist, as I am sure that they do, but what is the relevance of that to the legislative debate that is now taking place?

Ms. HINERFELD. That of course is one of the examples of the kind of subtle harassment that potential registrees and voters face.

I think that for somebody like you, Mr. Chairman, or like me, where we might go to register would not be of any consequence. We are not intimidated by official places; we are not intimidated by neighborhoods where we do not feel welcome. But as we try to state in the cases we cited, for many of these people for whom registering to vote can be something of an act of courage, certain places are considered so inhospitable that they are afraid to appear in them and they are afraid to be registered by certain people that they perceive might be misusing a list of names.

Senator HATCH. I agree with you. I feel sorry that such psychological pressures exist or that they continue, but what precisely can the Voting Rights Act, or any law for that matter, do to alleviate these unfortunate psychological pressures?

Ms. HINERFELD. Again, here we have a possibility of a situation where in any given jurisdiction the site of places for registration or voting might be changed—for example, from the schoolhouse to the county courthouse, from private homes to the jailhouse, which may not be an accurate example, but that is the kind of thing that can happen and can be as effective a deterrent to voting participation as saying, "OK, let's see you interpret this section of the Constitution before you vote."

Senator HATCH. Many of the violations of voting rights that you describe as being "subtle" are, in my opinion, indeed so subtle that I am not even sure that I understand the theory under which they constitute discrimination, even under your own attempts at definition in your statement.

What, for example, is wrong with the laws in Pima County, Ariz., that require deputy registrars to maintain and keep copies of a record of the voters they register? And what is wrong with their laws requiring proof of naturalization for persons born outside of the United States? Is there something wrong with either of those?

Ms. HINERFELD. We did not cite those examples as illustrations of practices where there is something wrong, Mr. Chairman. We cited those as an illustration of a situation where changes were made without their being submitted to the Department of Justice under preclearance requirements and thus violating those requirements.

Senator HATCH. You state, "For many minorities, registering to vote is not worth the effort when it does not result in increased minority representation." Frankly, I have always thought that there were other incentives for free persons to vote in a free society, but let me accept your premise for a moment.

Is it constitutionally required, in your view, that in order to enhance incentives for these individuals, we increase the numbers of minority representatives? Is that what you understand the Constitution to demand?

Ms. HINERFELD. No, of course the Constitution does not outline that as a necessity, but I think, Mr. Chairman, the problem we get into in this kind of situation is looking at hypothetical cases whereby we try to define, almost to the point of absurdity, where the line lies between what is considered the right kind of representation that would satisfy requirements under section 2 and what section 2 really purports to try to do.

I think we tend to forget that we are dealing with situations that have been so bad in the past that we have had to secure the strongest kind of legislation to correct them, and we are now at the point in time where, indeed, it might be perceived by a member of the minority community that if in fact the system keeps being juggled around, through gerrymandering or whatever process, to deprive a minority population of a minority representative in ways, as I say, contrived to accomplish just that purpose, clearly that is a disincentive to anyone to participate in the political system.

Senator HATCH. I do not disagree with you where they are contrived or where there is an intent to discriminate; there is no question about it.

We appreciate your coming. I think, with that, we will recess these hearings until tomorrow. Thank you so much for coming; we appreciate having you here.

Ms. HINERFELD. All right. Thank you.

[The prepared statement of Ruth J. Hinerfeld follows:]

PREPARED STATEMENT OF RUTH J. HINERFELD

Mr. Chairman, members of the subcommittee, I am Ruth Hinerfeld, President of the League of Women Voters of the United States. We thank you for this opportunity to present the views of our members in strong support of S 1992, a bill to extend the Voting Rights Act of 1965.

The League of Women Voters of the United States is a nonpartisan citizen organization with members in all 50 states as well as the District of Columbia, Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands. Ours is an organization whose very existence is based on citizen participation in government -- and particularly on expanding and protecting the right to vote. In fact, the League was established in 1920 by the women who had finally won the battle for female suffrage. And League members are as committed now as they were then to making the right to vote a reality for all citizens. I address this subcommittee, therefore, on behalf of a representative, an informed, and a concerned constituency who have studied, analyzed and struggled longer and more consistently than perhaps any other citizen's group to overcome the obstacles that keep citizens from full participation in the electoral process.

Every school child learns that no right is more fundamental to the full exercise of American citizenship than the right to register and vote, and to have that vote count on an equal basis. Yet, in many states and localities, systematic denial of that right kept generations of minorities out of the political process and ensured that their citizenship remained second-class. It is precisely because the Voting Rights Act at last unlocked this first, essential door to political participation that it has been called the most important of the civil rights gains of the 1960's.

The Voting Rights Act and its special provisions have accomplished what two constitutional amendments and a hundred years of litigation could not accomplish: the enfranchisement of hundreds of thousands of minority Americans. Since its enactment, registration and voting rates for minorities have risen dramatically.

Yet, the tremendous progress made under the Voting Rights Act does not mean that threats to minority voting rights are a thing of the past. Minority registration still lags behind non-minority registration, and minorities remain underrepresented on elected bodies at all levels of government.

Therefore, we are here today to testify that the special provisions of the Voting Rights Act must be retained until all citizens are afforded an equal opportunity to register, to vote, to run for office -- in short, to exercise those rights which we all believe are ours under the Constitution.

We come before you in strong support of S 1992, the bill that, as HR 3112, was passed by the House with such an overwhelming majority (389-24) that there can be no doubt of the wide-spread support that it commands in all regions of our country. S 1992 is the product of considered deliberations which sought to accomodate all legitimate views on what would constitute a fair and effective extension of the Voting Rights Act. We support extension of Section 5 and agree that the proposed bail-out provisions are both tough and fair and should not, under any circumstances, be weakened. We support extension of the Bilingual Elections provision until 1992 to ensure that all eligible voters have access to the ballot. We support the language in Section 2 of the bill that provides that both existing and new acts of voting discrimination be held to the same standard of proof, namely direct and indirect evidence of discriminatory effect. This language restores the protections against voting discrimination that were in effect before the Supreme Court's decision in City of Mobile v. Bolden. Furthermore, the League believes that S 1992, as it stands and as it was so unequivocably endorsed by the House of Representatives, is both workable and effective.

The purpose of this testimony is to document the persistence of discriminatory attitudes and practices that have led local Leagues in covered jurisdictions to conclude that their local governments are still unwilling to recognize or accept the concept of full and equal participation of minority citizens in the political process. We will show that the Voting Rights Act and Section 5 must continue to play a major role in order to remove subtle and invidious barriers to effective minority representation. And, in making the case for renewal of Section 5, our findings will show the need for the criteria carefully drafted in the proposed bail-out procedures contained in S 1992.

We will discuss problems of access to the election process, election schemes that serve to dilute minority voting strength and the importance of the bilingual election provisions of the Voting Rights Act to the protection of the rights of non-English speaking citizens. Other organizations and individuals will come before this subcommittee to discuss these issues in detail. We will focus our remarks on voter registration.

VOTER REGISTRATION

The League has long been closely identified with voter registration: no other organization has our history of service to voters and commitment to the principle that all citizens have the right to participate in the electoral process on an equal footing with every other eligible citizen. For over 60 years local Leagues across the country have conducted grassroots voter registration and voter outreach efforts, and have worked to eliminate the barriers to voter registration that stand in the way of full citizen participation in the political process.

For minorities, as for all citizens, registration is the first, the most crucial step toward full political participation. For this reason, the experiences of minority citizens who seek to register are extremely important. If the cost of registering in terms of time, energy, inconvenience, personal pride or security is too high, a citizen may not register or not vote. And when minority citizens are discouraged from registering or voting, they are unable to eject candidates of their choice to public office or to have a meaningful voice in political decision-making in their communities.

Local Leagues Describe Registration Practices

We have asked local Leagues in areas covered by Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act to describe how voter registration is conducted in their areas. Based on this information, we see evidence that subtly discriminatory attitudes and practices persist in covered jurisdictions. The incidents cited in this testimony document the widespread use of practices and procedures that serve to discourage minority registration. While some do not involve express vi lations of the Voting Rights Act, they are cited in order to convey to you a sense of the climate in which voter registration is administered in covered jurisdictions, a climate that, despite the act's protections, is still hostile to the idea of equal participation and representation of minority citizens in all facets of political life. The Norfolk-Virginia Beach League reports:

> "The Voting Rights Act has made many people aware that voting is an inalienable right that cannot be denied. Without the Voting Rights Act hanging over Virginia, any gains made would quite dissolve. Longtime residents of both our cities (Norfolk and Virginia Beach) tell wondrous tales of discrimination: 'white paper' registrations where the applicant was handed a piece of blank paper and asked to interpret a section of the > Constitution. Others tell of having to produce their poll tax receipts. We have not progressed very far from that sort of mind-set when so many employees of the registrar still argue that 'registration should be made hard so they appreciate the right.'"

Seventeen years (six years in the case of bilingual elections) can only begin to exorcise the discriminatory attitudes that led to 100 years of violent abridgement of the constitutionally guaranteed voting rights of minority Americans. In the words of the President of the Roanoke Area, Virginia League of Women Voters:

> "I am convinced that unless there are federal requirements regarding voting that even the minimal attention given to minorities would be forsaken."

Access to Registration

Despite the protections afforded by the Voting Rights Act, Leagues in covered jurisdictions report that registration costs continue to be high. Inconvenient registration times and places, lack of outreach to the minority community, and unwillingness on the part of registration officials to cooperate or work with community groups, or to voluntarily take steps that would make registration more convenient and accessible continue to discourage minority registration. These practices work hardships on all potential voters, but the hardships fall most heavily on the minority population, who are more likely to be poor, transient and under-educated. One does not need to be black or a member of a language minority to recognize the latent hostility of some officials to minority registration and political participation. Patronizing treatment and laggard service to minority registrants are all too familiar tactics for discouraging minority citizens from registering and voting.

The widely held belief that voting is a privilege, not a right, has inevitably affected the conduct of voter registration, and has led to the retention of practices that make registration less, rather than more, accessible in most covered jurisdictions. For example, many counties have only one permanent registration place, located in the town hall or county courthouse, and persons in rural areas, or those who work or lack transportation, are often inconvenienced. The Mississippi League reports that:

> "Current registration laws in Mississippi impose a hardship on blacks and poor people. Getting to the city hall or the county courthouse during regular working hours makes it difficult for working people and persons dependent on others for transportation to register. Also, these locations are intimidating because they are symbols of white domination and white control."

The Georgetown, South Carolina League reports that the registrar's office in their county is located in the rear of the sheriff's office. In Alabama, the Tuscaloosa League notes that the only registration site for a large, rural county is the courthouse, open only during business hours and closed during lunch time. The Charlottesville-Albemarle County, Virginia LWV observes:

> "The principal barrier [to minority registration] is the law which requires citizens to appear in person to register. Minority and low-income citizens often are employed in jobs where absenting themselves to register would endanger their jobs."

Furthermore, registration times, places and deadlines may only be publicized through a small legal notice in the local newspaper, or in a few libraries -- usually not in minority neighborhoods. According to the Alexandria, Virginia League of Women Voters:

> "...not everyone subscribes to the local newspaper or goes to two particular libraries. Community groups must take it upon themselves to produce and/or distribute their own materials and do their own voter outreach."

Registration by Minority Organizations

When minority community groups do seek to service the minority community with registration drives and voter information, they are frequently obstructed or hampered by the negative attitudes they encounter when they request assistance or authorization from election officials. The Goldsboro-Wayne County, North Carolina League of Women Voters explains:

> "An attitudinal problem exists. Last year, the Wayne Citizens for Minority Affairs wanted to hold registration drives throughout the county at various intervals. Upon discussion with the Board of Elections chairman, the election supervisor commented

'the League (LWV) knows what they are doing, we have no problems with them. Your people make so many errors. Why don't you just let the League hold the drives?' The lack of respect and overall cooperation is evident to minority groups."

In New York City, minority groups who request quantities of the voter registration forms for a planned registration drive report that the Board of Elections is unwilling to cooperate with them or comply with their request, yet a telephone call from the League of Women Voters of New York City usually suffices to obtain the forms.

Minority citizens attempting to register often encounter disparaging treatment. Subtle harassment and intimidation can be as effective in inhibiting minority registration as the old overt terror tactics and reprisals. For example, the Goldsboro-Wayne County, North Carolina League of Women Voters testifies to the psychological pressures that minority registrants are frequently confronted with:

"...Persons in low income projects are fearful of registering to vote because they feel information obtained will be given to the Housing Authority and the Department of Social Services. This is an imbedded fear...Many rural persons are told by their employer or landlord when to register and who to vote for."

Lack of Outreach Efforts

Local election officials are generally given broad discretionary powers to implement state election laws. This discretion was ostensibly provided so that local election administrators would have the margin of flexibility they need to assure the access of all citizens to vote under the varying social, economic and geographic conditions that exist within each state. However, this discretion is often exercised in a manner that impedes rather than enhances a citizen's right to vote.

Registration officials rarely use their authority to take steps that might increase minority registration and political participation, or to make the registration process easier or more accessible for minorities. The use of volunteer deputy registrars to conduct voter registration is a common example of a statutory power that, even when expressly authorized by state law, is rarely exercised on the local level. For example, the Georgia state code permits local election boards to appoint volunteer deputy registrars. Yet, according to the Griffin-Spalding, Georgia League of Women Voters, the current registrar of voters in Spalding County has chosen to interpret the state law as not permitting voter registration to be conducted outside of one permanent registration office. The Griffin-Spalding League feels that the registrar's unwillingness to make use of such procedures as deputy registration, or to institute Saturday or evening hours for registration, or set up satellite registration sites in more convenient locations, has inhibited minority registration in that community.

The Virginia election code stipulates that "no registrar shall actively solicit any application for registration or any application for ballot." This rule is frequently cited by local voter registrars as the reason they are unable to comply with requests for more and convenient places for registration, despite another provision of the state code specifying that "the appearance by the general registrar or assistant registrar in public places at preannounced hours shall not be deemed solicitation or registration."[1] According to the Virginia Beach League of Women Voters, voter outreach or special efforts to increase registration are rare because of this rule:

> "The present interpretation of the no soliciting rule...allows registrars to run their offices under the narrowest definition of service to the public."

Furthermore, deputy registrars in Virginia Beach are almost always merchants, yet the League reports that "there is nothing in their stores to indicate that they can register voters. A pharmacist once placed a small sign in his window saying 'register here' and it had to be removed -- no soliciting!"

Local Leagues report that when election authorities do exercise their option to appoint volunteer deputy registrars, minority registration invariably increases. A large number of the local Leagues surveyed attribute increases in minority registration in their areas to the registration and voter outreach efforts of minority group organizations such as the NAACP. However, many covered jurisdictions fail to make use of options and resources available to them for increasing minority registration.

The Importance of Section 5

Section 5 review is truly the heart of the Voting Rights Act. Enacted in response to the "legislate and litigate" strategy of Southern governments,[2] Section 5 was designed to prevent new discriminatory practices from replacing the old ones once they were enjoined by court orders -- a common cycle before 1965. The Voting Rights Act's effectiveness lies in the potent combination of remedial measures in Section 2, and the preventative mechanism of Section 5, working in tandem to eliminate long-standing discriminatory election schemes and prevent new ones from taking their place. Without Section 5, attempts to make discriminatory voting changes would go unchallenged, and enforcement of the Voting Rights Act would be a futile exercise.

Based on the actual experiences of state and local Leagues, the League of Women Voters does not believe that Section 5 is an unduly complicated or burdensome process. Section 5 review is a simple administrative procedure, and submissions that are clearly nondiscriminatory are routinely expedited by the Department of Justice, rarely requiring more than 60 days. Furthermore, the Department of Justice's guidelines for the administration of Section 5 contain provisions for providing expedited consideration of a proposed change if the submitting authority finds it necessary to implement a change within the 60 day review period.

The Supreme Court has upheld the constitutionality of Section 5 in numerous court challenges, most notably in Allen v. State Board of Elections [393 U.S. 544, 567 (1969)]. In that ruling, the Supreme Court recognized that even minor changes in election procedure, such as changes of polling places, can, in fact, be used to perpetuate discrimination and should be subjected to Section 5 scrutiny. The Edinburg-McAllen, Texas League of Women Voters attests to the ease with which such seemingly minor changes can frustrate citizen exercise of the right to vote:

> "The most obvious change that the Voting Rights Act has brought about is that the practice of changing polling places at whim has stopped; it used to be 'great fun' every election day to try to find out where you were supposed to vote this time."

[2] Harvard, The South: A Shifting Perspective in the Changing Politics of the South, 19 (W. Harvard, ed. 1972).

Such practices impose a particular hardship on minority voters, who may not have access to the communication channels by which other voters are informed of changes, or may experience greater difficulty getting from one location to another.

Section 5 also provides an important vehicle for interested citizens to have input into the Department of Justice's decision on proposed voting changes. There is no belief more central to the League's raison d'etre than the belief that informed citizen participation is essential to the healthy working of democracy. Citizens and community organizations are often able to recognize problems in election procedures that officials tend to overlook or deny. We know that citizen input, while rarely sought by local officials, can provide valuable insights into proposals for changing the election system. Section 5 regulations require that the Department of Justice maintain a registry of interested citizens and minority group organizations who wish to be notified when a voting change is submitted for pre-clearance. This gives the citizens a rare opportunity to share information about the effect a proposed change will have on minority political participation -- information that the Department of Justice may have no other way of obtaining.

Section 5 in Use

Recent events in Pima County, Arizona and DeKalb County, Georgia illustrate the need for continuing the protections of Section 5. The League of Women Voters in Tucson, Arizona has found it necessary, just this month, to inform the Department of Justice about two unsubmitted changes in registration procedures. The County Recorder of Pima County made these changes upon taking office on January 1, 1981. One of the new provisions requires persons born outside the United States to swear or affirm as to the method of attaining citizenship. The other requires deputy registrars to maintain and keep a copy of a record of the voters they registered. The League of Women Voters of Tucson believes that these changes inhibit non-English speaking minorities from registering because of their sensitivity to questions concerning citizenship and their concern about the use of registration records by deputy registrars, most of whom are designated by the political parties. Whether or not these changes are in fact discriminatory they must be submitted under Section 5's pre-clearance requirements. The Tucson League has sought to prompt both the County Recorder and the County Attorney of Pima County to submit these changes for the past six months, without success, and on January 7, 1982, the League brought the situation to the attention of the United States Assistant Attorney General for Civil Rights.

In DeKalb County, Georgia, the Board of Elections has persistently acted to restrict the registration of minority citizens contrary to the purposes of the Voting Rights Act. When we testified before the House Subcommittee on Civil and Constitutional Rights last May, we described, in detail, one such incident.

For several years, the League and other citizen groups, most notably the NAACP, have been conducting registration drives in DeKalb County. These drives which were conducted in more accessible locations and at more convenient times than the registration practices provided by the County Board of Elections, resulted in significant increases in voter registrations. For example, League volunteers registered 1,302 citizens at four major shopping centers in one day, February 2, 1980, while only 2,700 citizens were registered at the 115 established county sites in the whole month of January of that year.

During the 1980 general election year, the Board of Elections abruptly discontinued its practice of authorizing the League of Women Voters and other civic groups to register voters in such places as supermarkets and libraries. This policy change had the effect of making voter registration less accessible, particularly to minority citizens.

The DeKalb County Board of Elections, in defiance of Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act, failed to submit this change in policy to the Department of Justice. The DeKalb County League of Women Voters and the DeKalb County chapter of the NAACP filed a law suit and, in June, 1980, obtained an injunction based on the pre-clearance violation. When the Board finally submitted the change, the Department of Justice rejected it and the Board rescinded the policy.

When we testified before the House Subcommittee, we believed, as did the DeKalb League, that this was the end of the story. We were wrong. In September, 1981, the County Board came up with a new restriction on registration drives by civic organizations. Although these organizations would be permitted to continue conducting their registration drives in election years, they would no longer be able to conduct drives in off-election, odd-numbered years. Registration lists are purged in odd-numbered years and civic groups have been very successful in registering and reregistering voters during these years. To give a recent example, 3,838 voters were registered during a three-month period in 1981, 3,000 of them black voters. The proposed change has been submitted to the Department of Justice. The DeKalb County League of Women Voters has filed a lengthy objection.

The DeKalb County and Tucson stories illustrate our major point, which bears repeating: even in the area of voter registration, where we know that the greatest progress has been made, it is Section 5 which protects and preserves those gains. Without Section 5, the changes in DeKalb and Tucson and probably an undocumented number of other subtly discriminatory changes in policy, practices and procedures would go into effect. Without Section 5, the League and the NAACP in DeKalb County would have had the burden of proving the discriminatory nature of the change in order to continue registering voters. Without Section 5, the only way to stop discriminatory election practices and to eliminate barriers to registration and voting would be case-by-case litigation, a long, drawn-out, costly and tedious process.

The Deterrent Effect

The existence of Section 5 has deterred covered jurisdictions from making changes in election procedures that they know the Department of Justice will find objectionable. In the words of the Brazos County, Texas League of Women Voters: "The Voting Rights Act is like Big Brother; election officials don't like him, but they're not going to cross him, either."

The Charlottesville-Albemarle County, Virginia League of Women Voters feels that Section 5 pre-clearance has protected minority voting rights by:

> "...ruling out, in advance, possible actions which might have limited minority political participation. One gets the impression (although this would be difficult to prove) that some actions are not proposed because of the Voting Rights Act and that others would not be taken without it."

This deterrent effect is crucial. Surely, it is simpler to prevent discriminatory laws and practices than to eliminate them after they are put into effect. We believe that the remarkable success of the Voting Rights Act in increasing minority registration and removing many of the barriers to minority political participation is the best argument for retaining the act's highly effective enforcement mechanisms. Although the statistics show progress, they also show that there is still a long way to go before all traces of the discriminatory systems of the past are erased. Even with the outer door to political participation unlocked, the doors to elective office and political power, for example, have proven to be difficult ones for minorities to push open. And if increased registration rates are to be meaningful, they must go hand-in-hand with increased participation in all facets of American political life.

ACCESS TO ELECTIONS

Once the barriers to registration have been overcome, there are still road-blocks to the casting of a meaningful vote. One problem is the often inadequate training given to voter registrars and election officials. This results in reinforcing uncooperative attitudes and contributes to the frequency of irregularities and "errors" in the administration of registration and voting -- particularly in heavily minority precincts or districts. One such incident was reported to us by the Edinburg-McAllen, Texas League of Women Voters:

> "In north Mission [Texas], the business manager of the school district ordered only one [voting] machine, even though the turnout was predicted to be high. That machine was filled up by 3:30 p.m. For about 45 minutes, until another machine was brought in, voters were not able to vote in the school election. The election judge for the school told me all the trouble started last year when 'those Mexicans started to vote.' Too many election judges and clerks are untrained and racist; they are not cooperative; in some cases they don't know enough about Spanish pronunciation and spelling to find names of minority people on the registration lists. Training sessions are not mandatory and are pretty much of a joke anyway."

According to the Goldsboro-Wayne County, North Carolina League:

> "Two years ago when black commissioners were appointed by the Wayne County Board of Elections, the Board of Elections supervisor would not provide them with adequate training. As they began to work, there were areas they did not understand. One commissioner, Mr. Williams, was repeatedly harassed by the supervisor..."

DILUTION OF THE MINORITY VOTE

Discriminatory attitudes and practices in the administration of voter registration, when combined with the use of election schemes that have the effect of diluting minority voting strength or that make it difficult for minorities to elect public officials who will represent their concerns, will inevitably result in decreased minority voting participation. For many minorities, registering to vote is not worth the effort when it does not result in increased minority representation or access to the political system. The converse is also true. For example, the Tupelo, Mississippi League of Women Voters attributes the increase in minority registration in their city to the change of the election system for the city Board of Aldermen from at-large elections to wards. According to the President of the Tupelo League:

> "Most of the blacks [in Tupelo] live in one section of the town, and with ward elections they can, and did, elect a black citizen to the Board."

Unfortunately, such voluntary changes in election procedures that result in increased minority representation and political participation are the exception rather than the rule. According to a report issued by the Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights Under Law,[3] thirteen counties in Mississippi have attempted to switch to at-large elections for members of the county boards of supervisors, and 22 counties have attempted to switch to at-large elections for county school board members with the purpose or effect of preventing the election of blacks. Efforts to implement these changes persisted as late as 1977, but were blocked by Section 5 and court challenges. Without the protections afforded by Section 5, many -- if not most -- of these switches to at-large voting would be in effect today.

STANDARDS OF PROOF

Even with Section 5, the only way for minorities -- or the Justice Department -- to challenge discriminatory practices that were in place before the Voting Rights Act was adopted is through case-by-case litigation. And in 1980, even this type of remedy was suddenly undermined by the Supreme Court's decision in City of Mobile v. Bolden, which contradicted precedents set in the early 1970's for proving voting discrimination. In order to preserve the ability of minorities to challenge long-standing as well as proposed voting changes under the Voting Rights Act, we support the provision in S 1992 that adds language to Section 2 of the law prohibiting practices that "result in the denial or abridgment of voting rights." It is hoped that this key change will firmly establish that both intent and effect are legitimate grounds for overturning old forms of discrimination as well as preventing new ones.

[3] Frank Parker, "Voting in Mississippi: A Right Still Denied." Lawyer's Committee for Civil Rights Under Law, April 1981.

I think that it is important to note that while voter turnout and voter registration rates for the nation have steadily declined, the South is the only region in the country that could boast of increased voter registration rates. This positive example must be nurtured and protected. However, lasting gains will not be achieved until the climate in this country is one that actively seeks to ensure full and equal minority political participation at all levels of government. At a time when many covered jurisdictions are still marked by racially polarized voting patterns, unequal and inconvenient registration opportunities, and persistent attempts by state and local officials to make discriminatory changes in voting and election procedures, there is little evidence that covered jurisdictions are ready to accept full minority political participation without the effective protections of the act's special provisions. Those that are ready, those who do not continue to discriminate, those who do remove barriers to voting and election participation, those who engage in outreach activities to make registration and voting more accessible to minority citizens will meet the criteria set forth in the bail-out section of S 1992. This section, we hope, will provide a strong incentive to many jurisdictions covered by Section 5 who wish to comply fully with the letter and the spirit of the Voting Rights Act.

BILINGUAL ELECTIONS

The League reaffirms its strong support for the 1975 expansion of the Voting Rights Act to protect the voting rights of Hispanic Americans and other language minorities. We believe that the bilingual election provisions have played an important role in increasing the voter participation and representation of language minorities. The best justification for extending these crucial protections for non-English speaking citizens can be found in the 1975 law itself:

> "The Congress finds that voting discrimination against citizens of language minorities is pervasive and national in scope. Such minority citizens are from environments in which the dominant language is other than English. In addition they have been denied equal educational opportunities by state and local governments, resulting in severe disabilities and continuing illiteracy in the English language. The Congress further finds that where state and local officials conduct elections only in English, language minority citizens are > excluded from participating in the electoral process. In many areas of the country, this exclusion is aggravated by acts of physical, economic and political intimidation. The Congress declares that, in order to enforce the guarantees of the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments to the U.S. Constitution, it is necessary to eliminate such discrimination by prohibiting English-only elections, and by prescribing other remedial devices."

We believe that repeal of the bilingual election provisions would effectively deny non-English speaking Americans any voice in the political decision-making process in their communities. Compliance with these provisions, however, has been half-hearted, and language minorities are often frustrated by some of the same discriminatory attitudes and practices that discourage minority registration in areas covered by the original trigger of the Voting Rights Act.

The Voting Rights Act has created a new climate of awareness among minority citizens in covered jurisdictions that has made them more conscious of their rights to participate fully in their communities' political decision-making process. It has made election officials wary of abridging that right. Many Leagues believe that their area's coverage under the act's special provisions has made public officials more accepting and sensitive to the needs of the minority community. Most of all, the Voting Rights Act has been of great symbolic importance to the nation as a statement of national commitment to the equal access of all to the ballot. The passage of S 1992, a strong, fair, widely endorsed bill, would be a signal to the nation that this commitment still stands.

I wish to again thank this subcommittee for this opportunity to present the views of our members on extension of the Voting Rights Act. I would hope that all of us in this room share a deep and abiding commitment to the preservation and protection of our constitutionally guaranteed right to vote. We look forward to working together with you to ensure that the process is meaningful for all American voters.

VOTING RIGHTS ACT

THURSDAY, JANUARY 28, 1982

U.S. SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE ON THE CONSTITUTION,
COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
Washington, D.C.

The subcommittee met, pursuant to notice, at 9:35 a.m., in room 2228, Dirksen Senate Office Building, Hon. Orrin G. Hatch (chairman of the subcommittee) presiding.

Present: Senators Thurmond, East, Grassley, Biden, and Kennedy.

Staff present: Stephen Markman, chief counsel; Claire Greif, clerk; Prof. Laurens Walker; and William Lucius, counsel.

OPENING STATEMENT OF HON. ORRIN G. HATCH, A U.S. SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF UTAH, AND CHAIRMAN, SUBCOMMITTEE ON THE CONSTITUTION

Senator HATCH. We will call this Senate subcommittee to order.

Ladies and gentlemen, this marks the second day of hearings by the Subcommittee on the Constitution on the Voting Rights Act. Today's hearings, as with the opening day of hearings yesterday, will attempt to define the major issues involved in the forthcoming Senate debate on the Voting Rights Act.

Again, we are fortunate to have with us an outstanding group of witnesses of varying perspectives on the voting rights debate.

As I indicated yesterday, I believe that there is no more important constitutional issue that will be addressed by this Congress than the section 2 issue in the Voting Rights Act.

By redefining the standard by which we define discrimination in the 15th amendment from the present intent standard to a never-before-utilized results standard, I believe that the House version of the Voting Rights Act is effecting a radical change in the traditional notions of representative government and federalism.

The House bill would establish within the Voting Rights Act, and effectively within the Constitution itself, an understanding of discrimination and civil rights that is at sharp odds with what the great majority of people in this country—black and white—understand to be discrimination and civil rights.

While there was sharp disagreement yesterday over the description of the new section 2 standard as a standard of proportional representation by race, I have yet to hear a credible alternative description.

We heard a great deal yesterday about the results test being necessary to promote equal access to the political process or opening up doors for minorities or ensuring equal participation in the electoral process or preventing vote dilution or establishing an effective vote for minorities. That is all fine rhetoric. These are all fine objectives. I agree with those objectives. But what do they all mean, in practice?

Indeed, the more I think about it, the more convinced that I am that the real distinction between the intent standard and the results standard is even greater than the issue of proportional representation.

The real issue is whether or not we're going to define civil rights in this country by a clear, determinable standard—through the rule of law, as it were—or by a standard that literally no one can articulate. And I see, if we watched the witnesses yesterday very carefully who were proponents, there was a great lack of articulation as to what this standard means and as to what it really amounts to.

Indeed, I cannot put it any better than Ben Hooks, the president of the NAACP, put it yesterday. Under the results test, he said, "You know discrimination when you see it." Indeed, that is precisely what it is all about.

The hard fact is that the results test has absolutely no coherent or understandable meaning beyond the concept of proportional representation, however much its proponents labor to muddy the waters with generalities and meaningless vagaries. There is absolutely no standard for evaluating evidence under the test, short of simplistic racial head counting.

The "you know it when you see it" theory of racial discrimination is unacceptable. It is unacceptable that such a standard be used to impose new forms of government upon municipalities across the country. It is unacceptable that such a standard be the basis by which Federal courts intrude constantly into the process of redistricting and reapportionment. And it is unacceptable that such a standard be the means by which the Justice Department and the judiciary analyze the policies and practices of State and local governments throughout this country.

Every time that I attempted to pursue an understanding of the results test yesterday and how it would work in practice, I was met with the response that the court would simply have to consider the totality of the circumstances or would have to weigh all the factors. That, again, is all very fine. That is also irrelevant.

The missing point is how do you evaluate the totality of the circumstances? How do you weigh all the factors? What is the question that the court asks itself in doing all this? What question, really, does the court ask itself?

Under the intent test, it considers all the circumstances and then asks itself, "Do these raise an inference of intent to discriminate?" What is the comparable question under the results test? I hope somebody is going to try to give us that answer. I'm going to be prepared to cross-examine the individual who tries to give us that answer, because I can tell you I don't see it.

What, again, does the court ask itself in looking at the evidence? I hope we can get an answer to that.

This may seem like a rather esoteric legalism to some people, but let me assure them, and let me assure all of you, that there are few more critical issues that will have to be considered by this Congress or by any other Congress. To adopt the effects test would be to transform beyond all recognition what the average person in this country has always understood racial discrimination and civil rights were all about.

To summarize, in conclusion, several observations about the intent standard, observations that I don't believe were refuted yesterday.

First, there is absolutely no requirement under the intent standard that there be a "smoking gun" or a confession of discrimination. Circumstantial and indirect evidence have always been considered admissible to raise an inference of intent, and nobody who understands the law would fail to assert that. You can try and cloud the issue, you can try and confuse the issue, but that's a fact. This point has been made explicit in case after case before the Supreme Court, including Mobile, Washington v. Davis, and Arlington Heights.

Second, it is not an impossible standard. Indeed, in at least two major voting rights cases decided by circuit courts since Mobile, the Escambia County and Lodge v. Buxton—cases, discriminatory intent was found to exist in the establishment of particular structures of municipal government. And any attorney worth his salt is going to be able to prove intent by indirect evidence, as well as direct evidence—by circumstantial evidence, if you want another term for indirect evidence.

Third, the intent standard is not a new standard. We are not returning to the status quo prior to Mobile by instituting a results standard. That was established as being unmitigated hogwash yesterday and certainly can claim no greater credibility today. While there may be an isolated lower court case that can be looked to in order to show use of an effects standard, this theory has never been accepted by the Supreme Court, nor, really, by anybody else, for that matter.

Going back to a series of 15th Amendment cases in the 1940's, the requirement that purposeful discrimination be proven has always been the constitutional standard. This in no way was changed—or indeed could have been changed—by the Voting Rights Act.

Finally, the intent standard imposed by Mobile is not somehow a unique or aberrational standard imposed in Voting Rights Act or 15th Amendment cases. The Equal Protection Clause of the 14th Amendment has always required purposeful discrimination and school desegregation cases have always required purposeful discrimination. There is no question about that, so for people to come in here and act like it's otherwise, like I say, is hogwash. It is a standard that can be satisfied and that, in fact, has been satisfied repeatedly in these contexts.

I welcome all of our witnesses today. I believe that yesterday's hearing—with its occasional displays of passion—shed a great deal of light on the section 2 issue and other important issues in the Voting Rights Act. I am confident that today's hearings will do the same, and I look forward to these hearings. This is the second in a series of, I believe, nine hearings on this particular issue.

We're really happy to have with us today the distinguished Senator from Mississippi and our colleague, Senator Cochran. And, Senator, we'll certainly look forward to hearing your testimony today, and we'll turn the time over to you.

Senator COCHRAN. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

Senator KENNEDY. Mr. Chairman, could I also join in welcoming Senator Cochran.

Senator HATCH. Oh, excuse me. I didn't see you sit down, Senator Kennedy. You certainly may.

Senator KENNEDY. I think both of us had the good opportunity to work with Senator Cochran on the Judiciary Committee, and he was extremely involved in many of these similar matters, and we very much appreciate having his comments and his suggestions in this committee.

Glad to have you, Senator.

Senator COCHRAN. Thank you very much, Senator Kennedy.

STATEMENT OF HON. THAD COCHRAN, A U.S. SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF MISSISSIPPI

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman, it's a real pleasure to be back in the Judiciary Committee hearing room, having been absent now for about a year on other committee assignments.

I want to say this morning that I present testimony in support of a proposal that I have made in the form of a bill that was introduced last year, focusing on the preclearance procedures under section 5 of the Voting Rights Act. My testimony this morning will be limited to an explanation of that proposal, and I ask, if it's permissible, Mr. Chairman, to simply submit my prepared statement, and then I intend to read some excerpts from that and enlarge upon some of the comments that are in the prepared statement.

Senator HATCH. Without objection, it will be placed in the record.

Let me make one other explanation. We went a rather lengthy hearing yesterday, because of it being the first day, but today we're going to limit witnesses to 10 minutes. We would appreciate your summarizing your testimony. All statements of the witnesses will be placed in the record as though fully delivered before the committee, and I will enforce that rule today.

We'll certainly have some leeway for Senators and Congressmen, if you feel that you need that, but all other witnesses, we're going to limit you to 10 minutes.

Senator KENNEDY. Well, does that mean the questioning of the witnesses?

Senator HATCH. No, but the questioning will be on a 10-minute rule also. I think that's the way we'll handle it.

Go ahead, Senator Cochran.

Senator KENNEDY. Do we know how much time was used yesterday by the different members of the committee in questioning?

Senator HATCH. Well, no, but I don't think anybody is going to be limited in time. It's just that we'll rotate on a 10-minute basis.

Senator KENNEDY. I see.

Senator HATCH. I don't have any problem with that. The questioning can take longer, but witnesses are going to testify for 10 minutes and then we'll put the full statement into the record.

Senator Cochran?

Senator COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of the amendment which I have proposed is to assure the nationwide protection of voters' rights by making available a preclearance procedure in every State. I'm urging adoption of this change so that the Government can act when it needs to to protect the right to vote and to full participation in the political process of every citizen in this country, not just those who live primarily in the South. Rather than weakening enforceability, this amendment would enlarge upon the Government's ability to protect the voting rights of citizens wherever they may live.

This proposal is S. 1761, and on six different occasions I've taken the Senate floor in an effort to explain the purpose and the practical impact this amendment would have. If it would be permissible, Mr. Chairman, I would like to have copies of those floor remarks attached as an addendum to my prepared statement in the record.

Senator HATCH. Without objection.

Senator COCHRAN. My amendment relates only to section 5. It creates a new procedure which is applicable in all States.

This idea, incidentally, wasn't developed by me but came from Judge William Keady, who is a U.S. district judge for the Northern District of Mississippi, and Prof. George Cochran, who is not a relative of mine, who is a professor at the University of Mississippi School of Law. They have prepared and had published an article entitled "Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act: A Time for Revision," which was recently published in the Kentucky Law Journal. Professor Cochran, incidentally, I think has been invited to testify before the committee to further explain this proposal.

Senator HATCH. That is correct.

Senator COCHRAN. This proposal, Mr. Chairman, would require political units to apply for a declaratory judgment in local Federal district court for the preclearance of any change in election or voting laws. The complaint would name the United States as the defendant, and process would be served upon the Attorney General. The relief sought would be identical to that now provided in section 5, and the burden of proof would still remain upon the submitting political unit.

Any person or group who would like to, may have their names placed in a registry with the court so they could receive notice of the complaint, and any person or group who would like to intervene would have a right within 60 days after notice of the action to participate in the proceeding, and the United States would have 60 days to answer. That's the time period now provided under the section 5 preclearance procedure that we have that permits the Department of Justice to respond, approve, or disapprove an application.

These actions would be given a priority setting by the court. Any decisions adverse to the United States or any interested party could be stayed upon notice of appeal, and there is a provision for an expedited appeal included to the court of appeals, so that there won't be any inordinate delay in getting a decision about the submission—whether or not a change in election laws would be permissible under the law.

I would like to stress, Mr. Chairman, this is a new proposal. It has not been previously considered by either the Senate or the other body. Now, there have been suggestions for nationwide application of the Voting Rights Act, but none of them have actually created a new procedure for preclearance, and this is the suggestion that's being made this morning to the subcommittee.

What distinguishes this proposal from those previous suggestions is that this vests jurisdiction in administering the procedure in the Federal district courts, but it wouldn't take away the responsibility that's now vested in the Department of Justice for review and in effect advising the court whether or not the Justice Department thinks the application should be granted or not, so their action would continue in pretty much the same fashion that it does now, except that we would have the extra dimension of Federal district court participation and nationwide application.

Mr. Chairman, I believe the proposal I've made will bring the Voting Rights Act into the 1980's. This is a workable, expeditious alternative to the administrative procedures now available under the act, which by necessity are restricted in their application to just several States and subdivisions of other States.

This plan would insure that all States would meet their responsibility to protect the right to vote, and I must say that in my judgment this right to vote and participate in the political process is a very fundamental right, and it ought to be fully protected, not just in some places but in every jurisdiction in the United States. Adoption of this change would guarantee a fuller degree of protection by the Federal Government.

I might say, Mr. Chairman, that in the hearings over on the House side, there was some discussion of this proposal. It was brought to the attention of the House Judiciary Committee by a young black attorney from my State, Wilbur Colom, who testified in support of it. I would like, in closing my remarks to the subcommittee, to quote part of his remarks.

> The enforcement procedures of the Voting Rights Act are not written on a sacred scroll. While the principles embodied in the act should be sacred to all of us, for it was through much suffering in my lifetime the gains were made, the mechanism for enforcement should be open for debate as Mississippi changes and as America changes. Innovative ideas on enforcement such as the Keady-Cochran proposal should be welcomed.

Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

Senator HATCH. Thank you, Senator Cochran.

[The prepared statement of Senator Cochran follows:]

PREPARED STATEMENT OF SENATOR THAD COCHRAN

Mr. Chairman and members of the subcommittee, I submit for your consideration a proposal to amend the Voting Rights Act of 1965. The purpose of this amendment is to assure the nationwide protection of voters' rights by making available a preclearance procedure in every state.

I am urging adoption of this change so the Government can act, when it needs to, to protect the right to vote of every citizen in this country, not just those who live primarily in the South. Rather than weakening enforceability, my amendment would enlarge upon the Government's ability to protect the voting rights of citizens wherever they may live.

I have introduced this proposal as S.1761 and have made six speeches on the Senate floor to indicate my firm interest in this idea and to explain the proposal. (Attached to my written statement are copies of my floor remarks for the record.)

My amendment relates only to section 5 of the Voting Rights Act. It creates a new preclearance procedure applicable to all fifty states. This idea has been carefully developed by William C. Keady, Chief Judge for the Northern District of Mississippi, and George C. Cochran, not a relative, who is on the faculty of the School of Law at the University of Mississippi. This suggestion of theirs is discussed in an article entitled "Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act: A Time for Revision," recently published in the Kentucky Law Journal, volume 69, No. 4, 1980-81. Professor Cochran has been invited to testify before this subcommittee at a later date about this proposal and his concerns about the Department of Justice preclearance procedures.

This proposal would require political units to apply for a declaratory judgment in local Federal district court for the preclearance of any change in election or voting laws. The complaint would name the United States as the defendant, and process would be served upon the Attorney General. The relief sought would be identical to that now provided in section 5, and the burden of proof would remain on the submitting political unit.

Appropriate notice would be given to all interested parties in two forms: publication in local newspapers for three consecutive weeks and actual service of the complaint upon interested persons or organizations who have placed their names in a registry with the court. Any person or group would be permitted to intervene as a matter of right within 60 days after notice of the action. The United States would also have 60 days to answer, the time period now permitted the Justice Department under the current administrative procedures for preclearance.

These declaratory judgment actions would be given a priority setting by the court, and decisions adverse to the United States or intervening parties would be automatically stayed upon notice of appeal. A provision for an expedited appeal has also been included.

I am convinced that our federal district courts will not be over burdened by the increased number of submissions for preclearance that this proposal requires. While statistics reveal a steady increase in submissions, there has also been a steady decrease over the years in the number of objections made by the Department. One can surmise that most submissions would be disposed of summarily by the court, with only a few requiring actual litigation.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to stress that this is a new proposal and has not been previously considered by either the Senate or the other body during previous discussions of the Voting Rights Act. What distinguishes this proposal from previous suggestions to extend application of the law nationwide is that this bill provides for a new preclearance procedure, vesting jurisdiction for administering that procedure in the federal district courts. At the same time, it does not take away from the Department of Justice the obligation and responsibility to review proposed changes in local election laws. Recognizing that there would be additional work required of the Department of Justice, this Senator has suggested the involvement of the federal courts so that submissions can be effectively and fairly handled.

Mr. Chairman, as you and your subcommittee are aware, electoral changes are now precleared by the Voting Section of the Department of Justice. But you may not be aware that this procedure is fraught with inadequacies. These have been documented in two reports, one by the General Accounting Office in 1978 entitled Voting Rights Act - Enforcement Needs Strengthening and the other, Compromise Compliance: Implementation of the Voting Rights Act by H. Ball, D. Krane, and T. Lauth.

As an example, the Department employs paraprofessionals to review the preclearance submissions and make the determination whether or not the proposed change has a discriminatory purpose or effect. These paraprofessionals possess little or no legal training, demographic or statistical skills.

A second example has been described as a "dual track system." This dual track system -- the first track consisting of a review of the submission by the paraprofessional and the second track consisting of discussions between the supervising attorney at the department and officials from the submitting jurisdiction -- leads to informal approval of the submission without local minority participation.

Other problems include decisions on submissions made without all the data as required by the federal regulations, review periods extending well beyond the 60 days permitted, and requests for information made on the 60th day as a tactic for further delay. What was envisioned as a system for prompt preclearance has become a quagmire of voluminous submissions requiring the evaluation of complex political, social, and legal data with personnel too limited in number and skills to adequately and properly do so. My proposal would employ the expertise of our Federal Judiciary in evaluating election changes for discriminatory purpose and effect.

Mr. Chairman, I believe the proposal I have made will bring the Voting Rights Act into the 1980's. It is a workable, expeditious alternative to the outdated administrative procedures available under the act that will maintain the Government's role in the protection of voting rights, and I urge this committee to review and consider it carefully. This plan will insure that all states meet their responsibility to protect the right to vote which is one of our most fundmental rights.

Wilbur Colom, a young, black attorney from my state of Mississippi addressed the House Judiciary subcommittee in support of this proposal when it held hearings on the Voting Rights Act last summer. Mr. Colom, who was active in the civil rights movement in the 1960's, supports the principles of the Voting Rights Act but is willing to consider ways to improve it. This view was reflected in his closing remarks to the subcommittee, to wit:

> The enforcement procedures of the Voting Rights Act are not written on a sacred scroll. While the principles embodied in the act should be sacred to all of us, for it was through much suffering in my lifetime the gains were made, the mechanism for enforcement should be open for debate as Mississippi changes and as America changes. Innovative ideas on enforcement such as the Keady/Cochran proposal should be welcomed.

Thank you.

Senate

S. 1761—VOTING RIGHTS AMENDMENTS OF 1981

Mr. COCHRAN. Madam President, today, I am introducing a bill to amend the Voting Rights Act of 1965. The purpose of this amendment is to assure the nationwide protection of voters' rights by making available a preclearance procedure in every State.

I am aware that an immediate reaction to an amendment offered by a white, Republican Senator from Mississippi to the Voting Rights Act may be that this is obviously an effort to dilute the effect of current law or to make it unenforceable or to somehow sabotage the Federal Government's role in protecting minority participation in elections. If that is the reaction of any of my colleagues, I want to assure them that they are wrong.

I am urging adoption of this change so the Government can act, when it needs to, to protect the right to vote of every citizen in this country, not just those who live primarily in the South. Rather than weakening enforceability, my amendment would enlarge upon the Government's ability to protect the voting rights of citizens wherever they may live.

My amendment relates only to section 5 of the act. It creates, in effect, a new preclearance procedure. I should point out that this is not an idea that has originated with me, but one that has been carefully developed by William C. Keady, a Federal district judge for the northern district of Mississippi, and George C. Cochran, not a relative, who is on the faculty of the School of Law at the University of Mississippi. This suggestion of theirs is discussed in an article entitled "Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act: A Time for Revision," which will be published soon in the Kentucky Law Journal, volume 69, No. 4, 1980–81.

The essence of the proposal would be to require political units to apply for a declaratory judgment in local Federal district court for the preclearance of any change in election or voting laws. The complaint would name the United States as the defendant, and process would be served upon the Attorney General. The relief sought would be identical to that now provided in section 5, and the burden of proof would remain on the submitting political unit.

Appropriate notice would be given to all interested parties in two forms: Publication in local newspapers for 3 consecutive weeks and actual service of the complaint upon interested persons or organizations who have placed their names in a registry with the court. Any person or group would be permitted to intervene as a matter of right within 60 days after notice of the action. The United States would also have 60 days to answer, the time period now permitted the Justice Department under the current administrative procedures for preclearance.

These declaratory judgment actions would be given a priority setting by the court, and decisions adverse to the United States or intervening parties would be automatically stayed upon notice of appeal. A provision for an expedited appeal has been included.

I am convinced that a majority in the Senate would not protest the nationwide application of a preclearance procedure to protect the voting rights of all citizens so long as there is in place a workable procedure for processing submissions. Plenary jurisdiction over voting rights cases is now vested only in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia. Historically, the justification for the investment of jurisdiction in this court was to insure the uniformity of interpretation.

Experience under current law, however, does not support this rationale. During the past 15 years, only 23 suits have been filed in that court, and only 10 opinions have been published, hardly a basis for the uniformity argument. Some may worry that the burden of submissions will be too great upon the court system. While statistics reveal a steady rate of increase in submissions, there has also been a steady decrease over the years in the number of objections made by the Department. Therefore, it is reasonable to assume most of the submissions can be disposed of summarily by the court, with only a few cases requiring actual litigation.

The 1980 statistics from the Justice Department indicate that of a total 7,340 submissions, only 51 objections were filed. If this is indicative of the changes that would be in dispute in the future, there would be only a minimal increase in caseload for the district courts. And assuming that voting law changes in the States not now covered by the preclearance requirements do not have as great a potential for discrimination, then one need not fear burdensome caseloads on that account either.

This new procedure, applying with equal force in every State, would make possible increased oversight by anyone interested in full minority participation in the political process. Also, the provisions for expedited appeal and automatic stay of the electoral change until approved by the appellate court would mean full protection against any adverse decision by what some may fear to be a "biased forum."

Finally, since there is no provision under the current administrative procedures to insure compliance with the preclearance requirement, it can be argued that the increased opportunity of minority voters to participate in the review of changes in the law, coupled with the familiarity of the court as the forum for resolving litigation with due process, would contribute to voluntary compliance by local political units.

I am submitting a workable, expeditious alternative to the outdated administrative procedures now available under the act that will maintain the Government's role in the protection of voting rights. This plan will insure that all States meet their responsibility to protect the right to vote which is one of our most fundamental rights.

VOTING RIGHTS AMENDMENTS OF 1981

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, last week, I introduced a bill, S. 1761, which would amend the Voting Rights Act which will be before this body for consideration within the next several months. The amendment that is suggested in the legislation I have introduced relates to section 5 of the act, the preclearance section. The amendment really creates a new preclearance procedure.

Today I am sending a letter to all Senate colleagues explaining in more detail than I will today how the new preclearance section would work if it is adopted by the Senate and pointing out some of the reasons why it is appropriate at this time to seek a revision in the Voting Rights Act and particularly the preclearance section to equip our Government to protect more fully the right to vote and the right of full participation in the political process.

There has been a suggestion by some that any effort to amend the Voting Rights Act would in fact be an effort to undermine it or to make it less enforceable, to sabotage it.

It should be noticed in reviewing the bill of this Senator, Mr. President, that never before has a new procedure, in effect, for clearing changes in local laws been incorporated in an amendment to make applicable in every State the present clearance requirement under the Voting Rights Act.

This is a new proposal. It has not been considered before by either body. And I am hoping that it will be carefully considered by the members of the Judiciary Committee and all Senators before an estimative decision is made to reject it because it is an effort to extend the application of this section nationwide.

The change that is suggested provides for a declaratory judgment proceeding in Federal district courts for review and clearance of election law changes at the local level.

What is different about this is that under current law the Department of Justice now has the sole responsibility for reviewing and approving such changes. This is undertaken in an office that has fewer than 20 paralegals and a handful of lawyers working to review changes in the nine States covered by this section of the act and portions of 14 other States.

Some may fear that the Federal court will not be an appropriate forum for the review of changes in local election laws. But I want to point out that the men and women who have served on the Federal bench in the last 30 years have played a very crucial role in developing the law in the area of civil rights and voting rights.

I would like to call attention particularly to a recently published book by Jack Bass entitled "Unlikely Heroes," in which he points out the dramatic changes in the law which have occurred as a result of decisions by Federal judges, particularly in the South, and in particular in the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals.

He talks about the development of civil rights and voting rights laws. As a matter of fact, conclusions and decisions of these judges, he says, formed the basis for the Voting Rights Act.

Administration officials who testified before congressional committees pointed to these decisions and conclusion in support of the request for enactment of the Voting Rights Act.

When compared with the very few persons who are assigned by the Department of Justice the job of reviewing changes in local laws, the Federal judiciary obviously is not only better equipped from a manpower standpoint but also from the standpoint of its experience in dealing with such questions and in making the decisions based on the law and with allegiance to due process.

At the heart of this proposal is the involvement of the Department of Justice in the clearance procedure. The Department of Justice will not be shut out from its interest in reviewing changes in local laws. As a matter of fact, whenever a change is proposed in a local election or voting law, process will be served upon the Attorney General under this procedure. Notice also will be given to the general public, through publication in local newspapers of the fact that such changes are proposed. Interested persons who want to be notified specifically about any changes in the election laws will have their names placed in a registry with the court, and process will be served on them as well.

So instead of limiting, as the present law does, review of election law changes just to those few people in the Department of Justice, this change that is being suggested will involve many more people—minority voters, those representing the interests of minority voters, the general public—in addition to the Department of Justice in the clearance process.

It is interesting to me, Mr. President, when we talk about nationwide application of a preclearance procedure, that those who throw up their hands in holy horror first are those who have been in the forefront of the civil rights effort and the effort to guarantee, through Federal law, that the right to vote and fully participate in the electoral process is guaranteed by a law with teeth in it so that these voting rights can be protected fully.

This is not an effort to make less enforceable voting rights in this country of ours, but it is an effort to make uniform throughout the country a workable, effective procedure which will enlarge upon the power of the Federal Government to review and approve changes in election laws.

That would be just. That would be fair.

I do not know why we even argue that the right to vote in Alabama or Georgia is more important than the right to vote in Pennsylvania, Illinois, or in the State of Washington, Mr. President. In my judgment, the right to vote and participate fully in the political process ought to be guaranteed by our Federal law to every citizen, no matter where he lives. It is not just a right that ought to be protected in just a portion of these United States.

The protection that this change would afford would make this Federal law like all other Federal laws: applicable to everyone, applicable to every State, to every precinct.

Some say, "Well, you would have to have so many more people involved. You would have to increase the funding of the Department of Justice. More staff would be needed in the Federal courts."

In 1980, over 7,000 submissions were filed with the Department of Justice asking for approval of changes in local election laws. Only about 50 objections were made to those changes by the Department of Justice. What this indicates, in my judgment, is that we are seeing more and more voluntary compliance by local political units with the letter and the spirit of the Voting Rights Act. This is encouraging. Those who say this would unduly burden our Federal court system, that we would have litigation in every courthouse across the country because of this change, I think are not looking at the fact that times are changing, and that is certainly an encouraging sign applauded by this Senator.

We do not want to turn the clock back, Mr. President, and go back to the devices that were used in some parts of the country to deny minority voters the right to vote and participate in the political process.

That is not the effort being made here. There are provisions in this law which are not touched by the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi which, in effect, abolish the poll tax and the other devices that were commonly used to deny full participation.

This is not an effort to do away with those changes. If my amendment is agreed to, those provisions of the law will remain in the law, and I support their remaining in the law.

It seems to me that if we have a Federal law making it illegal to evade the payment of lawfully due income taxes in one State, it ought to apply in another State. Income tax laws are very interesting in that we do not have enough Federal employees or agents to review the preparation and filing of individual income taxes by all of our citizens. But it is applicable nationwide, nonetheless. It is applicable throughout the country and applies with equal force and effect in every State.

If it is against the law to commit a crime of extortion in New York, it is likewise against the law to commit the crime of extortion in California.

If one gerrymanders a political boundary in New York to deprive full participation in the political process by minorities, that ought to be against the Federal law, and if it is done in the State of Washington for a like purpose it should be against the law. Whatever the size of the minority, it is still wrong, and the Federal law ought to say so. There ought to be some provision in the law, to make that principle enforceable.

Mr. President, you may say there is no such discrimination, no activity like that at all in some of our States.

Well, what is the objection to providing that it is illegal to do it? What is wrong with having a procedure that will permit review of such changes, and, if there is any alleged discrimination, it can be brought to the attention of the court in an expedited proceeding? It would not be a long, drawnout case but one that is limited so that a decision is made within 60 days after the application for a declaratory judgment is filed. The Department of Justice has 60 days under the law now to review and approve changes in local election laws. What we are finding out, though, is that in some cases that time period drags out much longer.

In Jackson, Miss., for instance, a change was made in the boundaries of the city. There was an annexation of some areas near the city, to include them within the city limits. An application was made 5 years ago, Mr. President, for approval of that change under the Voting Rights Act and section 5 provisions on preclearance.

Just 2 months ago the Department of Justice finally said that annexation did not have the effect of depriving minority voters of the right to participate fully in the political process, and, in effect, the Department approved the change.

In the meantime, two city elections have been held, both under the cloud of failure of the Department of Justice to approve the annexation.

Those in the annexed areas did not know whether their votes would be counted in the election or not. The Department of Justice, at one time, sent out word that they would not be counted, then changed its mind. The point I am making by referring to that isolated incident is that if there had been in place a preclearance procedure such as that suggested in the amendment that this Senator is offering, a decision based on the law and the facts would have been made expeditiously. If someone might be aggrieved because of an adverse decision made by a local Federal judge, an expedited appeal to the court of appeals is provided in the bill so that there will not be any interminable delay, any long, drawn-out proceeding. A decision can be obtained promptly.

Mr. President, I hope that Members will review this proposal for change and not just conclude summarily that it is not workable, that it is an effort to turn the clock back or sabotage the Voting Rights Act, none of which it is.

It is an effort to improve the procedure under the act for review of changes in local election laws, to make applicable nationwide a uniform procedure, to give greater notice, to involve more participation on the part of minority voters in the preclearance process and to provide also that the Department of Justice continue to have an important role in the preclearance procedure.

Jurisdiction of these cases now is vested only in the District Court for the District of Columbia. There have been only 23 cases presented to that court in the last 15 years; only 10 written decisions have been rendered, indicating that this is not a forum that is being sought out for taking up any of the questions that are arising out of the Voting Rights Act.

Mr. President, it is my intention from time to time to come to the floor and discuss further this proposed change and the reasons for presenting it to the Senate. I look forward to the hearings that are going to be scheduled by the Senate Committee on the Judiciary and I plan to present these suggestions to that committee at that time as well.

Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Senate

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 6, 1981

(Legislative day of Monday, November 2, 1981)

The Senate met at 9:30 a.m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the President pro tempore (Mr. THURMOND).

PRAYER

The Chaplain, the Reverend Richard C. Halverson, LL.D., D.D., offered the following prayer:

Gracious Father in Heaven, in this large Senate family where, so often, issues of great magnitude affect the destiny of millions, help us not to overlook the dedication of those who devote themselves to the minutiae and the mundane without which major matters would not be resolved. We recognize with gratitude the faithful service of office staffs, the efficient, tireless work of those in the cloakrooms, the Secretary of the Senate, the Sergeant at Arms and their staffs, the floormen, the doorkeepers and the pages. We thank Thee for all of the devoted services in the buildings and on the grounds; the maintenance people, the elevator operators, the police, and those who keep the place beautiful.

Help us never to take for granted loving, faithful support so essential to the effective work of the powerful, influential national leaders who occupy this Chamber. We thank Thee for the men and women of the press and pray that their dedicated efforts will accurately and adequately inform the people. And dear Lord, we pray for the families of all those we have mentioned. May Thy peace and love keep them safe and meet all their needs. We pray this in the name of the greatest of all friends. Amen.

RECOGNITION OF THE ACTING MAJORITY LEADER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The acting majority leader is recognized.

THE JOURNAL

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Journal of the proceedings of the Senate be approved to date.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, under a previous order, I understand that there will be a period of time not to exceed 30 minutes for routine morning business. As part of the time allotted to the leader this morning, I wish to proceed at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator may proceed.

PRECLEARANCE PROCEDURE UNDER THE VOTING RIGHTS ACT

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, I wish to call attention to legislation that was introduced 2 weeks ago relating to the Voting Rights Act of 1965. Last week and the week before as well, I described the legislation that was being introduced which would, in effect, create a new preclearance procedure under the Voting Rights Act. As Members realize, section 5 of the existing law provides for a procedure for approval of changes in local election laws submitted to the Department of Justice. Although the law specifies that a decision must be made within 60 days, experience has shown that, often, the period of time drags out much longer than that, and some local political subdivisions have waited up to 5 years or more before a decision has been made by the Department in response to a request for approval of a local change in election laws.

Mr. President, this legislation is designed to create a new procedure whereby local political subdivisions will submit proposed changes to the Federal district court. There will be provided an expedited procedure for consideration based on the rules for declaratory judgment. Under this procedure, all interested persons will be given notice. The Department of Justice will be served with process, and the same office that now exists for the review of changes will continue to exist to review the changes considered in this court proceeding. Another important difference is that whereas the existing section 5 preclearance requirements apply now only to a few States and parts of a few others, this new procedure would be applied with equal force and effect throughout the Nation in every jurisdiction.

I know that the reaction of some, as I have said before, will be that this may be an effort to undermine the act, to make it more difficult to enforce, and to impose a greater burden on the Department of Justice and our court system. I wish to point out that this is a proposal that has been carefully developed by a law professor and a Federal judge who have written an article that is being published in the Kentucky Law Review relating to the necessity for having a law for the 1980's and not one that relates to the problems and difficulties of the 1960's.

To indicate that this proposal has support from representatives in the minority community in the South, I call attention to the fact that during the hearings in the other body, before the Committee on the Judiciary, Wilbur Colom, who is a black lawyer from Columbus, Mississippi, active in the civil rights movement, active also in voter registration efforts, and a leading young Republican in the State of Mississippi, testified and gave a report on this new procedure.

At this point, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that his entire statement to the Judiciary Committee in the House be printed following my remarks in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered. (See exhibit 1.)

Mr. COCHRAN. I refer to some of the statements that Mr. Colom made. He points out that while there are some who advocate no change in the Voting Rights Act, particularly no change in the section 5 preclearance requirement, he says that the maintenance of a preclearance procedure is necessary to the two-party system and necessary for the protection of fundamental rights. Then he says:

> While we must acknowledge that voter intimidation, barriers to registration and even ballot box stuffing, the tools of the past, to a large extent, have disappeared, there still remains white block voting, subtle maneuvers to dilute black voting strength and blatant efforts to negate black electoral gains. Mississippi has changed. There is greater equality. Those who say they have seen no discrimination against blacks in Mississippi must be blind. Those who say that any change in the Voting Rights Act will turn back the clock of racial equality refuse to acknowledge the progress our State has made. Of course, we still have far to go.

He goes on and suggests that the Kendy-Cochran proposal, as he refers to it in his remarks, should be carefully considered and approved by the Congress.

Mr. President, I hope that Members of the Senate will review this suggestion and look at it not in terms of an effort to turn the clock back, to go back to the days of poll tax and other devices that were designed to prevent or undermine the full participation in the political process by minority citizens, but as an effort to move into the eighties with a modern enforcement procedure which would be based upon due process, an enforcement of the law that would prohibit any effort to deny voting rights in any place in this country. My suggestion, Mr. President, is that if it is important to protect with the full force of a preclearance procedure the voting rights in the State of Alabama, then who can argue that it is not important enough to have a procedure for protecting those rights in the State of Michigan or in the State of Illinois? If it is against the law to commit a crime in Pennsylvania, it is against the law to commit it in California. That is our Federal system. Federal laws apply nationwide. This act can be given full force and effect nationwide under this new procedure.

Some say, well, they have heard about that in the House; they rejected it overwhelmingly. Nobody has really had this proposal before them, Mr. President. It is a new procedure and I hope the Senate will review it carefully during the hearings on the Voting Rights Act that will be undertaken, as I understand it, early next year by the Senate Judiciary Committee.

EXHIBIT 1

STATEMENT OF WILBUR O. COLOM

Mr. Chairman and Members of the Committee:

My name is Wilbur O. Colom. You have my resume before you and I will omit any reference to my background other than to point out that I was born and spent my entire life in Mississippi, except for a period of 10 years when I was away in school.

This is a most difficult presentation for me to make; not because of any doubt regarding the merits of the Keady/Cochran proposal, but because I find myself isolated from men and women who have been heroic figures in my life, some even my personal friends. Aaron Henry, Charles Evers and many others who testified before you have been persons who have fought critical battles that gave me the right to vote, gave me the opportunity to be a member of President Reagan's transition staff. They were out front when bombs were the greatest tool of the opponents of equal opportunity. But I, too, was active in the civil rights movement in the mid-60's and I, too, recall the gross inequalities.

Add my voice to theirs in saying that the voting rights act must be extended.

As an active Republican, I can say without hesitation that the voting rights act and section 5 of the act are essential to the maintenance of the two party system and necessary for the protection of fundamental rights. Indeed, my right and that of my child to participate in the electoral process is at stake.

While we must acknowledge that voter intimidation, barriers to registration and even ballot box stuffing, the tools of the past, to a large extent, have disappeared. There still remains white block voting, subtle maneuvers to dilute black voting strength and blatant efforts to negate black electoral gains.

Mississippi has changed. There is greater equality. Those who say they have seen no discrimination against blacks in Mississippi must be blind. Those who say that any change in the Voting Rights Act will turn back the clock of racial equality refuse to acknowledge the progress our State has made.

Of course, we still have far to go. Resistance is not so much among the populace as it is among the political forces now in power, for they correctly see that the influx of blacks into the electoral process will offer the potential for new coalitions and new political alignments that may not allow their continued political domination.

Nothing has done more to foster the development of the two party system in Mississippi than the Voting Rights Act. Now we find two parties competing for two large voting groups, with both parties being fundamentally strengthened in the process. It is critical to the Republican party in the State of Mississippi that the rights of black voters be protected in the broadest of terms. To do otherwise would invite a return to the one party dixiecrat days.

Now, to the specifics of the Keady/Cochran proposal. William Keady is the chief judge for the United States District Court for the Northern District of Mississippi. George Cochran is a professor of law at the University of Mississippi Law Center. Their proposal is outlined in their forthcoming article in the Kentucky Law Journal entitled "Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act: A Time for Revision." The Keady/Cochran article relies on, among other things, one document with which I am sure you are familiar, the GAO report on the voting rights section of the Justice Department and a book entitled "Compromise Compliance." Both lead to some unavoidable conclusions which serve as the empirical foundation for the Keady/Cochran proposal.

First, there is an extremely high submission rate by covered jurisdictions of proposed change, and this submission rate has an incapacitating effect on quality review by the voting rights sections. Second, there are real and justifiable suspicions that administrative preclearance has neglected those interests it was designed to serve. 1980 statistics show that of 7,840 submissions, only 61 objections were interposed. The chaotic and hurried review given by the Civil Rights Division tend to bear out the conclusion that effective full enforcement is not now and cannot be achieved in the Department of Justice now or in the future. Third, the Supreme Court in Morris v. Gressett held that there is no judicial review of a departmental decision not to object to a submission.

Such an unreviewable power is foreign to our process and has a potential for abuse. I prefer to vest the responsibility of protecting my rights to participate in the electoral process in the hands of a southern Federal judge, subject to the expedited review of the Fifth Circuit, than to vest that authority in the hands of a political appointee whose position may be based upon his or her role in a campaign, rather than his or her dedication to the law.

Finally, in 1975, Assistant Attorney General Pottinger stated that a mechanism would be in place which would insure that covered jurisdiction comply with the preclearance requirement. Recently, he acknowledged, after six years, that no such mechanism has been put in place. It is abundantly clear that no such technique is available in the Department.

It is mandatory, considering the foregoing, that this committee explore alternatives which will cure the existing deficiencies of administrative preclearance and would extend the protection currently offered by section 5 to all minorities of the United States, no matter where they may be located.

It is in this context that I now strongly urge that you support the Keady/Cochran proposal as found in the forthcoming article in the Kentucky Law Review and, if I am correct, a draft copy of which has been distributed to each member of the committee.

In its broadest outline, their conclusion is that section 5 should be given nationwide application and that the political unit be required to bring a declaratory judgment in a local United States district court for proposed electoral alterations. The amended statute would contain the same requirements as now, with the United States being named the defendant. On filing, appropriate notice would be required to inform interested parties.

It would take two forms. First, publication in local newspapers for three consecutive weeks. Second, actual service of the complaint upon interested persons or organizations which have their names placed in a "permanent registry" maintained in the office of the district court clerk.

In light of the current inability of minorities to have definitive input to the preclearance process as well as the previously stated inability to secure judicial review of a decision not to object, this portion of the Keady Cochran proposal is critical.

The statutory right of intervention by individuals would, among other things, make irrelevant a departmental decision not to object. If the department fails to object and intervention does not occur, an uncontested judgment would then be entered.

The problem with an unusually biased judge would be cured by this provision for an automatic stay coupled with an expedited appeal procedure. I recently had an expedited appeal to the fifth circuit and we were at oral argument, all briefing completed, sixty days after notice of appeal was filed. Moreover, the availability of a statutory right for mandamus would assure that these actions would be heard expeditiously.

The bottom line is that the voting rights act can and should be strengthened to assure effective enforcement. This proposal achieves that goal while at the same time allowing for nationwide application and ending an inefficient administrative procedure. In a candid moment, my friends from Mississippi, many who have testified before you, will admit that the justice department is doing less than a grand job of enforcing the provisions of section 5 of the voting rights act.

They will acknowledge that it is difficult to find fault with the Keady/Cochran proposal. Yet, they fear that any tinkering with the act will result in it being gutted with republican amendments. I hope and I pray that the present administration and my fellow republicans will prove them wrong.

The enforcement procedures of the voting rights act are not written on a sacred scroll. While the principles embodied in the act should be sacred to all of us; for it was through much suffering in my lifetime the gains were made, the mechanism for enforcement should be open for debate as Mississippi changes and as America changes. Innovative ideas on enforcement such as the Keady/Cochran proposal should be welcomed.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, I know of no other request for leader time on this side of the aisle. I yield to the distinguished Senator from Michigan.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR COCHRAN

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order, the Senator from Mississippi (Mr. COCHRAN) is recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes.

THE VOTING RIGHTS ACT

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, 3 weeks ago I introduced S. 1761 to amend the Voting Rights Act of 1965 to establish a new preclearance procedure applicable to all 50 States.

Each week since then I have obtained time to discuss some of the provisions and ramifications of this proposal in hopes that Senators would review this suggestion carefully and be advised about the intent and motivation behind it.

It has been stressed that this is a new proposal and has not been previously considered by either the Senate or the other body during previous discussions of the Voting Rights Act.

What distinguishes this proposal from previous suggestions for change to extend application of the law nationwide is that this bill provides for a new procedure for preclearance and vests jurisdiction for administering that procedure in the Federal district courts.

At the same time it does not take away from the Department of Justice the obligation and responsibility to review proposed changes in local election laws. As a matter of fact, the procedure that is incorporated in this bill would require that process be served upon the Attorney General. The political unit, upon proposing to make a local change in an election law, would file an application in the Federal district court for a declaratory judgment. Not only would the Attorney General be made a party to this proceeding but any interested person or group through a representative would as a matter of right be able to intervene and participate in the preclearance procedure.

Sixty days would be provided to the Attorney General within which to consider and review the proposed change and to interpose in the Federal district court any objection to clearance of that change that it might have.

This is similar to the procedure that is now provided whereby the Department is given the sole responsibility for reviewing such changes and within 60 days making a decision to approve or disapprove the change.

Also included in the bill is a provision for expedited handling of these election law changes. If any party is aggrieved at the decision that is reached by the district court, an expedited appeal can be had to the court of appeals.

Some may say upon hearing about this suggestion that this is not anything that we have not considered before. Back in 1975 when this body was debating the Voting Rights Act there was an amendment offered by my State colleague Senator STENNIS that would extend the provisions of the voting rights law nationwide. But there was no provision in that amendment for a new procedure for handling preclearance. It simply presumed that the Department of Justice would be able to handle the increased volume of requests that would necessarily follow from approval of that amendment.

Recognizing that there would be additional work required of the Department and more personnel might be needed, this Senator has suggested that not only should we involve the Department of Justice but also all of the Federal district courts around the land so that we will be sure that whatever workload increase might result could be effectively and fairly handled so that the voting rights, the right of full participation in the political processes of this country, could be effectively protected.

Another difference in the proposal that I am making and the one I have referred to that was considered in 1975 is that there was an effort to repeal section 4 of the Voting Rights Act along with extending application nationwide. Section 4 of the act suspended the use of literacy tests. I am not in favor of going back to a situation where literacy tests or other devices are used to deprive certain citizens of voting rights in many cases simply because they were a minority or in a politically disadvantaged situation.

That section also in addition to suspending literacy tests prescribed a test by which it would be determined which political units and which States would come under the section 5 preclearance requirements. That test was in effect: First, if there was a literacy test in use and, second, if less than 50 percent of the eligible voter population was not registered or did not vote in previous elections.

My amendment does not tamper with the present section 4 provisions of the Voting Rights Act which now not only suspend literacy tests but on a permanent basis do away with them and also extend coverage to jurisdictions with language minorities.

The bill that I am introducing relates only to section 5, the preclearance section, and extends the preclearance requirement to those States not already covered under the act.

There was another provision in the amendment offered by Senator STENNIS in 1975 which included authority for the Attorney General to establish criteria by which any State or political subdivision might be exempted from the provisions of section 5 and section 6.

There is nothing in the bill offered by this Senator which would provide any exemption whatsoever for any State or any political subdivision.

My proposal would amend section 5 to require all States and all political units to preclear election changes on a permanent basis.

There were some suggestions, Senators may recall, in the other body when the Voting Rights Act was up for consideration several weeks ago for change in the preclearance section. Congressman BUTLER of Virginia offered an amendment that would have vested in district courts jurisdiction to hear applications for a bailout. That was a nationwide change in that his suggestion was that the preclearance procedure should apply nationwide but there be given a right on the part of political units to petition the courts for a bailout. Again, that suggestion differs from the one now before the Senate in that this Senator is not suggesting that any such bailout provision is appropriate.

Another amendment was offered by Congressman HARTNETT. His suggestion was that before the House of Representatives and was rejected along with the Butler amendment attempted to extend nationwide the application of the preclearance requirements, but like the amendment that was before the Senate in 1975, it did not provide any new procedure for reviewing the numerous submissions from the 50 States nor did it suggest any willingness to provide additional appropriations or personnel for the Department of Justice to handle the increased volume of submissions that could be expected from nationwide extension of the law.

Again, then, I am attempting to demonstrate by these references to earlier amendments that neither the Senate nor the House of Representatives has ever fully considered the suggestion that is incorporated in S. 1761.

S. 1761, Mr. President, is clearly an effort to insure that the right of every citizen in every State to vote, to participate fully in the electoral processes of this land, is protected. A procedure for preclearance in Federal courts which have the capability, the expertise, the experience to make fair and just determinations under the rules of due process is suggested by this amendment.

It is my hope that the Senate Judiciary Committee during its hearings will consider this suggestion and, of course, I hope it is found to be a reasonable and workable improvement in the law, not an effort to undermine enforceability, not an effort to lessen the commitment that the Government has, and should have, to protect the voting rights of citizens in this great country of ours.

I noticed in reviewing some of the debate on the bill back in 1975 that Senator Abraham Ribicoff, whom everybody remembers as a champion of civil rights and on the frontlines of many of the early civil rights battles, said this:

> If we are going to solve the dissension in this country, one of the places to start is to make sure there is uniformity in the application of national laws in the 50 States.

This bill is consistent with the hope and challenge laid before this body by Senator Ribicoff. This bill will achieve uniformity under the Voting Rights Act for all 50 States, for all political units in the country, and insure that it does not matter whether a minority voter lives in Illinois or New York or California or Alabama. This right to fully participate in the political processes will be protected by a law that is fair and workable.

But some say, "Well, there is no evidence that there is discrimination, that there are any efforts to prevent that kind of full participation in some of these areas."

Well, if there is not then what is the objection to submitting to the Federal court for an expedited review of election law changes? If there is no discrimination the proceeding will be a summary proceeding. The court will review it. If no objection is made, nobody feels aggrieved by that change, and if it has no effect of depriving anyone of the right of full participation, then the court will approve that change. That is not such an onerous burden. It is a small price to pay, Mr. President, for uniformity in the law, making this law like every other Federal law.

If it is a crime to commit arson in the State of New York, it is likewise a crime to commit arson in the State of Texas Cite me, if anyone can, any other Federal law that singles out specific political units in this great country of ours and says, "You are under these requirements, these obligations, but all other political units are exempted." I think it should be the goal and the effort of this body, when it goes about formulating our Federal laws, to make sure that they are applied fairly, evenhandedly, and with the same force and effect in one jurisdiction as they are in any other.

Our income tax laws apply evenly and fairly throughout every State and every county of this country even though we do not have a Federal Treasury large enough to pay for enough agents to review individually every income tax return that is filed in this country. But we have before us now a procedure for enforcement of the important provisions of the Voting Rights Act, Mr. President, which can be enacted by this body when it reviews the Voting Rights Act later this year or early next year.

I am hoping that Members will review this suggestion for change and improvement and agree with the Senator that it is time to have a law for the 1980's and not just a law that related to the problems of the 1960's.

I yield back the remainder of my time.

THE VOTING RIGHTS ACT

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, once again, I come before this body to discuss S. 1761, legislation I have introduced to amend the Voting Rights Act of 1965. My bill provides a new preclearance procedure whereby a political subdivision would petition the local Federal district court for a declaratory judgment in order to preclear electoral changes. I have proposed that this procedure be applicable to all 50 States so that the voting rights of all citizens will be protected.

As my colleagues are aware, electoral changes are now precleared by the Voting Section of the Department of Justice. But many of you may not be aware of the mechanics of this procedure or of the many inadequacies with which it is fraught.

Historically, Congress intended that electoral change proposals would be precleared through the Federal District Court for the District of Columbia, which would issue a declaratory judgment if the change were not discriminatory in its purpose or effect. The administrative procedure was added, really as an afterthought, to provide a prompt process for preclearing simple electoral changes. No one anticipated that the administrative procedure would become the main avenue for preclearance. Little attention was given to delineating which changes should be submitted to the court and which to the Department or to the problems that would develop.

In 1977, the General Accounting Office conducted a study of the Voting Section and the preclearance procedure. Its findings were published in its report, "Voting Rights Act—Enforcement Needs Strengthening," in 1978. Additional analysis of the departmental procedure is contained in "Compromise Compliance: Implementation of the Voting Rights Act" by H. Ball, D. Krane, and T. Lauth. I am aware of no more recent or extensive study of the administrative procedure than these.

The Voting Section of the Department of Justice is composed of two units—the Submission and the Litigative Staff—which employed, at the time of the GAO study, 14 attorneys, 13 paraprofessionals, and 2 staff assistants. The Submission Unit, which is the unit responsible for the review of electoral change submissions, consists of one attorney, a paraprofessional director, and 11 paraprofessional positions filled with law students, college graduates qualified for GS 5–10 level jobs, and others. These paraprofessionals, possessing little or no legal training nor demographic or statistical skills, review the preclearance submissions and make the determination whether or not the proposed change has a discriminatory purpose or effect.

The paraprofessional is trained to spot such troublesome changes as at-large elections, redistricting, and changes in the location of polls. Often his investigation is accomplished by telephone calls to onsite persons. Additional information is gathered from minority groups or individuals. The determination by the paraprofessional is then reviewed by the supervising staff.

This procedure of review and determination by paraprofessionals prompted Justice Powell to state:

> No senior officer in the Justice Department—much less the Attorney General—could make a thoughtful, personal judgment on an average of twenty-five preclearance petitions per day. Thus, important decisions made on a democratic basis . . . are finally judged by unidentifiable employees of a federal bureaucracy, usually without anything resembling an evidentiary hearing. (446 U.S. 205 n. 17).

The procedure has also been described by Prof. Howard Ball as a "dual track" process. The first track consists of the review of the submissions and a determination by the paraprofessional, who consults interested persons and minority groups for information concerning the submission. The second track consists of the discussions between the supervising attorney and officials from the submitting jurisdiction. Local attorneys contact the Department of Justice prior to formal submission, which leads to informal approval without local minority participation.

Other problems in the procedure have been identified by the General Accounting Office. In its review, the GAO found that decisions on submissions were being made by the Department without all the data required by the Federal regulations.

Fifty-nine percent of the 271 submission files reviewed did not contain the required data. The GAO also reported that some submission files could not be located and that data inaccuracies limited the use of the Department's computer system.

The GAO was critical of the Department's procedures for soliciting the views of interest groups and individuals. The review of submission files revealed that only 55 percent contained comments by interested groups or persons and only 1 percent of those commenting were advised of the review decision. Interviews with black leaders indicated that 35 percent had no knowledge of the Department's preclearance procedures, 90 percent were not on the mailing list, and 80 percent had rarely or never been consulted by Department personnel.

The GAO cited the Department's difficulty in complying with the 60-day review period as another deficiency and recommended that procedures be developed to insure the prompt review of submissions. The GAO based its recommendations on its finding that, in 6.8 percent of the submissions reviewed, a department decision was not rendered until at least 100 days from the initial receipt of the submission. The GAO further found that over 50 percent of the requests for additional information were made on the 60th days after receipt. A request for additional information tolls the 60-day period. Upon receipt of the requested information, the 60-day period begins to run anew. Over 70 percent of the requests for additional information were made at least 55 days after receipt, and only 2 percent were made within 30 days.

Finally, the GAO was critical of the Department's failure to develop formal procedures for identifying jurisdictions not submitting voting changes, informing jurisdictions of their responsibilites to preclear, and determining whether jurisdictions are implementing election laws over the Department's objection.

Mr. President, certainly these problems and deficiencies in the administrative preclearance procedure that I have just cited justify the consideration by this body of an alternative mechanism for insuring the voting rights of our citizens. Complex legal determinations are being "processed" by paraprofessionals who lack legal or other special skills and many times, the factual data required by the regulations. Files have been lost and computer data is inaccurate. Minority participation is minimal and a "dual track" system seems to limit further the opportunity for minority groups or persons to have input into the preclearance procedure. Review of submissions extends well beyond the 60-day period permitted, and requests for information have become a tactic for further delay.

Mr. President, what was envisioned as a system for prompt preclearance of simple submissions has become a quagmire of voluminous submissions requiring the collection and evaluation of complex political, social, and legal data with personnel too limited in number and skills to adequately and properly do so. But additional personnel alone, I submit, cannot resolve the problems of administrative preclearance.

What is required is the expertise of our Federal court system, and I propose that we utilize it. My proposal would provide an expedited procedure in Federal district court for the review of preclearance submissions.

Federal judges, experienced in the review and evaluation of complex issues, would determine whether or not a proposed electoral change has a discriminatory purpose or effect. The Department of Justice, served with process as the defendant in the declaratory judgment action, would still have 60 days to review the submission and interpose an objection, or make a request for additional information. Interested persons or groups would be notified of the submission and permitted to intervene as a matter of right. While many of these provisions are the same as the current administrative practice, the difference is that they will be supervised by the court.

Mr. President, I urge my fellow Senators to give careful consideration to my proposal. If the Judiciary Committee holds hearings, I hope the Members will undertake a review of the current administrative procedures and the new procedure that I have offered.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR COCHRAN

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ANDREWS). Under the previous order, the Senator from Mississippi (Mr. COCHRAN) is recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes.

THE VOTING RIGHTS ACT

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, I have been addressing this body for several weeks now about legislation I have introduced, S. 1761, to amend the Voting Rights Act of 1965.

The purpose of this amendment is to assure the nationwide protection of voters' rights by making available a preclearance procedure in every State. Political subdivisions would be required to apply for a declaratory judgment in local Federal district court for the preclearance of any change in election or voting laws. The United States would be the named defendant, and process would be served upon the Attorney General. The Department of Justice would have the normal 60-day period to answer and interpose an objection if it believes the change is discriminatory. All interested persons or groups would be notified of the action. The bill also provides for an expedited proceeding, including a priority setting in district court and an automatic stay on appeal.

At the time I introduced this bill, I pointed out that the proposal was developed by William C. Keady, chief judge for the Northern District of Mississippi, and George C. Cochran, who is on the faculty of the School of Law at the University of Mississippi, in an article to be published soon in the Kentucky Law Journal, Volume 69, No. 4, 1980-81.

Mr. President, the Keady/Cochran article, entitled "Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act: A Time for Revision," provides an extensive historical background of the development of the act and, in particular, section 5. It discusses the operation and impact of section 5, well-documented with statistical data. Finally, it develops the new preclearance proposal, introduced now as S. 1761.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that excerpts from this article, with footnotes and exhibits being omitted, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SECTION 5 OF THE VOTING RIGHTS ACT:
A TIME FOR REVISION
(By William Colbert Keady)

The Voting Rights Act of 1965 represents significant legislation which, notwithstanding certain limitations, has given life to the fifteenth amendment. Experience under the Act, and in particular Section 5, shows that despite the assault upon our federalism, affected jurisdictions have not suffered from its enactment but have in fact been strengthened politically on account of greater electoral participation on the part of minority voters. Furthermore, there is every reason to believe that the beneficial effects of this legislation would insure to the advantage of all jurisdictions to which it would be applied. The time has come to lay aside arguments concerning which region of our country has the worst record of excluding minorities from the political process. The Republic, given its historical pursuit of equality, can have no greater source of strength in the future than that deriving from the nationwide eradication of discrimination in matters of franchise.

The purpose of this article is not to laud the Voting Rights Act as ingeniously conceived legislation for preventing disenfranchisement of minorities; nor is it to condemn Congress for enacting and maintaining this regional legislation based in large measure upon findings made in 1966. It is also not the authors' intent to ecome ensnared in the ongoing dialogue concerning matters such as substantive interpretations given Section 5 by the courts and the Attorney General. Furtherome, it is not the authors' wish that this discussion have the taint of past efforts which utilized the rhetoric of "nationwide application" as a vehicle to rid Section 5 of its vitality. Rather, we believe there is much to be learned from the past sixteen years and that this experience, if correctly evaluated, clearly justifies the continuance of Section 5's preclearance requirement, a requirement, however, which should be administered by the judicial system created under Article III of our Constitution.

Thus, this article is designed to proffer two explicit propositions: (1) Congress should amend Section 5 to provide for nationwide application; and (2) Section 5's procedural mechanisms should be revised to discard both a seldom used judicial remedy and a cumbersome administrative procedure and to replace them with a judicial remedy in the United States District Courts under conditions guaranteeing expeditious resolution of Section 5 preclearance requirements.

I. THE OPERATION AND IMPACT OF SECTION 5

As originally enacted Section 5 prohibited certain states and their political subdivisions from enacting or seeking to administer "any voting qualification or prerequisite to voting, or standard, practice, or procedure with respect to voting different from that in force or effect on November 1, 1964" without advance federal approval. The Act was amended in 1970 to extend to political units which maintained a "test or device" with respect to voting and in which less than fifty percent of the eligible voting population registered or voted in the 1968 election. In 1975, the Act was further broadened to include jurisdictions with more than five percent language minorities which, as of November 1, 1972, had election materials printed in English only and in which less than fifty percent of the voting age population registered and voted in the 1972 presidential election.

With a legislative history indicating that the term "procedure" was considered "to be all-inclusive of any kind of practice" relating to voting, the United States Supreme Court has, beginning with Allen v. State Board of Elections in 1969, given the Section broad and wide-ranging scope. Since the Act was designed to preclude "the subtle, as well as the obvious, state regulations which have the effect of denying citizens their right to vote because of their race," Section 5 scrutiny is triggered if the change or modification has "a potential for discrimination." Thus, the purpose for enacting a change in voting is irrelevant to a determination of whether the state or subdivision must comply with Section 5 and federal preclearance must be had even if the legislation or other change was enacted for the purpose of complying with the Act. Section 5 preclearance must be met whether the change is one in polling places, candidate qualifications, boundary alterations, reapportionment, redistricting, annexations, changes from ward to at-large elections, alterations in procedures for casting write-in ballots, or even with respect to a requirement that public employees take unpaid leaves of absence when campaigning for elective office Indeed, there would seem to be few state actions which relate to the electoral process that would not be subject to the proscriptions of Section 5.

Pursuant to Section 5, voting changes are not given effect until the political unit in question receives a declaratory judgment in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia "that such qualification, prerequisite, standard, practice, or procedure does not have the purpose and will not have the effect of denying or abridging the right to vote on account of race or color." Alternatively, the state or political subdivision may submit the proposed change to the Attorney General and enforce the new voting practice if no objection to the proposal is entered within sixty days after submission. If neither action is taken prior to implementation, private parties or the Attorney General may bring suit before a local three-judge district court to enjoin enforcement. In the latter instance, the sole issue to be addressed is whether the enactment is subject to Section 5, the district court is not empowered to determine whether the change has a discriminatory purpose or effect.

The Act itself, in conjunction with a Section 5 preclearance requirement which is both "unusual, and in some respects . . . severe," has produced startling results in the jurisdictions to which it applies. An analysis of black voter registration in the six states covered by Section 6 since its inception reveals . . . dramatic increases. . . .

* * * * *

1978 data shows that the South fares not significantly worse, and in some instances better, than any area of the nation with regard to the difference between black and white voter registration. . . .

* * * * *

Furthermore, preliminary information concerning 1980 registration indicates that while 8 4 percent fewer blacks than whites registered throughout the entire country, the registration difference was only 6 9 percent in the South.

The extent of black voting strength is perhaps best reflected in the numbers of black elected officials within the jurisdictions subject to Section 5. From 1974 to 1980, there was an increase of 63 5 percent in the number of black elected officials nationwide. In four of the six states that have been covered by Section 5 since 1965, however, the increases were much higher.

Indeed, in 1980, Mississippi had the highest number of such officials of all states in the nation, and Louisiana was second. If the analysis is directed toward per capita black elected officials, I e., ratio of black elected officials to black population, it is significant that three of the six affected states rank among the nation's ten highest in this regard. Finally, the positive impact of Section 5 is perhaps best demonstrated by the startling fact that "a majority of white [congressional] representatives from the American South supported" extension of the Voting Rights Act in 1975.

The preclearance mechanism has undoubtedly served to effectuate the right of minority voters to participate in the electoral process by identifying and preventing both obvious and subtle attempts to prevent electoral participation solely on the basis of race Moreover if preclearance were eliminated, it is probable that local and state governments would reinstate voting procedures which would irreparably harm black citizens and other minorities by impinging, directly or indirectly, upon their right of suffrage The manner in which preclearance is currently implemented, however, should be cause for concern The requirement should and must be extended to the remainder of the United States. In addition to retaining this requirement which has proved so effective in a limited portion of our country, such action would serve to insure that the proscription of disenfranchisement provided by the fifteenth amendment becomes a reality for minority voters nationwide.

II. PRECLEARANCE IN THE DISTRICT COURT FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA: DESIRE FOR UNIFORMITY AND MISTRUST OF SOUTHERN JURISTS

The principal rationale offered for the original decision in 1965 to limit jurisdiction of Section 5 declaratory judgment actions to a three-judge district court in the District of Columbia was to insure uniformity of interpretation. Although not a single suit had been filed in the court seeking a declaratory judgment concerning the purpose or effect of a voting change, the uniformity justification was again relied upon five years later when Section 5 was renewed as originally enacted. Congressional critics, however, began to emphasize the weak underpinnings of the rationale. Senator Ervin, for example, unsuccessfully seeking to divest the court of plenary jurisdiction by means of amendment, argued:

There were many specious reasons given at the time of passage of this bill for denying all courts jurisdiction except the District Court of the District of Columbia. One was that we needed uniform interpretation. That was a specious reason, because we have 10 separate and district U.S courts of appeals sitting in the 10 circuits handing down, in some cases, different interpretations of the law and those interpretations are ultimately made uniform by appeals to the Supreme Court of the United States.

By the end of 1976 only five suits had been filed, resulting in three publishde opinions. Despite meager judicial activity, proponents for retention of the District of Columbia court as the only viable judicial avenue for preclearance maintained that "the United States District Court for the District of Columbia [is an] expert in the area, ha[s] developed familiarity with the impact of discriminatory voting systems," and "has built up a degree of expertise on the Voting Rights Act that is invaluable." The response of legislators to suggestions that Section 5 jurisdiction be expanded to all United States District Courts because of minimal utilization of the District of Columbia forum, however, revealed an assumption implicit in the Act as expressed by Senator Tunney of California:

"I might say, in all honesty . . . I think that in the area of civil rights there is a great deal of peer pressure on judges in the South. . . . I think there is a lot of peer pressure, and I would only hare to point to the fact that recently the Supreme Court unanimously reversed a three-judge court in Mississippi that had approved a reapportionment measure . . . ."

The response by Senator Morgan of North Carolina to Senator Tunney's implicit attack upon the competence and integrity of Southern jurists was direct and emotional:

"For the Senator from California . . . to stand here and say that the judges—to indict the Federal judiciary in the South, is beyond my imagination.

"And for the Senator to say that just because the Supreme Court reversed a decision of a three-judge panel in Mississippi is an indictment of the Federal judiciary in the South which, again is beyond my comprehension, and I resent it . . . I resent it."

During the House debates, Representative Kindness introduced an amendment to divest the District of Columbia court of sole jurisdiction. His argument that there was "no particular expertise built up" by that court was successfully countered by responses citing the "need for uniformity" and remarks making reference to the Supreme Court reversal of the three-judge court in Mississippi. There was, however, yet another justification proffered which, until that time, remained undisclosed. As articulated by a major advocate of retaining Section 5 without amendment,

"[T]he Department of Justice desires to centralize all litigation about this matter right here in the District of Columbia. . . . The Department of Justice in this and other areas of national importance feels that they should build up a body of jurisprudence right in the District of Columbia and it is they, more than the civil rights group, that really want to locate this here, rather than the regional aspects."

An examination of the relevant statistical data evinces the speciousness of this explanation and those that preceded it. During the years 1975 through 1980, only eighteen suits for declaratory relief were initiated, resulting in seven published opinions. Thus, after fifteen years of experience with the Act, only twenty-three suits have been filed, ten of which resulted in published opinions It is therefore apparent that the quest for "uniformity" has never been realized, and the resulting "expertise" justification with respect to adjudicating "purpose or effect" transgressions can only be considered a myth.

More important, the pattern established by covered jurisdictions of avoidings the District of Columbia court during this sixteen-year period demonstrates that there is not, in fact, a functional judicial remedy for those situations where these jurisdictions have either refused or been unable to submit to the preclearance process of the Department of Justice. Such factors as time, distance, expense and other logistical burdens, or a notion of the futility of invoking such a judicial remedy may, collectively or individually, compel affected jurisdictions to refrain from utilizingg an isolated segment of the judicial system. Practically speaking, therefore, judicial review is not presently a feasible alternative. Consequently, the legislative processes of over 7,000 political subdivisions are now subject to the virtually unreviewable decision-making process within the Office of the Attorney General of the United States. As we shall see, the history and current status of this administrative process demonstrates the compelling need for its elimination.

III ADMINISTRATIVE PRECLEARANCE: THE BIRTH AND EVOLUTION OF A CONGRESSIONAL AFTERTHOUGHT

As originally proposed, preclearance was to be limited to declaratory relief before a three-judge court in the District of Columbia In the wake of hearings before a House Subcommittee, however, several legislators expressed concern over the probability of delays if this procedure were to be the sole avenue of relief for jurisdictions subject to Section 5. Since validly enacted laws would be suspended pending declaratory relief, the consensus of opinion was that if such "drastic effects must be visited" on covered states, "resolution of this class of cases should be handled expeditiously [sic]."

Testifying before the Senate Judiciary Committee, Attorney General Katzenbach recognized the tensions which result from state laws being held in such a lengthy state of suspended preclearance and preferred a remedy in the following dialogue:

"Senator ERVIN. It seems to me that is a drastic power which can hardly be reconciled with the federal system of government. . . ."

"Attorney General KATZENBACH. I think it is quite a strong power, Senator. The effort is to prevent this constant slowing down process which occurs when States enact new laws that may clearly be in violation of the 15th amendment, but you have to go through the process of getting judicial determinations of that. It takes a long time in the interval the purposes of the act are frustrated. . . .

"Now, there may be better ways of accomplishing this I do not know if there are. There are some here I can imagine, a good many provisions of State law, that could be changed that would not in any way abridge or deny the right; . . . except for the fact that some members of the committee, I think, including yourself, have had difficulty with giving the Attorney General discretion on some of these things—perhaps this could be improved by applying it only to those laws which the Attorney General takes exception to within a given period of time. Perhaps that would remove some of the burdens."

Attorney General Katzenbach's suggestion of vesting the Attorney General with such discretion apparently impressed Congress for the committee bill incorporated the 60-day administrative preclearance provision which—without further debate on the issue—became a permanent and the most important segment of the Voting Rights Act. Its inclusion may be best described as an "afterthought, . . . a practical way to avoid the onerous task of preparing and filing a lawsuit in the District of Columbia." It soon became apparent, however, that such administrative preclearance was fraught with difficulties which were not and could not have been anticipated in 1965.

The 1970 congressional renewal hearings provided a forum for discussion of problems encountered during the first five years of the Section's operation. The major criticisms centered around administrative burdens resulting from the unexpected number of submissions to the Department of Justice and the potentiality that political considerations might enter into the Department's decision-making process. With regard to the former, Assistant Attorney General David Norman, one of Section 5's original drafters, expressed doubts as to the "effectiveness" of administrative preclearance because of the Attorney General's inability to apply purpose or effect criteria to current submissions, ever-increasing demands on limited personnel to make extensive, independent investigations of all submissions, and the deluge of inconsequential changes submitted pursuant to the expansive interpretation accorded the Act in Allen.

Prior to the Supreme Court's broad interpretation of Section 5 set forth in Allen, neither the Department of Justice nor the affected jurisdictions were certain of the requirements of the Section. The immediate impact of the ruling was therefore significant. In 1968, the year prior to the decision, there were only 110 submissions for preclearance to the Department; for 1970 that number had more than doubled to 255.

Ostensibly as a response to these administrative burdens, Attorney General Mitchell presented a Nixon Administration bill to amend Section 5 to abrogate preclearance, both administrative and judicial, and vest the Department of Justice with sole power to invoke the jurisdiction of local three-judge courts nationwide when there was "reason to believe" that a "standard, practice or procedure with respect to voting . . . has the purpose or effect of denying or abridging the right to vote" on the basis of race. Mitchell stressed the inefficiencies of administrative preclearance and contended that the Department not only was encountering difficulties in making informed judgments with respect to discriminatory effects but was also unable at that time, to monitor and secure submission of all changes.

Furthermore the Attorney General argued that the need for conducting extensive investigations prior to making a determination hindered the Department in its effort to perform the tasks required of it under Section 5. Thus, Mitchell's testimony can be perceived as an attempt to establish two points: (1) the impropriety of vesting what is essentially a judicial function in an administrative body not accompanied by procedural or due process safeguards; and (2) the idea that no sensitive lawmaker "would . . . have [designed Section 5] as it [is] structured, because . . . the process provided under which the Attorney General must make a decision are not adequate. They result in arbitrary decisions without sufficient information."

Congress found Mitchell's contentions unpersuasive, perhaps in large measure on account of suspicions of legislators that considerations of a purely political nature served as motivation for the Administration's proposal. The tenor of the Nixon Administration and its perceived hesitancy to enforce vigorously the Voting Rights Act served to bring to mind views expressed in 1965 in opposition to the Act:

"[W]e view with much concern the broad discretionary powers placed in the hands of the Attorney General. . . . Without suggesting any criticism of the present incumbent, we foresee a multitude of opportunities for political manipulation by an Attorney General who is inclined to do so. This is especially true since in recent times several Attorneys General, Republican and Democrat, have been closely tied to the political campaigns prior to their taking office. Of all the grants of authority to the Attorney General . . . including the ability to consent to the entry of declaratory judgments . . ." it does not require a great deal of imagination to see that the authority to approve or disapprove State laws stands out as the power most subject to abuse."

Such concerns surfaced in the disapproval of the Department's handling of Section 5 one year later when the House Civil Rights Oversight Subcommittee held hearings in response to complaints that "the Attorney General has failed . . . to carry out the intent of Congress, and has disregarded recent Supreme Court decisions protecting the right of all Americans to exercise their right to vote." At the outset, fears of political manipulation were voiced in light of the fact that no suits had been filed with the District of Columbia court, and it appeared more than possible to Subcommittee members that covered jurisdictions had reason to believe they would receive more "sympathetic consideration" from the Attorney General David Norman, who one year earlier expressed concern as to Section 5's effectiveness, was again the Administration's chief spokesman.

Norman countered the legislators' suspicions by explaining that any maladministration resulted from the increased burdens upon the Department arising from the broad construction of Section 5 mandated by Allen and the fact that many submissions raised complex issues dealing with "reapportionment, redistricting and . . . annexation[s]" which would "best be treated in the courts." Responding to the latter point, Congressman Wiggins recalled that administrative preclearance "was intended to permit an expeditious, prompt response on behalf of a State submitting a relatively minor problems and thus avoid unnecessary court delays" while it was "contemplated that complicated issues . . . would be resolved in the District Court for the District of Columbia." Conceding that Wiggins' understanding "might have been discussed around the halls of Congress," Norman noted that "Congress didn't authorize the Attorney General to decide that this thing is tough and, therefore, it ought to go into court."

As a solution to the problem he noted that the Department was considering proposing an amendment to Section 5 providing for an initial clearance of submissions before hearing examiners with judicial review in a court of appeals under procedures authorized by the Administrative Procedure Act. Subsequently, however, a representative of the Civil Rights Commission expressed his disapproval of this proposal on the ground that it would "create a very time-consuming, very dragged-out administrative procedures."

At the close of the hearings, the House Subcommittee could arrive at only one solution—to force political subdivisions to engage in the "onerous task of preparing and filing a lawsuit in the District of Columbia." This proposal mirrored that of the Director of the Civil Rights Commission, who suggested that "when questions [of preclearance] get that complicated . . . the Attorney General should just interpose an objection and allow the [covered] jurisdiction to go to court in the District of Columbia and resolve it in [that court]."

Such an approach, however, presented the Subcommittee with a dilemma inasmuch as this procedure could be conducive to even greater delay and therefore contrary to the Act's purpose. This problem was resolved by the determination that the burden should be placed upon the submitting authority since "[c]overed jurisdictions [are] supposed to avail themselves of the faster route to preclearance only when the submitted changes [are] readily assessable as nondiscriminatory." Finally, the Report concluded that the Attorney General had failed to implement properly the preclearance procedure and that complaints of the Act's unenforceability would subside if the burden of proof were placed squarely on the shoulders of the submitting jurisdiction. The Attorney General's regulation placing the burden of proof upon affected jurisdictions utilizing the administrative preclearance procedure, as in declaratory judgment suits in the District of Columbia court, was subsequently upheld by the Supreme Court in Georgia v. United States —

* * * * *

Concern with the efficacy of administrative preclearance outlined above remain viable today. An examination of data from the past six years reveals a steady increase in the rate of submissions accompanied by a constant decrease in the percentage of objections.

* * * * *

Indeed, the deluge of submissions provoked the following analysis by Justice Powell:

"[N]o senior officer in the Justice Department—much less the Attorney General—could make a thoughtful, personal judgment on an average of twenty-five preclearance petitions per day. Thus, important decisions made on a democratic basis . . . are finally judged by unidentifiable employees of a federal bureaucracy, usually without anything resembling an evidentiary hearing."

As noted earlier, the limited judicial review afforded covered jurisdictions has resulted in a restricted utilization of that alternative. Furthermore, administrative review of Section 5 submissions often takes place in the face of approaching elections whose occurrence is contingent upon the Department's determination. These realities combine to render crucially important the decisions made by these "unidentifiable emplorers" of the Justice Department. This process is equally critical to the interests of minorities in light of the plenary authority afforded the Attorney General's decision. Under the Supreme Court's decision in Morris v. Gressette the decision of the Department is not subject to review. With respect to a decision not to object to a proposed electoral adjustment, "it matters not whether the Attorney General fails to object because he misunderstands his legal duty . . .; because he loves the submission; or because he seeks to subvert the Voting Rights Act" for, under all circumstances, the decision is unreviewable.

With the Department's decision-making process now virtually immune from judicial intervention, it is critical that the procedures employed by the Department in performing the preclearance function be closely evaluated. As a congressional "afterthought", this delegation of authority is practically without legislative history. It is nonetheless indisputable that present administrative practices are markedly divergent from those which could have been reasonably foreseen by Congress in 1965.

The Department has adopted the same standards for review as those employed by the District of Columbia District Court in declaratory judgment actions. As such, the administrative preclearance procedure now requires review of the multitude of political, social, economic and legal criteria employed by that court to determine whether the purpose/effect standard has been met. To amass pertinent information and evaluate its content, the Department maintains within its Voting Rights Section a "submission unit" which has primary responsibility for the preclearance process. This unit consists of one attorney, a paraprofessional director and eleven paraprofessionals, sometimes referred to as paralegal analysts, and is instructed to look for "suspicious type changes" which include "at-large elections, reductions in the number of polling places, changes in the location of polling places and redistricting." Among the staff's responsibilities is investigation of motive and impact, which in turn is largely accomplished by "telephone calls to on-site persons." Information independent of the submission is gathered from minority interest groups and other interested individuals within the submitting jurisdiction, and in turn assimilated in a decision-making process relying upon "the preparation and analysis of . . . demographic and legal information [which] is in the hands of paraprofessionals who possess neither demographic/statistical skills nor legal training." Thereafter, the paralegal assistants make the "initial (and normally upheld) determinations with respect to whether or not the proposed change has a discriminatory purpose or effect."

A recent review of the submission unit's performance by the Government Accounting Office (GAO) revealed that "59 percent of [sampled] changes . . . did not have all data required by Federal regulations." In addition, the inefficiency of the unit was found inasmuch as "some submission files could not be located and data inaccuracies . . . limited the use of the Department's computer system which maintains data on identified changes." Indeed, a GAO representative testified that staff members "have no way of managing the data they get in from the jurisdictions; who reported—who gave their objections, who submitted submissions, who made changes that they didn't submit."

Utilization of a "permanent registry" (a compilation of individuals and groups interested in submissions) and other techniques for obtaining relevant information from minority groups was likewise found inadequate. After noting that a review of 271 randomly selected submissions showed that only fifty-five percent contained comments by interested groups or persons, the Report commented upon the followup with respect to those groups or persons: "[T]he Department's [own] records showed that individuals or groups commenting were informed of the review decision in less than 1 percent of the cases sampled.

"Consequently, minority groups and individuals may not have adequate information to detect changes implemented despite the Department's objections." Similarly, responses from a sampling of minority interest groups as to their impressions of the effectiveness of Section 5 revealed the following: thirty-five percent had no knowledge of Department preclearance procedures; ninety percent were not on the mailing list, and over half were unaware of its existence; twenty-five percent knew of significant changes that had not been submitted; and eighty percent had rarely or never been consulted by Department representatives. Indeed, "[t]his sense of removal from the decision process was reinforced by the minority respondents' belief that [Department] approval of changes opposed by minority leaders was a more important problem than a covered jurisdiction's failure to submit.

Given the fact that an immense number of submissions are received by the Department and must be reviewed by a small number of personnel within only sixty days, each passing day becomes critical. Although in Georgia v. United States the Supreme Court agreed with the Department's argument that the 60-day period may be tolled by a request for additional information, the process has been described as "hectic, with letters usually being mailed at the last possible moment," and the request for additional information is often reserved as the Department's "trump card." The GAO Report made corroborative findings as follows:

"[I]n about 6.8 percent of the submissions reviewed, a Department decision was not rendered until at least 100 days from the initial receipt of the submission.

"Despite [the requirement that submissions be handled expeditiously] over 50 percent of . . . requests [for additional information] were made on the 60th day after receipt of the initial submissions, over 70 percent were made at least 55 days after receipt, and only 2 percent within 30 days.

"In over 50 percent of the cases reviewed, the Department did not notify jurisdictions of its decision until at least 56 days after it had complete information. Notification was given within 30 days for fewer than one out of every six changes."

In addition to the GAO Report, several reported decisions confirm the fact that the Department has encountered difficulties in complying with the time limitation. Not only have objections been imposed on the last day, but the Department has found it necessary to argue, unsuccessfully, that Georgia allows tolling periods for more than one request for additional information.

Although it has expended a great deal of professional energy in other areas, the Department remains plagued by the continuing serious problem of covered jurisdictions failing to preclear all voting changes. The GAO Report's conclusion on this issue is unmistakably clear:

"The Voting Rights Act has been in effect for over 12 years, yet there is little assurance that covered States and localities are complying with the act's preclearance provision. We found that the Department of Justice had limited formal procedures for determining that voting changes were submitted for review as required by the act or for determining whether jurisdictions implemented changes over the Department's objection."

The Report also reveals that the Federal Bureau of Investigation "identified 102 unsubmitted changes [on behalf of the Department] of which 60 were still unsubmitted as of October 1976. Moreover, although "[the] Attorney General objected to 257 of the reported 18,433 submissions . . . the Department has not initiated formal monitoring procedures for making sure that jurisdictions do not implement a voting change over the Department's objection." A study paralleling that of the GAO indicates that perhaps the GAO Report even understates the problem. Continuing activity in the lower courts dealing with unsubmitted changes and a compilation by former Texas Representative Barbara Jordon listing sixty counties and 170 Texas cities which have never submitted a change evince the fact that the problem of unprecleared changes is a significant one.

There is also a growing sense of frustration by those who perceive that the required adversarial and investigatory nature of the Department is becoming increasingly debilitated by "professional" relationships established between Department attorneys and local officials. Those who take this point of view perceive a negotiating process between "fraternal profesionals" which, while conducive to Section 5 compliance, results in enforcement at a "suboptimal level." The problems posed by this relationship are indicated in this discussion of the process:

"[T]he almost unanimous selection by covered jurisdictions of the administrative procedure option . . . when they seek to comply with the preclearance requirement is indicative of their preference for the kinds of outcomes which are obtainable through the lawyer-bureaucrat bargaining process. These enforcement practices when coupled with the inability of the Department of Justice to detect many of the unsubmitted voting changes, or to follow up effectively to make certain that jurisdictions do not implement changes to which the Department had [sic] objected, suggest an enforcement pattern in which state and local governments retain a considerable amount of discretion over the manner in which they exercise their reserved power to conduct elections."

The Civil Rights Commission lends credence to this conclusion when it states that while it is "evident that minorities still need the protection of the Voting Rights Act," the unfortunate "lack of enforcement by the executive branch of Government" remains a problem.

The nationwide aspects of voter discrimination have also affected the Department's activities in the last five years. Responding to a portion of the critique by the GAO as to the manner in which it utilizes its professional resources, the Department pointed out that since "Section 5 does not reach all jurisdictions . . ., litigation is required to challenge many dilutive apportionment plans." It noted that four constitutional dilution suits had been filed since 1976, that sixteen were under "serious investigation" and that a study had been completed of "40 northern and western states to uncover dilution problems." As a result, an investigation of "three northern cities" was soon to be undertaken.

IV. THE PROPOSAL

The most salient conclusions to be derived from the foregoing examination are easily summarized. First, the present avenue of judicial preclearance is totally inadequate. Second, the administrative preclearance alternative has sufficiently served the interests of neither covered jurisdictions nor minority citizens. Third, both methodological weaknesses and political vulnerabilities of the administrative remedy render the decisions of the Attorney General highly suspect from the viewpoint of covered jurisdictions and minority citizens alike. Fourth, as statistics have shown, an ever-increasing rate of submissions for preclearance can be expected in the future. This burden will remain insurmountable if the Department continues in its role as the only viable avenue for preclearance, a state of affairs incompatible with the expeditious, considered treatment envisioned by the formulators of the remedy. Fifth, the problem of unsubmitted changes continues unabated and the Department appears unable to devise a monitoring mechanism capable of assuring compliance with the Act. Finally, the question whether covered jurisdictions implement electoral changes despite objection from the Attorney General remains unanswered.

The Department was surely correct when, in responding to the GAO Report, it argued that too much was being expected from the Voting Rights Section and that the Act, as presently structured, "relies to a considerable extent on voluntary action by the covered jurisdictions" as well as "private lawsuits [for] effective enforcement." Indeed, such conclusions merely restate in another form a critique made by a staff attorney nearly a decade ago who, after reviewing the judicial construction given Section 5, concluded that "the Attorney General [was] playing a role in [its] enforcement . . . far beyond that originally envisioned."

Despite the serious flaws evident in this procedure, however, they in no way detract from the fundamental proposition that the social benefits generated by the preclearance requirement clearly outweigh its present inadequacies. Indeed, the mere presence of preclearance has a deterring effect on public officials who, but for its existence, would be far less concerned with avoiding discriminatory actions resulting in impediments to the effective utilization of the franchise by minorities.

It is the authors' proposal that, with the exclusion of states or political subdivisions having a de minimis percentage of minorities, Section 5 be amended to provide for nationwide application and that political units be required to bring a declaratory judgment action in local United States District Courts for preclearance of electoral alterations. The amended statute would provide that any state or political subdivision desiring to implement a voting change having a "potential for discrimination," be required, prior to such implementation, to file a complaint naming the United States as a defendant in the United States District Court for the judicial district in which the submitting jurisdiction is located. The relief sought would be identical to that currently found in Section 5 proceedings, namely, a declaration that the proposed change does not "have the purpose and will not have the effect of denying the right to vote on the basis of race or color." The burden of proof would continue to fall upon the submitting political unit.

Upon filing the complaint, appropriate notice would be required to inform interested parties other than the United States that the political unit is proposing a change within the scope of Section 5. This notice should take two forms: first, publication in local newspapers for three consecutive weeks; and second, actual service of the complaint upon interested persons or organizations who could have their names placed in a "permanent registry" to be kept in the office of each district court clerk. Any person residing within the political subdivision or any organization existing therein desiring to object to the proposed voting change would be allowed to intervene as a matter of right within sixty days after publication or receipt of the complaint.

Appended to the complaint should be that information now required by regulation issued by the Attorney General. The United States would be allowed sixty days to answer, with a tolling of the period occurring after one request for additional information. This tolling period would also apply to private parties, and any supplemental information provided to the Department would be served on those persons or organizations receiving the complaint. If the United States fails to answer, and if no person or organization intervenes within the specified period, the court would enter an uncontested judgment allowing the jurisdiction to implement the proposed change. The rendering of such judgment would not, however, preclude subsequent constitutional challenges. Obviously, the judgment could be set aside as provided in Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 60(b), in which event the action would be calendared for trial as though the allegations of the complaint had been controverted in the first instance.

Preclearance actions would be given a priority setting in the district court, with a statutory right of mandamus available to insure promptness, e.g., sixty days after the Section 5 issue is joined. Decisions adverse to the United States or intervening parties should be automatically stayed upon filing notice of appeal, with an expedited appeal granted as a matter of right. Expedited appeals should also be granted to submitting jurisdictions desiring review of adverse Section 5 decisions.

Moreover, if the defense should include constitutional counterclaims, the Section 5 portion would be separated from other issues which may be reserved for later determination. In any case, resolution of the Section 5 issue would be appealable by the aggrieved party on an expedited basis as an interlocutory order. Where the appellant or appellants are private parties, a cost-free transcript would be provided. Appellate courts should handle Section 5 appeals on a priority identical to that currently afforded criminal cases.

The authors are convinced that the proposal and suggested guidelines for its implementation would facilitate more expeditious and thoughtful resolution of the questions surrounding Section 5 changes in voting matters. In the first place, it is likely that many petitions filed under the revised procedure, absent any objection, can be disposed of summarily. In such cases, federal preclearance would be expeditously obtained, with the political unit free to implement the voting change upon reasonable notice to the public. The proposed amendments would also allow a local district court to determine all statutory and constitutional issues in one lawsuit, something that is now forbidden by Section 5. Moreover, if the latest Department of Justice compilations are empirically sound (51 objections out of 7,340 submissions in 1980), the minimal increase in caseload for the federal judicial system which this proposal would bring about is surely a small price to pay for a procedure which insures more meaningful participation by affected minorities in the electoral process.

Resolution of Section 5 conflicts would be further expedited under this proposal since the burdens heretofore placed upon the Department will be shared with those most affected by the Act, namely, minority voters. Given the broad provision for intervention of outside parties, the protection of minority interests will no longer hinge upon determinations made by "unidentifiable employees" within the office of the Attorney General. Moreover, with the United States retained as a defendant, the expertise and experience of those attorneys in the Voting Rights Section can be employed where they are most needed: in complex matters such as annexations, reapportionment and redistricting which "account for over two-thirds of . . . Section 5 objections." Finally, the provision of an automatic stay coupled with the right to an expedited appeal renders any decision adverse to the United States or intervening minority parties by a "biased forum" totally meaningless since no change can be implemented until it receives appellate approval.

An award of attorneys' fees is also critical to effective implementation of the proposal. Since "Congress depends heavily upon private citizens to enforce the fundamental rights involved," the 1975 amendments included an incentive for private parties to bring meritorious actions by allowing a court to assess a reasonable attorney's fee in such actions. This provision derives from the recognition that "[f]ee awards are a necessary means of enabling private citizens to vindicate these Federal rights." The Committee studying the proposed amendments found that "fee awards are essential if the Constitutional requirements and federal statutes . . . are to be enforced. We find that the effects of such fee awards are ancillary and incident to securing compliance with these laws, and that fee awards are an integral part of the remedies necessary to obtain such compliance."

As the Second Circuit noted:

"Attorneys' fees are awarded to recompense those who by helping to protect basic rights are thought to have served the public interest. A principal purpose of the legislation is to encourage people to seek judicial redress of unlawful discrimination.

"In short, imposition of full attorneys' fees is a useful and needed tool of the court to fully protect plaintiffs' rights as American citizens and voters. . . ."

It must be noted, however, that the attorneys' fees provision is a two-edged sword inasmuch as fees may be imposed against a private party, or his attorney, if intervention is found to be "frivolous, vexatious or brought or maintained for harassment purposes." The attorney fee provision therefore operates to make certain that frivolous litigation will be minimal while at the same time encouraging the initiation by private parties of well-founded claims of discriminatory disenfranchisement.

Finally, this proposal contemplates that the problem of noncompliance with the Act be addressed in traditionally equitable terms, thus forcing political units to realize that such failures to obey the law inevitably pose threats of dire consequences both to the political unit and its citizens. Furthermore, it would seem that this problem will diminish because of two considerations. First, as noted earlier, there is presently minimal participation by minorities in the preclearance process as currently structured by the Department of Justice. Under the proposal, a substantial measure of participation by minorities in the process should result in a "brooding presence" ever ready to raise the noncompliance issue in a readily-accessable forum. Second, familiarity with the local district court as the forum in which all disputes may be resolved by traditional means as opposed to the current alien and distant administrative remedy should enhance participation in the preclearance process.

V. CONCLUSION

The federal judiciary has historically been the guardian of the constitutional rights of all citizens. In that capacity, no more important business concerns the courts than the vital function of shielding from unlawful state action every citizen's right of franchise. It is time—indeed long past time—to invoke the full authority of federal judges throughout the United States in an effort to realize the fundamental objectives of Section 5. The process of administrative preclearance represents an unfortunate failure on the part of the Congress to utilize that segment of government traditionally vested with the duty of preserving federal rights. The time for change is now.

Senator HATCH. Do you have any questions, Senator?

Senator KENNEDY. Oh, I just want to thank the Senator for giving thought to this issue. It's an extremely complicated one. Obviously, I imagine this would mean that there would be greater time and discovery, a more complicated procedure, I suppose, but I imagine you've had the opportunity to examine that and what the burden would be on the courts.

I think one of the advantages, although it might be seen differently in different parts of the country, is that there is timely resolution of the various proposals for the local jurisdictions, and whether this would weigh the courts down, particularly in certain regions of the country, would be something I'd like to hear from you on.

Senator COCHRAN. Yes, these are questions, I think, Senator, that aren't easily answered, inasmuch as this procedure has not been tested in practice.

Senator KENNEDY. Yes.

Senator COCHRAN. But we have seen the experience of the administrative handling of these applications, and on occasion those proceedings drag out interminably. There is an example in the city of Jackson, Miss., where an annexation occurred and application was made for approval of that under the preclearance procedure. As far as I know, I don't think that's been acted on yet, and two different citywide elections have been held since the annexation took place, and lawsuits have been filed, controversy has arisen over it, but the present preclearance procedure has not really put an end to that question that was raised several years ago. There are other examples around the country, I think.

One item, I think, that should be noticed is that arguments are made, "Well, in most jurisdictions, there aren't any efforts to deprive citizens of the right to vote or participate fully in the process," and so in those cases when changes are made, the court will act summarily. There won't be any full-scale litigation over a change. Most parties would agree that there wouldn't be any discriminatory effect. But it does provide an opportunity for a due process procedure, involvement of the Department of Justice, and a fuller opportunity to protect discriminatory acts by local political subdivisions.

I think you can see——

Senator KENNEDY. Let me ask you, how would the situation change, do you think, in your own State if this passed?

Senator COCHRAN. I don't think there would be any major change in those States that are now covered by the section 5 preclearance section. In my judgment, there would be an enlarged opportunity for greater participation by interested parties.

Now, as you know, there are probably a few people in each State that are consulted by those in the Department who are reviewing these suggested changes by local units to see whether or not they have an opinion about whether this would be discriminatory in effect or not, and now that participation is limited to those few people, but under this new procedure, anyone could ask to be listed in the registry of the court, notified about changes, and given an opportunity to be heard.

So we think because of the greater involvement of a larger number of people in States, we would in effect see closer scrutiny given to changes in local election laws, and I think that would be healthy.

That's one effect that it would have in Mississippi, I think, and in all other States.

Senator KENNEDY. Well, I want to thank you. We'll look forward to hearing from the others on this proposal, but obviously you've given it a good deal of thought, and it's a serious proposal and we appreciate your presentation.

Senator COCHRAN. I thank you very much, Senator Kennedy.

Senator HATCH. Thank you, Senator Cochran.

Senator COCHRAN. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator HATCH. We're always glad to have you in this committee.

Senator COCHRAN. Thank you.

Senator HATCH. Our next witness will be Mr. Laughlin McDonald, the director of the Southern Regional Office of the American Civil Liberties Union. He has actively participated in litigation involving the Voting Rights Act.

Mr. McDonald, glad to have you here.

Mr. MCDONALD. Thank you.

Senator HATCH. Mr. McDonald, the way this works, the green light starts when you start. It's 10 minutes. You have 1 minute when the yellow light comes on.

STATEMENT OF LAUGHLIN McDONALD, DIRECTOR, SOUTHERN REGIONAL OFFICE, AMERICAN CIVIL LIBERTIES UNION FOUNDATION, INC.

Mr. MCDONALD. Good morning, Mr. Chairman and members of the subcommittee.

I'm Laughlin McDonald from Atlanta, Ga., and since 1972 I've been the director of the southern regional office of the ACLU. I appreciate the opportunity, as does the ACLU, to appear before the subcommittee.

I support S. 1992, as I did H.R. 3112, before the House Subcommittee on Civil and Constitutional Rights. The bill, as we all know, quite frankly, was a compromise bill, but I did support it then and I continue to do so in the interest of gaining bipartisan support for extension of the Voting Rights Act, and because, in my judgment, it is overall a fair and workable bill.

I have been preparing for the past several months—and I may say it's a task that took me infinitely longer to complete than I thought—a report of the litigation that the southern office has been involved in—the voting rights litigation; we do other things besides voting rights—for the past 10 years.

The report begins with Sims v. Amos which, as you know, was the implementation phase of Reynolds v. Sims, handled in large part in our office, and it concludes with, among other cases, Lodge v. Buxton, which is now Rogers v. Lodge, and will be argued in February in the Supreme Court, and Canady v. Lumberton City School District, which was the case in which the Supreme Court recently entered an injunction against the use of annexations for a section 5 violation in Lumberton, N.C.

I have the final page proofs of the draft of the report—I hope to have a bound copy next week—and, if I may, I'd like to introduce this into the record.

Senator HATCH. Without objection, we'll insert it following your statement.

Mr. MCDONALD. The report will be self-explanatory, but to summarize, there's a section which is an essay on the history of voting discrimination and then the modern movement for enfranchisement, beginning with the Civil Rights Act of 1957 and so on, and on section on progress under the act.

The heart of the report, though, is a discussion of the litigation which we've had in our office. I prepared this document in part to demonstrate the need for a continuation of the Voting Rights Act, but I think that the House and this subcommittee and, indeed, the Senate as a whole, have gone far beyond the purposes that I had in mind, because I think there is a general consensus that we do need to continue the Voting Rights Act. The case for that has been made.

Senator HATCH. That is true.

Could you pull your microphone just a little bit closer? I think the people in the back are having trouble hearing, and it will help us on the committee also.

Mr. MCDONALD. I'm sorry.

As I say, I think that my report has been superseded by what's been done in the House and what I have heard expressed by Members of this subcommittee and what I know that the Members of the Senate have done in cosponsoring the Kennedy-Mathias bill, so I'd like to address myself to some specific concerns which it's obvious that this subcommittee has, based on what I heard when I was in the hearing room yesterday.

Senator HATCH. Well, don't be misled. I have concerns about section 2. That's basically the only issue, as far as I'm concerned.

Mr. MCDONALD. Yes.

Senator HATCH. I'd like to see a reasonable bailout, because I think it would be an incentive to implement effective changes. There may be others on the committee who have other concerns about the proposed bill.

Mr. MCDONALD. Certainly.

Senator HATCH. And I haven't talked about incidental concerns, but that's my principal concern.

Mr. MCDONALD. I see.

I think the most critical issue, indeed, is whether or not to amend section 2, as proposed in the Senate bill.

Section 5 has been very effective, as we all know, in blocking hundreds of discriminatory voting changes, and I'm certain that it had a deterrent effect, which is quite difficult to quantify.

But section 5 has at least one major limitation, and that is it does not reach voting practices which were adopted prior to November 1, 1964, which is the effective date of preclearance, even though those practices are clearly discriminatory in purpose and effect. And, unfortunately, it's been our experience that most of the discriminatory voting practices in use today are those which pre-date the Voting Rights Act, and thus they are entirely beyond the reach of section 5.

The only way to challenge those practices is through traditional lawsuits in the local jurisdictions. Litigation has been effective in many instances, but it's also proven, as I'd like to say in some detail in my testimony, terribly burdensome and time-consuming.

The burden of showing vote dilution under section 2 and the Constitution prior to City of Mobile was incredibly difficult. In our office we've tried, really, I think, virtually every kind of civil rights lawsuit there is, school desegregation, jury desegregation, public accommodations and so on, and there's no question that a vote dilution suit is the most difficult, because it's all of those suits wrapped into one.

To have any hope of winning a dilution suit, the minority plaintiffs had to prove an aggregate of the so-called Zimmer factors—history of segregation in all of its aspects, discrimination in registering in voting, disproportionately low number of minorities elected to office, racial block voting, lack of responsiveness—it's a laundry list of things.

The optimum dilution suit, quite frankly, was nothing less than a presentation of the complete racial history of the jurisdiction. I know and you know academics who have spent their lives writing about a single jurisdiction.

Lawyers who have a docket to maintain are simply under incredible pressure to come up with the kind of evidence which the courts have considered relevant. As a consequence, you can't try those sorts of suits in the normal way that lawyers try cases.

In writing the racial history of the jurisdiction, you must enlist the assistance of an historian and a political scientist. You need engineers, for example, to determine whether or not the water main that goes to the black part of town is the same size as the water main that goes to the white part of town and, if not, what the significance of that may be. You need statisticians to analyze election returns, and political geographers, for example, to do studies of variables in voting. And not only do you need the expert side of the case but you need lay people, a raft of witnesses to talk about the past and continuing segregation in public and private institutions, and hundreds and even, in some cases, thousands of attorney hours to examine voting records and school records and jury lists and to read minutes of the public housing authority, to look at the prison and jail logs, and the list goes on.

The trap of dilution litigation is that the more of these kinds of cases you do, the more things you see you can do. The presentation gets more complex, unfortunately, as you gain experience in them.

The Federal district judges were surveyed in 1980, and they gave voting cases a weight of 2.8. Now, an average case is weighted 1.0. Voting cases are exceeded in complexity by only 10 of the 55 categories listed in the survey—one of the 10 that sticks in my mind was antitrust litigation. But there's no question that voting cases have always been difficult, even under the Zimmer standard. And, of course, they are terribly expensive.

It is no surprise that very few dilution suits have been filed. I would go so far as to say that very few can be filed, because minority plaintiffs simply do not have the resources to bring these kinds of lawsuits, and organizations like the ACLU have finite resources.

In our office, which specializes, if you will, in voting rights litigation, I would say on the average that we have filed less than three vote dilution cases a year. I've heard it said that, "Well, that may have been the practice but if we amend section 2 as proposed, that would open a floodgate of dilution litigation." With all respect, that is not likely to happen.

"Well," it's said, "but the proposal would adopt a new and radical standard, making section 2 suits essentially a pushover for anyone who could make out a case based simply on statistics." And, again, with all respect, the proposed amendment to section 2, I think, would merely restore the law to what it was prior to City of Mobile. There would be no flood in my judgment.

In our office, I can tell you that at most there would be a resumption of the three-case-a-year trickle against the jurisdictions in which we felt we could establish an aggregate of the Zimmer factors.

I would like to make the point just as forcefully as I can that City of Mobile, with its requirement of proof of purpose, was a change in the law. Prior to Mobile, it was understood by lawyers trying these cases and by the judges who were hearing them that a violation of voting rights could be made out upon proof of a bad purpose or effect.

Let me just quote Judge John Minor Wisdom, who wrote the concurring opinion in Nevett v. Sides, which was a companion case to City of Mobile—I think most of us would agree that Judge Wisdom is the scholar on the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals—and he makes the point that the fifth circuit had construed the Supreme Court's voting cases, "to mean that intent to discriminate need not be proved when a voting plan minimizes or cancels out minority voting strength." Judge Wisdom then cited approximately eight fifth circuit cases to that effect.

I think that Judge Wisdom was correct when he said that prior to Washington v. Davis, the Supreme Court had not required a showing of intent to make out a constitutional violation.

I don't want to belabor the point, but look at Palmer v. Thompson, for example, the case involving the closing of the swimming pools in Jackson, Miss. It was common knowledge that the pools were closed to avoid integration, and that was an argument made by the plaintiffs in favor of the unconstitutionality of the State action, but the Supreme Court noted that such proof of racial purpose was irrelevant, because the Court has never "held that a legislative act may violate equal protection solely because of the motivation of the men who voted for it."

Now, the plaintiffs said, "Well, what about Gomillion v. Lightfoot?", and the Court distinguished that case and said that the Tuskegee Gerrymander case focused "on the actual effects of the enactments," rather than on motivation.

City of Mobile has had a dramatic effect on our cases. I'd like to give you just one example of the effect in practice of that change in the law.

On April 17, 1980, Judge Robert Chapman, then a district court judge—who was recently elevated to the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals by President Reagan, and was supported by Senator Thurmond—ruled in a case from Senator Thurmond's home county, as it turns out, Edgefield County, that the at-large method infringed upon "the rights of the blacks to due process and equal protection of the laws in connection with their voting rights," and Judge Chapman found a number of the Zimmer factors, including low levels of black voter registration.

Edgefield has—and I think this is quite significant in all dilution cases, and it's a critical element of any effects standard—a long history of intentional discrimination in voting. Edgefield County gave to the State and, in a sense to the Nation, "Pitchfork" Ben Tillman, who was Governor during the late 1890's and was later a U.S. Senator, and it was Ben Tillman who really was responsible for the convening of the Disfranchising Convention of 1895 in South Carolina, which gave to that State the literacy test and the poll tax, and effectively excluded blacks from the franchise.

Blacks were totally disfranchised in Edgefield. For example, prior to the Voting Rights Act, there were only 650 blacks registered in all of Edgefield County.

Well, the district court found that there was vote dilution in Edgefield. Five days after the district court's opinion, the Supreme Court decided City of Mobile v. Bolden. The defendants promptly moved to vacate the judgment on the basis of City of Mobile, because plaintiffs had failed to prove intent, and that motion was granted.

Now, there have been other cases, which I talk about in our report, which have been dramatically affected by City of Mobile, and one of those is Cross v. Baxter. I don't have time to go into all the facts, but I've done so in this report. That case was in the district court on two occasions and in the court of appeals on two occasions.

During the first appeal, the fifth circuit said that there was "substantial evidence tending to show inequality of access by blacks," that plaintiffs "have demonstrated a history of pervasive discrimination" and "carried their burden of proving that past discrimination has present effects," and that plaintiffs "have demonstrated recent pervasive official unresponsiveness to minority needs."

The district court was reversed, the case was sent back, Bolden intervened, and the district court ruled against us once again. The case was appealed and it was heard along with Lodge v. Buxton, in which the fifth circuit laid down the rule that unresponsiveness was the sine qua non of vote dilution. The court of appeals concluded that we had not shown unresponsiveness, which, of course, was never a critical factor under the Zimmer test, and, as a consequence, all of our other evidence was simply irrelevant. The Court affirmed the dismissal of the complaint.

I cannot see that standard which would allow the egregious facts in a case like Cross v. Baxter, involving the City of Moultrie, to go unredressed serves any constitutional or other interest.

I have brought with me the brief of the appellees in Rogers v. Lodge, the case which was mentioned yesterday, and I would like to introduce this into evidence.

Senator HATCH. Without objection, we'll put it into evidence.

Mr. McDONALD. Thank you. It's really in response, Senator Hatch, to your observation that it's quite easy and possible to win cases under the purpose standard of City of Mobile.

Senator HATCH. I did not say it was easy. I said it's a standard of proof that is utilized in almost all cases, except for some civil cases, in our society. It is not unusual for people to have to prove intent, especially for an experienced attorney who has tried a lot of cases.

Please don't misconstrue this statement, Mr. McDonald, I don't think it should ever be easy to prove that a person is guilty of a criminal or of a quasi-criminal action.

Mr. McDONALD. I've done a lot of criminal work, too.

Senator HATCH. Sure.

Mr. McDONALD. I don't believe that there is a prosecutor in this country who would not howl bitterly about the test for proving intent that was laid down by the Supreme Court in City of Mobile.

Senator HATCH. Oh, I think that's probably true.

Mr. McDONALD. Let me finish. I think it would be unworkable in the criminal context.

City of Mobile is a radical decision, it seems to me, for two wholly independent reasons. It introduced the intent standard, which was unknown, as Judge Wisdom said, to the law prior to that time, and I believe him to be correct when he makes that statement.

But, No. 2, it not only said that you had to prove intent, but it said that circumstantial evidence, the Zimmer factors, were not proof of intent. If those things are not proof of intent, then, quite frankly, I submit to you that nothing short of a body buried in a shallow grave will meet the City of Mobile test.

Now, Lodge v. Buxton was a case in which the fifth circuit found for the plaintiffs, but the Supreme Court, as you know, has noted probable jurisdiction in that case and is going to hear it on appeal. And not only that, but the Supreme Court took the extraordinary step of staying the lower court's judgment. That indicates to me that there are members of the Supreme Court who have considerable doubts about the propriety of this case.

The argument being made by the defendants is that Lodge v. Buxton is warmed-over Zimmer. The court of appeals said the Zimmer factors were some evidence of purpose and that they may create an inference of purpose. Then you look at the totality of circumstances to determine whether or not the inference ripens into proof of intent.

Now, if the Supreme Court concludes that that limited use of Zimmer is unlawful, then I submit to you, it will not simply be incredibly difficult to make out a case, it will be impossible, short of having the smoking pistol, the body buried in the shallow grave.

I submit this brief for the additional reason that in a sense I am disturbed about this case, even if we win it. This was a case in which the facts were absolutely incredible, No. 1, and, No. 2, in which the district court found for the plaintiffs on every single one of the Zimmer primary factors, and every single one of the enhancing factors.

If that is what it takes—and, quite frankly, I'm being just as candid with you as I possibly can be—if that is what it takes to win a case under this new standard, then there will not be very many cases won. What will happen is that we will lose the cases like Cross v. Baxter, where the facts are absolutely egregious. I don't know whether we'll win cases such as in Edgefield; I think we can put on a case. But the burden it places on the plaintiffs is one that is well nigh impossible to overcome.

To say that you can always look into intent I think sends you right into a cul de sac. As you know, many of the persons responsible for setting up these systems have long since died. Not only that, but legislators are entitled to claim legislative privilege—that's something specifically noted in Arlington Heights.

I know the courts will have to flesh out precisely the extent of that legislative privilege, but I was involved in a case in the fourth circuit involving whether or not the law suit was a catalyst for what the State legislature had done. We brought a suit attacking an absentee balloting process in the State, which was a crazy quilt, so we contended, because it denied absentee ballots to certain classes of individuals and granted them to others.

In any event, at some point during the litigation, the State legislature met and in essence granted us the relief we sought legislatively. We moved to dismiss our case, and subsequently applied for attorney's fees on the theory that we had been a catalyst. Judge Widener, writing the opinion for the court of appeals denying us fees, suggested that we were absolutely foreclosed from inquiring into legislative motive, and he cited Arlington Heights, because that was an interference, he said, by the judiciary with the legislative sphere.

So on the one hand, if you say circumstantial evidence, the Zimmer factors, is not enough—and that is what the Court said in City of Mobile—and if on the other hand you say you can't inquire of the legislators as to their motive, then, quite frankly, I think that places an intolerable burden on the plaintiffs ever to win any of these cases.

Let me make just one final point, and that's about proportional representation.

I think that the clear test which all of us were laboring under prior to City of Mobile was an effects test, and I would challenge you, if I may, respectfully——

Senator HATCH. Fine.

Mr. MCDONALD [continuing]. To read those cases which Judge Wisdom cites in his concurring opinion in Nevett v. Sides and see whether there was any requirement of proportional representation and, more importantly, to see what happened in those cases in which the plaintiffs won, and whether or not proportional representation was the result.

I cannot—and I've searched my recollection diligently—think of a single case in which we have won, in which we have settled, in which the courts have ruled for us under the Constitution or under section 2—and we've won some under both—which have resulted in proportional representation. I can think of——

Senator HATCH. That's precisely what the Mobile case was about. Had you won that, the result would have been implementation of proportional representation.

Mr. MCDONALD. Well, I respectfully disagree. What those cases do is establish equality of access.

And that's more than just rhetoric. The only people who can determine who their representatives will be, who will represent them proportionately or otherwise, are the voters. There is no way that the court in those cases can insure proportional representation. All the court can do is establish a system of access. As a practical matter, that is true.

As an actual matter, we have never gotten proportional representation. I can think of Thomson, Ga., for example, which we settled about 3 years ago under section 2 and under the 14th and 15th amendments. There were two voting districts created in that case. One district elects two people, and that's majority black, and one district elects three, and that's majority white. Unless another black has been elected in the last couple of months from that northern district, there has never been more than one representative elected from that district. I mean, blacks vote for whites and put them into office.

That's true in all of the cases that we've had. There are two districts for the county commission in McDuffie County, for example, and based on the 1970 census, one of those districts is majority black, but there has never been a black returned from that district. The same thing is true in Lee and Dorchester Counties, S.C.; there are majority black districts there which have consistently returned whites to office.

There's nothing in the cases that requires proportional representation—I don't see how a remedial decree can do that. And there's nothing in the actual practice that has resulted in proportional representation.

Whites aren't hurt when blacks are allowed political access. The society as a whole is improved. You know, what causes intense division in these jurisdictions is the exclusion of blacks from office. That's why the level of frustration is so high, the disaffection and the rest of it. Blacks only want to participate on some basis of equality.

In Terrell County, Ga., for example, which is a majority black jurisidiction, our plaintiffs disavowed a system which would have created a majority of majority-black districts, for the simple reason that they wanted to participate but not to dominate the political situation in Terrell County.

So I quite honestly will have to tell you that in my own experience, proportional representation is neither what the folks want or what the cases have required or what the continuation of the Zimmer standard would entail.

[The prepared statement of Laughlin McDonald follows:]

PREPARED STATEMENT OF LAUGHLIN MCDONALD

Goodmorning Mr. Chairman and Members of the Subcommittee. I am Laughlin McDonald from Atlanta, Georgia, Director of the Southern Regional Office of the American Civil Liberties Union Foundation, Inc. I deeply appreciate as does the ACLU, the opportunity to appear before you today to discuss extension of the Voting Rights Act of 1965 and the need to continue protection of blacks and language minority voting rights.

Prior to becoming director of the Southern Office of the ACLU in 1972, I was in the private practice of law in Columbia, South Carolina. Prior to that I did graduate work and taught at the law school of the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill. Before that I was a staff attorney for the ACLU and finally before that, corporate attorney for the Sea Pines Plantation Company at Hilton Head, South Carolina. I've spent much of my life in the South, with the exception of four (4) years of college in New York and two (2) years in the army. Based upon that experience and more particularly my experience litigating voting rights cases over the last fourteen (14) years, I am convinced of the need for continuing the protection of the Voting Rights Act and amending of Section 2 to reach pre-Voting Rights Act practices which continue the effects of past intentional discrimination.

I support S. 1992, as I did H.R. 3112 before the House Subcommittee on Civil and Constitutional Rights. The bill is quite frankly, a compromise bill in that it contains a liberalized bail out. Nonetheless, I support it in the interests of gaining bi-partisan support for extension of the Voting Rights Act and because over all it is a fair, workable bill.

I have with me a report which I have prepared over the past several months especially for the legislative hearings on the Voting Rights Act. Actually, I have the final page proofs -- due to factors beyond my control, the final bound copy will not be available until next week -- I hope next week. At any rate, I hope you will accept this copy and allow me to substitute a bound copy when it is available.

The report is a summary of the litigation and administrative proceedings brought by the Southern Regional Office of the American Civil Liberties Union over the past ten years to combat racial discrimination in voting in the South. It assesses the impact of the Voting Rights Act of 1965 and the need for extending its special provisions beyond their effective expiration date in August 1982.

Modern Enfranchisement describes the slow steps, recently taken, toward securing equal voting rights for minorities, steps which culminated in the Voting Rights Act of 1965.

Progress Under the Voting Rights Act shows how the act has increased black voter registration and the number of minorities elected to office.

Continuing Barriers to Equal Political Participation, the heart of the report, proves through the accumulated evidence of ACLU lawsuits that voting discrimination has not disappeared. The problem remains widespread and persistent. The part on Section 5 Noncompliance shows how many local governments have repeatedly ignored the requirements of the Voting Rights Act and instituted new voting procedures that are discriminatory and illegal. The Use of Discriminatory Voting Practices Adopted Prior to the Voting Rights Act presents the even more difficult problem of existing voting practices that are clearly discriminatory but that cannot be reached effectively by the Voting Rights Act as currently interpreted.

Conclusions and Recommendations states the inescapable: the Voting Rights Act must be extended and its provisions strengthened. To improve enforcement of the Act, the U.S. Attorney General should actively monitor changes in voting procedures, and victims of voting discrimination should be able to collect damages from local officials.

The ACLU's Southern Regional Office opened in 1965 to assist in the struggle for equal rights in the South. Our program, then and now, consists primarily of litigation. In the beginning, the Southern office concentrated on jury and prison desegregation, and handled such cases as Whitus v.

Georgia (1967), invalidating discriminatory jury selection procedures in Georgia, and Lee v. Washington (1968), declaring racial segregation unconstitutional in prisons and jails in Alabama. We did voting rights cases as well, including Reynolds v. Sims (1964), which applied the one person-one vote principle to state legislative reapportionment.

Beginning in the early 1970's, however, our emphasis centered on voting rights. That was so, not because of any pre-conceived plan to concentrate on that kind of litigation, but for the reason that the predominant civil rights complaints we received from the black community were of continuing discrimination in the elective process. More often than not, the complaints were about the inability of blacks to elect candidates of their choice to office.

But the complaints also acknowledged that equal voting rights involve more than paved streets and jobs, important as they are. There is an intrinsic value to effective political participation, including office holding, that transcends the provision of services. As Reconstruction and its aftermath of black disfranchisement demonstrate, equal voting rights are nothing less than an essential condition for racial equality itself.

In a sense, and I'm quite happy to say this, the House and the Subcommittee and the Senate, have gone far beyond my purpose in writing this report. That is, it is no longer necessary to argue for the continued need for the Voting Rights Act. I think we are all agreed that there is such a need. For that reason, I Will address myself to some of the issues which most obviously trouble some members of the Subcommittee.

Beyond any doubt, I think the most critical issue before the Senate (assuming that there is agreement about extension of Section 5) is whether to amend Section 2 as proposed in S. 1992.

Section 5 pre-clearance has been effective in blocking hundreds of discriminatory voting changes, and undoubtedly, Section 5 has acted as a deterrent to enactment of many others.

Section 5 does, however, have a significant limitation. It does not affect voting practices adopted prior to November 1, 1964, even though they may be clearly discriminatory in purpose and effect.

Unfortunately, most of the discriminatory voting practices in use today are those which pre-date the Voting Rights Act, and are thus entirely beyond the reach of Section 5. The only way to challenge these practices is through traditional lawsuits in the local jurisdictions. Litigation has been effective in many instances, but it has also proven to be burdensome and time consuming, and results, quite frankly, have often been inconsistent and erratic.

The burden of showing vote dilution under Section 2 and the Constitution prior to City of Mobile was always heavy. To have any hope of prevailing, minority plaintiffs had to prove an aggregate of many of these factors: a history of segregation; discrimination in registering and voting; disproportionately low number of minorities elected to office; racial bloc voting; lack of responsiveness; a depressed socio-economic status; lack of access to the political process; a tenuous policy favoring the system under challenge; plus so-called enhancing factors, such as majority vote requirements, anti-single shot laws and large district size.

The optimum dilution suit was voting less than the complete racial history of the jurisdiction in question. To unite that history for the court, plaintiffs needed the assistance of political scientists, historians, engineers, media experts, geographers, statisticians, not to mention lay people to testify about past and continuing segregation in clubs and organizations, political parties, public accomodations, and hundreds or even thousands of lawyers to examine voting records, school records, jury lists, prison and jail logs, and the list goes on. Unfortunately, the more dilution litigation you do, the more complex the presentation of the plaintiffs' case becomes.

Federal district court judges in a 1980 survey, not surprising, gave voting cases a weight of 2.8. An average case is weighted 1.0. Voting cases are exceeded in complexity by only ten (10) of the fifty-five (55) categories listed in the survey.

Voting Cases are horrendously expensive. Not surprisingly, very few dilution suits are filed. I should say very few dilution suits can be filed, since private plaintiffs can rarely afford them, and organizations such as the ACLU have finite resources. In our office, for example, we have filed on the average less than three (3) vote dilution cases a year.

I've heard it said that amending Section 2 would open a flood gate of dilution litigation. With all respect, that is not likely to happen.

But, it is said, S. 1992 contains a new, radical standard making Section 2 suits a push over for those who can make out a case based simply on statistics. Again, with all respect, proposed amendment to Section 2 would merely restore law to what it was prior to City of Mobile. There would be no flood. In our office, there would be at most a resumption of the three (3) case a year trickle against the jurisdictions in which we felt we could establish an agregate of the Zimmer factors.

I would like to make the point as forcefully as I can that City of Mobile, with its requirement of proof of purpose, was a dramatic change in the law. Prior to Mobile, it was understood that a violation of voting rights could be made upon proof of bad purpose or effect.

For example, in his concurring opinion in Nevett v. Sides, which was the companion case to City of Mobile, Judge Wisdom, acknowledged by virtually everyone to be the scholar on the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals, made the point that the Circuit had construed the Supreme Court's voting cases "to mean that intent to discriminate need not be proved when a voting plan minimizes or cancels our minority voting strength." 571 F.2d at 232. Judge Wisdom then cited eight Fifth Circuit cases to that effect.

And I think, moreover, that Judge Wisdom was correct when he said that prior to Washington v. Davis, the Supreme Court had never had a requirement of showing intent to make out a constitutional violation. Without belaboring the point, let me refer you to Palmer v. Thompson.

Palmer v. Thompson, 403 U.S. 217 (1971) a Jackson, Mississippi case in which a city ordinance closed a publicly operated swimming pools a few days after a court ordered the pools desegregated. It was common knowledge that the city closed the pools solely to avoid integration. The Supreme Court, however, noted that such proof of racial purpose was irrelevant because the Court has never "held that a legislative act may violate equal protection solely because of the motivation of the men who voted for it." The Court distinguished Gomillion v. Lightfoot, 364 U.S. 339 (1960), the Tuskegee gerrymander case, on the grounds that its focus "was on actual effects of the enactments" rather than on motivation.

I do not see any purpose to our debating the issue of what the legislative history shows was the intent of Congress when it passed Section 2 in 1965. It is clear to me that there was no purpose requirement; presumably it is clear to you, as it seems to be to the Attorney General, that Congress did have a purpose requirement in mind. Rather than going into that issue, which is essentially one of looking at the published legislative materials, I would simply like to offer for the record two amicus briefs filed in the case of Lodge v. Buxton, the case which has been much mentioned here. One was filed in the Supreme Court recently by a group of amici curiae, and one was filed in the Fifth Circuit by the United States of America. These briefs both make the argument that Congress did not intend to require proof of intent when it adopted Section 2. They make the argument quite well, and I would like to commend them to you to read rather than taking up the time of the Committee to discuss this issue in detail.

Discovering an unconstitutional legislative motive, he said, was using a dowser, or a diving rod. "To require the plaintiffs to prove an unconstitutional legislative motive is to burden the plaintiffs with the necessity of finding the authoritative meaning of a oracle that is Delphic only to the court."

Let me say also, and I do not wish to sound all-knowing, but I have been trying voting cases from 1967 through the present, and it is simply not accurate to say there was ever any general understanding that purpose was required. In fact, just the opposite was true. The lawyers and judges in those cases of whom we have any evidence assumed that proof of purpose was not required, and I base that statement on my own recollection, on the recollections of people I have talked to who also tried these cases during those years, and on the arguments that I remember encountering.

Indeed, the sentence discussed yesterday, quoting from the plurality in Mobile about the Zimmer case does prove that point, as Senator Kennedy suggested. The sentence read:

> "That case, [Zimmer v. McKeithen] coming before Washington v. Davis, was quite evidently decided upon the misunderstanding that it is not necessary to show a discriminatory purpose in order to prove a violation of the Equal Protection Clause--that proof of a discriminatory effect is sufficient."

That comment indeed referred to the Fifth Circuit's decision in Zimmer rather than a decision of the Supreme Court. But while that is true, it has no relevance here, because the point is not what the Supreme Court says is the rule or should have been the rule, but what was the rule followed in fact by the lower courts.

Why is that the point? Because the rule followed by the courts during that period--essentially the late 1960's to the late 1970's--including the Supreme Court in White v. Regester, is the rule that amended Section 2 adopts. That rule did not require proof of discriminatory purpose--remember the Supreme Court in Bolden said it did not-- and yet I cannot find anything that says those cases required, involved or in any way led to a quota system or proportional representation.

We have had the experience of cases that operated under the principle of not requiring proof of discriminatory purpose, and yet those cases did not in the slightest involve any thing remotely resembling a proportional representation or quota system. No one looking at those cases objectively can find in them a requirement of proportional representation.

The relevant question is whether the "results" standard contained in amended Section 2 is an ascertainable standard that has meaning and limits, or whether it is to be read to mean a requirement of proportional representation.

I submit that the answer to the question is not in the realm of conjecture or hypothesis, but may found in real life experience. That experience shows that an effect standard has never required, or indeed in my experience achieved, proportional representation.

Let me give you a dramatic example of the way in which City of Mobile changed the law as it was understood and applied by the lower courts.

On April 17, 1980, Judge Robert Chapman, then district court judge and now judge of the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals, ruled that at-large elections for the Edgefield County, South Carolina, County Council constitutionally infringed upon "the rights of the blacks to due process and equal protection of the laws in connection with their voting rights." The Court based its ruling upon the effect standard of Zimmer. Further elections were enjoined until a new and constitutional method of electing the County Council was adopted under state law. Some of the court's finds were:

"Until 1970, no black had ever served as a precinct election official, and since that year the number of blacks appointed to serve has been neglible."

"Blacks were historically excluded from jury service in Edgefield County."

"Blacks have been excluded from employment. . .it was only when trial was about to begin that the county suddenly began hiring blacks in any numbers. . .in addition, blacks are heavily concentrated at the lower wage levels."

"Blacks have been excluded by the county council in appointments to county boards and commissions."

"There is bloc voting by the whites on a scale that this court has never before observed. . .whites absolutely refuse to vote for a black."

The evidence showed that Edgefield has strong traditions of discrimination in voting. Edgefield, as you recall, was the home of "Pitchfork" Ben Tillman who lead the fight for black disfranchisement after Reconstruction and was the man who, as a U.S. Senator, was the moving force behind the Disfranchising Convention of 1895. It was that convention which gave the state the poll tax and literacy test for voting which effectively removed blacks from the electorate.

The legacy of that past intentional discrimination in voting remains dominant in Edgefield. For example, prior to enactment of the Voting Rights Act, only 650 blacks were registered in Edgefield County, 17% of the eligible population. By contrast, nearly 100% of eligible whites were registered.

Five days after the district court's opinion, the Supreme Court decided City of Mobile v. Bolden. The Edgefield defendants moved the court to vacate the judgement on the basis of City of Mobile, i.e. that the plaintiffs had failed to prove intent, and the motion was granted.

The Edgefield case was not the only casuality of the dramatic change in the law brought about by City of Mobile. Take the case of Cross v. Baxter, decided the same day as Lodge v. Buxton, a case mentioned by the chairman yesterday.

Cross v. Baxter arises in the town of Moultrie, Georgia. Like Edgefield, its history of racial discrimination is long and grisly. For example, John Cross, the owner of a black cab company, attempted to register during the days of the all-white primary in 1941-42, and again in 1943. On each occasion he was denied registration. "On one occasion they told three of us that it was too late in the day. You know it was about four o'clock and they just closed the window." On another occasion in 1942, "they told us. . .we had to pay poll tax. . . .I was unable to pay." Cross finally registered in 1946 after a federal court declared unconstitutional Georgia's all-white primaries.

Even, then, Cross and every other black voter in the City of Moultrie eligible to participate in the Democratic primary were challenged in 1946 for not having proper voter registration qualifications. No whites were challenged.

It was not until the Voting Rights Act of 1965 that any significant number of blacks registered in Moultrie.

Although the Democratic all-white primary has been abolished, the legacy of party discrimination persists. As of 1976, no black had ever served as an officer of the party, and only one black had ever served on the twelve-member county executive committee.

City elections were traditionally run on a racially segregated basis. White voting booths were located "next to the City Hall, and . . .the Negro polling place in a booth. . . in the fire department." Voter registration lists were also maintained on a racially segregated basis. Neither segregated voting nor segregated registration ended in Moultrie "until the integration issue came up," during the mid-1960's.

Not only have elections been conducted on a racially segregated basis, but municipal elections were managed by the Moultrie Lions Club, an organization which excludes blacks from its membership. Blacks were occasionally allowed to assist with operating voting machines but the Lions Club never permitted any blacks to certify voters or hold managerial positions. The Lions Club still manages city elections, although at the elections held in 1980, a black women's club was allowed to assist the Lions.

Moultrie also has an aggravated history of violating Section 5, including use of an uncleared majority vote requirement which has excluded at least one plurality winning black from office.

Discrimination and inequality based upon race have characterized virtually every aspect of public and private life in Moultrie. Penal facilities were racially segregated until the late 1960's. Law enforcement was racially segregated--the first black policeman was not hired until the mid-1960's, and even then was not allowed to arrest whites. Juries were racially exclusive. Housing for blacks is typically substandard and segregated. Employment opportunities for blacks are depressed. For example, in January, 1972, there were no blacks employed in the city hall and only one "in a building adjacent to City Hall." The majority of blacks presently employed by the council work as either garbage collectors or laborers. Clubs and churches remain for all practical purposes as rigidly segregated now as they were a hundred years ago. Schools were not desegregated until 1970, and then only after bitter, local resistance. Blacks are substantially under-represented on boards and commissions over which the city council has exercised its appointment power.

Black citizens asked the mayor and council in 1975 to adopt a single-member district plan for elections to provide an opportunity for black political participation. As John Cross explained it: "as the present at-large system works in Moultrie, the white majority controls the outcome of every single election. . . . People get elected who are naturally more responsive to the needs of whites than they are to blacks." The city council, however, responded that "the present system. . . had worked properly for the entire history of the city" and declined to make any change.

Cross and other blacks filed a lawsuit in which they claimed that the at-large system of elections was unconstitutional. The district court held on October 26, 1977, there were no barriers to present registration and the at-large system did not preclude "effective participation" by blacks in politics.

On appeal, the Fifth Circuit reversed. It held there was "substantial evidence tending to show inequality of access;" that plaintiffs "have demonstrated a history of pervasive discrimination and. . .have carried their burden of proving that past discrimination has present effects;" and, that "plaintiffs have demonstrated recent pervasive official unresponsiveness to minority needs." The case was sent back to the district court.

A second hearing was held on January 25, 1980. A major element of the city's case was the election of a black man, Wesley Ball, to city council on May 22, 1979. Ball was a 68-year-old retired former waiter at the Colquitt Hotel in Moultrie. He had a seventh grade education, had never run for office, nor had he ever been involved in any political campaign. He ran against another black, as well as a white man named Cook.

According to Cook, "most businessmen around. . .white businessmen" had supported Ball or Wilson, the other black, because if they were defeated by a white opponent, "the ward system would be more effective to come in" and the city might lose its lawsuit. "They wanted. . .a black post, and they didn't. . .want me on there for that reason. . .said, let them two have it out. . . .Ball and Wilson."

After Ball won the election, someone put a sign on Cook's place of business: "got beat by a black man--business for sale--leaving town." Ball himself said that race has always been critical in city politics. He testified that "the primary thing" that had caused black candidates to lose in elections for the City Council was race: "It's been on racial lines."

In addition to evidence of "cuing" by whites to give the appearance of racial fairness to city elections, the plaintiffs showed that: the Lions Club continues officially to participate in management of city elections; as recently as the 1979 elections, black voters were turned away from the polls by members of the Lions Club; city officials continue to ignore Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act of 1965--an uncleared literacy test was implemented in 1979 for new poll workers (presumably black) who responded to a newspaper ad and volunteered to assist the Lions Club in conducting city elections; and, the city council voted in 1979 strictly along racial lines to retain at-large elections without citing any non-racial reasons supporting the majority's vote.

Following the rehearing, the district court ruled once again against the plaintiffs, concluding that the at-large system in Moultrie was not discriminatory. The plaintiffs appealed. The Fifth Circuit, relying upon City of Mobile, held that plaintiffs must prove unresponsiveness in order to establish vote dilution, and because the district court had found responsiveness by the Moultrie City Council, a finding not permitted to be reversed on the appellate level unless "clearly erroneous, " the plaintiffs were absolutely foreclosed from obtaining any relief. None of the evidence of direct discrimination was discussed or even mentioned. It was simply deemed irrelevant.

It is clear to me, and I think to the court of appeals prior to City of Mobile, that blacks have little or no access to the political system in Moultrie, Georgia. But because of the change in the law brought about by the court, suddenly the constitutional violation -- and any hope of equal political participation -- have evaporated.

Cases such as Cross v. Baxter and McCain v. Lybrand illustrate the inordinate difficulty -- and I think unfairness -- in requiring proof of purpose.

It bears repeating that City of Mobile said not merely that proof of purpose was required, but more importantly that the Zimmer factors -- the history of past intentional discrimination, continuing effects, and all the rest -- while "some evidence" of purpose, most assuredly do not make out a constitutional violation. Quite frankly, if the circumstantial evidence in Zimmer does not make out proof of purpose, I honestly do not know what does, short of a body burried in a shallow grave.

Proof problems are complicated and the fact that those who established the procedure under attack may have long since died; or may have been clever enough to diguise their racial tracks, or may be entitled to claim legislative immunity in the event they were subpoened to testify (Arlington Heights; Bly v. McLeod).

Many erroneous ideas have been expressed about amended Section 2. It has been erroneously described as an election results test, as if the results of an election would be dispositive of the validity of the election system. It has also been erroneously described as being identical to the test in Section 5. It has also been erroneously described as involving a requirement of "maximization" of minority political strength. Finally, a number of examples have been given of cities whose districts were constituted in certain ways, with the erroneous implication that the way those districts were constituted would invalidate them. See, for example, Rep. Butler's example on page 71 of his dissenting views in the House Report.

These are all reflections of the recurring erroneous idea that amended Section 2 will guarantee election of minorities rather than simply giving them an opportunity to participate fully in the political process. Amended Section 2 does not involve a test of "election results" but rather of the overall results of the system, as viewed in light of all the complex factors I have described. Amended Section 2 will return, as I have said, to the test that was used in fact before Mobile and was involved in White v. Regester and Zimmer v. McKeithen. It was only the application of that test that allowed minority voters in certain towns and counties where they were essentially excluded from political participation -- to have an opportunity to participate for the first time. Without the ability to challenge those exclusionary election systems, minority voters would be and continue to be denied opportunity and it is, frankly, quite fanciful, to think that these cases involve any notion of proportional representation.

That was confirmed in White v. Regester, where the Court said:

> "To sustain such claims, it is not enough that the racial group allegedly discriminated against has not had legislative seats in proportion to its voting potential." [412 US 766]

The sentence that was added to amended Section 2 is simply an incorporation of this sentence from White v. Regester. I do not see how amended Section 2 could be any plainer in rejecting the quota fear that has been raised here, and if there could be any doubt, I do not see how the added sentence could be any clearer in reiterating the rejection of quotas. Finally I do not see how the House Report could be any clearer in rejecting quotas and proportional representation.

Yesterday the Chairman paraphrased a sentence from the House Report. That sentence, which I found clear in context, came in a paragraph that both began and ended with disclaimers that leave no room for doubt:

> The proposed amendment does not create a right of proportional representation. Thus, the fact that members of a racial or language minority group have not been elected in numbers equal to the group's proportion of the population does not, in itself, constitute a violation of the section although such proof, along with other objective factors, would be highly relevant. Neither does it create a right to proportional representation as a remedy.

From the beginning of these debates, some people have expressed fears about whether the amendment to Section 2 might go beyond insuring an opportunity for minority voters. Many of us have worked hard to make it clear that the meaning of this critical amendment is not unlimited. I believe we have been successful in making this clear to those who were open to reason. I urge all those who are truly interested in fair voting laws to examine S. 1992 carefully, and I am confident that when they do they will promptly give it their wholehearted support and secure its passage so that we can tell people of this Nation that we believe in the fair right to vote and that will enforce that belief with all the vigor at our command.

Addendum to the Prepared Statement of Laughlin McDonald

Many people have been concerned about the fact that voting litigation by the Department of Justice has come to a virtual standstill. I would like to refer to three cases in which I have been involved in which the Department has been conspicuous by its absence.

(1) Lodge v. Buxton. You have pointed to this case as the critical post-Mobile case that will show a smoking gun is not required to prove purpose. The fifth circuit struck down the at-large elections in Burke County, and the United States had filed an amicus brief in the court of appeals. But the Supreme Court took the appeal of Burke County, and took the unusual step of staying the judgment pending appeal, even though the two lower courts had turned down the request for a stay. I would have expected to see an amicus brief for the United States of America in the Supreme Court, urging the Court to affirm the judgment and thus hold that a smoking gun is not required in order to find this type of egregious system invalid. Yet the Department did not file a brief, and I am curious why.

(2) Canady v. Lumberton City Board of Education. This was a case we filed to enforce a section 5 objection by the Attorney General. Here again I would have thought the United States would file an amicus brief backing up efforts to enforce its own objection, but no brief was forthcoming.

(3) McCain v. Lybrand. This was another phase of the case involving the Edgefield County Council. Here too we were suing to enforce a section 5 objection entered by the Attorney General. Again, the Department failed to file a brief, and here we know a bit more about the process.I would like to show the Subcommittee a news clipping indicating that the Justice Department had already prepared an amicus brief and actually sent it to the United States Attorney in Columbia for filing. Then, after receiving some contacts, the Department called the U.S. Attorney to retrieve the brief; it was never filed.

The Assistant Attorney General is quoted as having said he decided not to file the brief because he received information indicating that the voters' position would be adequately represented. While this may be complimentary, I also find it quite simply unbelievable. I have frankly never heard of a brief that was already prepared and ready to file being pulled for a reason like that.

These are serious examples. They cause me great concern because the Attorney General plays such a major role in the enforcement ofthe Voting Rights Act. It is no exaggeration to say that the rights of minority voters under the Voting Rights Act depend upon the efforts of the Attorney General, which in several major ways are not subject to review by minority voters (although they are subject to review by the covered jurisdictions). I am speaking eppecially about the holding that if the Attorney General fails to object to a section 5 submission the voters have no review (while the covered jurisdictions do have a can get a review of the objection in the Districtof Columbia court). I am also speaking of the Attorney General's power to reconsider and withdraw objections. This provision should ordinarily function well as a safety valve but there has been increasing concern over the Attorney General's application of the provision, including one situation in which an objection was withdrawn on a reconsideration request filed five years after the objection (during which it had been ignored by the covered jurisdiction-Jackson, Miss.).

I am not sure we can afford to let the Attorney General continue to have unreviewable discretion in these vital areas.

This is also true of the basic submission mechanism. It depends on voluntary compliance, but we have been learning just how little of that there is, and how little the Attorney General does to insure compliance. Right now, there is virtually no incentive on covered jurisdictions to submit section 5 changes voluntarily, except for the possibility that they might be sued and, if they lose, they will simply have to do at that time what they should have done before.

That is one reason why one of the important bail-out conditions is that a jurisdiction not have enforced unprecleared submissions during the previous ten years. This provision will be important in bringing about greater compliance, but I believe we may need even stronger measures, at least if enforcement efforts of the Department of Justice are not stepped up.

Senator HATCH. I haven't been very good at enforcing the 10-minute rule, but we understand.

Mr. MCDONALD. I know you haven't, and I appreciate it.

Senator HATCH. Congressman Hyde is here, and because of his schedule, I would like to take his testimony now while he is available. Let's interrupt your testimony for the time being, and we'll resume the questioning phase of your testimony as soon as Congressman Hyde is through.

Senator KENNEDY. Well, we have a number of responsibilities here. Since we had at least one round of questioning, I didn't know whether we could at least have one—I don't want to discommode Congressman Hyde, but I have made a special effort to hear this witness.

Senator HATCH. Well, we'll be happy to do that. We'll be happy to have more than one round of questions with any witness, as far as I'm concerned, but let's have Congressman Hyde.

We're limiting to 10 minutes, Congressman Hyde.

Senator KENNEDY. Well, does Congressman Hyde mind waiting for 10 minutes?

Mr. HYDE. I don't mind waiting.

Senator HATCH. I want you to know it took about 2 hours per witness yesterday. I hope you don't mind waiting that long.

Senator KENNEDY. Not on our side, it didn't.

Senator HATCH. I thought it took a lot of your time yesterday, Senator.

Mr. HYDE. Are we limiting the statement to 10 minutes?

Senator HATCH. Well, we haven't been very successful in that effort during this first statement, but we would like to during the remainder of this hearing.

Mr. HYDE. So I will have 10 minutes?

Senator HATCH. You have more if you need it. I've generally accommodated Members of Congress.

Senator KENNEDY. I would hope that the Congressman would. He's one of the very active Members on this whole issue in the House, and I think he's got a lot to say. I want to see these hearings comprehensive, and I want to see the Senate take action, but I do think when we have experts like we have in these areas here this committee ought to benefit from them.

Senator HATCH. Well, fine.

I'm going to rule that you come and give your testimony now, Congressman Hyde, and then we'll have time with Mr. McDonald afterward.

Any questions for you that we will have I don't think will take as long as they will with Mr. McDonald.

That way you won't have to sit here all day.

Mr. HYDE. All right, fine.

Senator HATCH. Unless you would like to. If you'd like to sit here all day, that's certainly fine with me.

Mr. HYDE. I think that's an offer I can refuse.

Senator KENNEDY. That really isn't the option. What I was only——

Senator HATCH. Let's go ahead with your testimony.

[Pause.]

Senator HATCH. Go ahead, Congressman Hyde. I'm sorry.

Mr. HYDE. Thank you.

STATEMENT OF HON. HENRY J. HYDE, A REPRESENTATIVE IN CONGRESS FROM THE STATE OF ILLINOIS

Mr. HYDE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman and distinguished Senators.

I come before you this morning as an advocate for the Voting Rights Act of 1965, and as a supporter of the amendments adopted by the House, with certain reservations.

Coming from Chicago, I am indeed sensitive to the frustrations voting discrimination can sow. I voted for the 1975 amendments to the act, following my first year in the House, and I've consistently supported them ever since.

Initially, I opposed the continuation of preclearance as a denial of equal treatment to sovereign States and their political subdivision. Moreover, I felt that 17 years of this extraordinary remedy had served its purpose. Our subcommittee's hearings changed my mind, however, and though I feel great progress has been made in granting minorities access to the political process in the covered jurisdictions, it's clear that more needs to be accomplished.

Preclearance, then, still has its usefulness.

I also speak from the perspective of one who cherishes federalism. I believe resolutely that it is the people who govern, and the power of the Government here in Washington is limited both by the 10th amendment and by the degree to which the people themselves are willing to assign their obligations and responsibilities to our care. But in order to participate in the process, one must be able to vote. Practices which limit access to the ballot simultaneously suppress the integrity of government and disenfranchise those who participation is essential, if we are to fulfill the promise of a representative democracy.

The adoption of the 15th amendment represented a constitutional commitment to the sanctity of the vote. We all share in the shame that it's principle was not acknowledged everywhere for 95 years. In its place flourished practices such as poll taxes, moral character tests, white primaries, and literacy tests, devices which in themselves or in their application were designed for the purpose of effectively separating minorities, particularly those whose skin was black, from the participating electorate.

The enactment of the Voting Rights Act in 1965 began a change toward realizing the mandate of the 15th amendment. Often for the first time, blacks could freely register and vote. Poll taxes were outlawed. Literacy tests were suspended, then later prohibited. Grandfather clauses, property qualifications, racially-motivated gerrymandering practices and white primaries fell victim to Supreme Court ruling.

Black registration, a mere 6.7 percent of the voting age population in Mississippi in 1964, rose to 63.2 percent in 1972, and to 72.2 percent in November 1980. In contrast, black voter registration in States not wholly covered by the act, such as New York and New Jersey, remained woefully low, even in 1980, at 46.4 percent and 48.9 percent, respectively. Even the District of Columbia, which has a 70-percent black population and in which blacks are represented in virtually all major political positions, could boast that only 43 percent of those of voting age bothered to come to the polls in 1980.

In 1965, authoritative sources suggested that only 72 blacks served as elected officials in all 11 Southern States, including those not subsequently covered by the act. By July 1980, that figure had risen to 2,042 in the covered jurisdictions alone.

The inevitable conclusion is that the act has been extraordinarily effective. Its task is not yet complete, and the promise of the 15th amendment notwithstanding, the uncommon exercise of congressional power which this Voting Rights Act represents has not been fulfilled.

Now, during the hearings in the House, admittedly weighted in favor of extension, I heard witnesses describe voting systems in which black participants are required to fill out their ballots in front of white poll-watchers where there are no curtains and no privacy. I heard tales of limited registration hours in rural counties where facilities are often not open in the evening, during the weekend, or at noontime.

I'm also apprehensive about re-registration requirements unevenly aimed at predominantly black counties, which can have the effect of intimidating further participation by resurrecting ghosts of the past.

It's quite possible that some of what I've described merely reflects the distressing insensitivity of some election officials. It's equally plausible that it reflects instead the progeny of a cultural indifference and the vestige of a racially prejudiced past.

Now, I believe that the act should continue in effect, yet the record demonstrates significant progress worthy of effective legislative recognition. As Judiciary Chairman Peter Rodino admitted on the House floor during general debate, and I quote: "[I]t became clear that fairness dictate[s] that an avenue to escape the preclearance requirement should be afforded those jurisdictions which have had a history of complying with the law."

It's also noteworthy that Chairman Rodino admitted, "[E]scape is virtually impossible under the current law."

The House bill, H.R. 3112, reported by the House by an overwhelming margin of 389 to 24, including my vote, is not without serious flaws. It is a very complex piece of legislation which has been merchandised in extraordinarily simplistic terms.

By the time it reached the floor, suggestions that alternate views should be considered were quickly met with harsh charges that any deviation whatsoever from what was pushed through the full Judiciary Committee merely reflected "code word(s) for not extending the (a)ct."

This intimidating style of lobbying had the ironic effect, though clearly intended, of limiting serious debate and creating a wave of apprehension among those who might have sincerely questioned some of the bill's language.

No one wishes to be the target of racist characterization, and the final vote reflected more of an an overwhelming statement of support for the principle represented by the act than it did concurrence with each and every sentence or concept it contains.

I hope, however, that though you may differ on the merits, what I say in the balance of my statement will strike you and the sponsors of S. 1992 as both responsible and fair.

What is a reasonable bailout? I favor the bailout mechanism contained in the House bill, but I disagree with some of its provisions.

I have essentially two categories of objections. The first includes those which were added to my original draft hours, literally hours, before the full Judiciary Committee approved the measure and sent it to the floor. In my opinion, much of what was added then was unnecessary and is designed principally to frustrate bailout and remove the incentive to change electoral practices, which I had originally sought.

The second category contains provisions on which reasonable persons can differ, such as the requirement that all jurisdictions within wholly covered counties or States must become eligible for bailout before any part thereof can become eligible, or whether the bailout petition should be filed in three-judge courts in the circuit nearest the covered jurisdiction or, as now, only in the U.S. Circuit Court for the District of Columbia.

To understand my concerns, I think it's necessary to review how the House bailout mechanism operates.

Under existing law—existing law, now—any covered jurisdiction, and that includes whole States in many cases, may escape the requirements of administrative preclearance only if they are able to convince a three-judge court right here in the District of Columbia that no test or device has been used for the purpose or with the effect of discriminating against protected minorities for a period of 17 years.

Now, since the 17-year period dates back to a point before the act was originally passed in 1965, this test cannot be met, unless August 6, 1982 passes without legislative action, as confirmed by Chairman Rodino's statement on the floor of the House.

Under the House bill, ostensibly designed to permit a more realistic means by which covered jurisdictions can earn their freedom from administrative preclearance, the new test as passed by the House is almost as difficult to meet as the old.

In order to become eligible for bailout under H.R. 3112, a covered State, and all jurisdictions within it, whether or not independently guilty of voting rights abuse, must demonstrate that for 10 years prior to filing a petition for bailout, and during the pendency of that petition:

One, it has not used a test or device with discriminatory purpose or effect, as under present law.

Two, no final judgment has been issued by a Federal court which determines that voting rights have been violated.

Three, no consent agreement has been entered into resulting in a change of voting practice.

Four, no Federal examiners have been assigned to the petitioning jurisdiction.

Five, the petitioning jurisdiction, and all jurisdictions within it, whether subject to State control or not, have complied with the preclearance provisions of section 5.

Six, no objections have been raised to changes submitted for preclearance by or on behalf of the covered jurisdictions, and

Seven, covered States and all governmental units within their territory have eliminated voting procedures and election methods which inhibit or dilute minority participation, have made constructive efforts to eliminate harassment at the polls, have provided minorities with convenient registration, and have appointed minority representatives as election officials throughout the jurisdiction and at all stages of the election and registration process.

Parenthetically, I should state that Congressman Jenkins of Georgia represents a district which he says has many counties with no minorities living within their boundaries. How they're going to appoint minority representatives as election officials boggles my mind.

I don't quarrel with all of these preconditions, but some are troubling to me.

No. 1, consent decrees.

Senator KENNEDY. Mr. Congressman, Mr. Chairman, could you yield for just a moment.

Senator HATCH. Sure.

Senator KENNEDY. We are having a joint meeting of the Congress in just a short time, and Members of the Senate so desire assembling in that time, and I understand the intention of the chairman is to continue during the course of that meeting.

I had some questions for Mr. McDonald, which is why I wanted to inquire of him. I don't know what his program is, but I don't think that we'll be able to get back until earlier in the afternoon. Now, I will be glad to submit some. There are probably about three or four that I would like to have as a part of this record, and if I could have my staff ask those three or four questions at a time convenient, that will be all right.

Senator HATCH. We'll be happy to accommodate you, Senator.

Senator KENNEDY. Mr. Chairman, at an appropriate time, since the President was asked last evening about his position on the Voting Rights Act in an interview with Mr. Rather, and this was an issue which was brought up yesterday during the course of the hearing, I'd like at an appropriate place—not to interrupt the Congressman's testimony—to include the exchange between Mr. Rather and President Reagan on the House-passed bill, in which he did indicate that he could sign that legislation, and I think just at an appropriate place in the record, maybe at the outset of these hearings, we could include in the record that exchange.

Senator HATCH. Yes, that will be fine.

Might I inquire, do you have both exchanges on this issue? Because there was one and then he came back with a clarification that——

Senator KENNEDY. It would just take a minute.

Mr. RATHER. Just very quickly, if the House version of the Voting Rights Act is passed, will you veto it?

President REAGAN. No, I wouldn't. Well, I don't exactly—now you've trapped me into something. I usually don't like to say whether I'll veto or not veto until it's on my desk, because sometimes an orange becomes an apple before it gets there. I'm for the expansion of the Voting Rights Act for 10 years. It has never been extended for that long. I believe that I can support what is the House version. I don't know what's going to happen in the Senate.

Mr. RATHER. I understand. But if the current House version gets through, you would not veto that?

President REAGAN. I don't know of anything that is in it that would make me veto it.

And Mr. Rather, during a break in the interview requested by Mr. Reagan, agreed in advance, two White House officials suggested the President should say more about his answer on the Voting Rights Act. So after the break, we come back to that subject.

Mr. RATHER. I thought there were some exceptions that you wanted made in the House version of the bill. Now, first of all, you're willing for it to have a 10-year extension.

President REAGAN. Yes, I guess I did misspeak there. I am willing—I would be willing to take the bill—I mean, the program as it exists and simply extend it for 10 years, or the House version.

This is after the break, or the House version.

But I should have added there are a couple of points in the House version as it exists now that we would like to see modified or changed.

Mr. RATHER. And they are?

President REAGAN. Well, one of them has to do with the bailout provision and the other one has to do with what's called an effects test, rather than an intent test, that we believe could cause confusion and perhaps unfairness in the program.

Mr. RATHER. But, Mr. President, doesn't this run a high risk of aggravating the problem you already have with the perception of black people that, yes, you say, "Listen, I care about you. Nothing in my background, not a bone in my body that is bigoted," but then when it comes to something like voting rights, yes, you'll extend it, but there are exceptions? If I read the black Americans correctly, which is hard for anyone to do, this is exactly the kind of thing that scares them about you.

President REAGAN. Well, now, wait a minute. Let me clarify. The Voting Rights Bill as it exists and has existed performed a fine service and worked well. It was a good piece of legislation. I have said I'd be willing to extend that 10 years. It's never been extended that long before.

Mr. RATHER. True.

President REAGAN. I wanted to go forward with it, the House seeking to improve it. It has a couple of features in there that I don't think improve the present legislation, one that I think would make it harder to make it effective, which is change to the efffect of the bill as a means of imposing penalties, rather than the intent. In other words, as the bill exists, it is, if you can see a governmental body that is seeking, or any other group that is seeking to restrict the rights of the people to vote, you take action on this. The change that apparently is wanted is a change that would say, "Well, let's look at how many—what would the percentage of voting—we don't think enough percentage voted." Well, maybe enough percentage doesn't vote sometimes simply because they're not interested in the candidates, and to us that is not as big a guarantee of fairness as it is to, as we say, go by the intent and say, "Look, you're trying to keep these people from voting."

I'm not quite sure I understand that last answer, but I thought the indication of his willingness to sign either bill was a matter that the committee ought to have as it gives consideration to it.

I thank the chairman.

Senator HATCH. Thank you, and we'll put that in the record.

I have to admit that I appreciate my colleague who, unlike the President and the rest of us, is always precise and, of course, fluent in every one of his public pronouncements.

Senator KENNEDY. That's right.

Senator HATCH. There is never even the slightest hint of unclarity or ambiguity in his statements.

Senator KENNEDY. Not with regard to this bill, there isn't.

Senator HATCH. Well, I think it would be well for you to understand the bill. Maybe you would have some unclarity. The rest of us mere mortals, of course, unfortunately cannot always make that claim.

And I suspect that the President has many, many responsibilities——

Senator KENNEDY. Well, you don't think he was unclear when he said that he'd support the House bill, do you?

Senator HATCH. Well, I think this: I think that he would support a bill——

Senator KENNEDY. Was he unclear when he said, "I don't know of anything that is in it that would make me veto it"?

Senator HATCH. I think what the President is saying is that he wants to have the effects test out of this bill, and would like to have a reasonable bailout provision. I think that his representative, the Attorney General, who is trained and learned in this area, spoke very clearly for the President yesterday. I think it's kind of ridiculous to put that in as though by any interview for 30 seconds or a minute-and-a-half or 5 minutes, the President should be bound by every little word and jot and tittle that he says.

All I can say is that I do believe there have been times even on this august committee where every one of us, including even the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, have said things that perhaps we wish we had not said because we really didn't mean them quite the way they came out. I suspect that is the nature of politics, and I hope we'll have some degree of compassion, at least, for those who sit in these positions.

Go ahead.

Senator KENNEDY. May I just say finally, I think the President's words speak for himself, rather than for how we interpret them, and I'm glad to have them in the record.

I thank the Congressman for yielding.

Senator HATCH. Let me just say this, Mr. Congressman: I think the President is committed to the Voting Rights Act, as am I. The point which should not be obscured by any colloquy is that this is an important issue, and section 2 is an important issue. You are raising some important issues about the House bill, for which you voted.

Mr. HYDE. Right.

Senator HATCH. And we can't obscure it merely because of politics or anything else, for that matter.

Go ahead.

Mr. HYDE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Let's talk about consent decrees. For example, consent decrees have been traditionally encouraged by our judicial system. They are supposed to further the public interest and represent a rather substantial percentage of civil terminations within the Department of Justice.

They permit the Department to operate at considerably less expense than would be the case if all cases were tried, and they permit a defendant to avoid the immense cost associated with fighting the resources of the Federal Government through the courts.

H.R. 3112 would automatically preclude eligibility for bailout if any covered jurisdiction had come to a consent agreement with the Government within 10 years of the bailout petition. Moreover, this penalty would attach after the fact.

The inevitable result is to offer covered jurisdictions only two alternatives, neither of which is ultimately beneficial to covered minorities.

First, petitioning jurisdictions can fight the cases involved through the courts to acquire judgments, expending funds which could otherwise be used for electoral improvements, and simultaneously delaying the implementation of electoral changes designed to satisfy the other conditions of bailout and improve access to the vote for minorities.

Second, they can withdraw their bailout petition altogether and content themselves with the status quo, a condition which witnesses before you will doubtless condemn as unacceptable.

What purpose, then, is the consent bar designed to serve? In my view, it can have no effect but to reduce, perhaps fatally, the incentive for improved electoral conditions offered by a realistic bailout mechanism.

A better resolution would be for the trial court to examine the totality of the consent degree and determine if the practices corrected were so insubstantial that they could not constitute or they should not constitute a bar to bailout.

Two, Federal examiners. Federal examiners are provided for in section 6 of the act and may be dispatched at the will of the sitting Attorney General. Under the terms of subsection (b), the Attorney General may order examiners to a covered jurisdiction, and thereby frustrate bailout for a period of 10 years, if he is willing to certify that he has received written complaints from more than 20 residents of a covered jurisdiction, which could be an entire State, and that he believes such complaints to be meritorious or, in the alternative, he alone determines that the appointment of examiners is otherwise necessary.

No review of the merit of the complaint is necessary, nor must the examiners find irregularities once they arrive on the scene. The bar is complete if they are merely sent, even if the motivation of the Attorney General in sending them is political, rather than substantive.

Once again, the purpose to be served can only eliminate the incentive for change.

Three, objections. The bar to eligibility created by the requirement that there must not be any objections to any submission made "by or on behalf of" the covered jurisdiction raises some interesting possibilities. Technical objections, resulting from lack of experience with the act or from executive incompetence, create no less a bar than does a purposeful electoral change specifically designed to disenfranchise minorities.

In addition, if elected Representatives sponsor and vote for a redistricting plan which is later subject to an objection, have they acted "by or on behalf of" their constituents for purposes of the 10-year bar? What if their motive was to politically embarrass executives in their home jurisdiction, who might well be members of another political party? In either event, the objection which they receive from the Department of Justice will be a complete bar to eligibility for bailout for a full decade.

Four, parole period. If bailout is ever issued, and the 10-year parole period is ever begun, the bill requires the reviewing court to reopen the case, and thus relitigate the issues, if any aggrieved person so much as alleges that misconduct has taken place during the period which, had it taken place during the 10-year eligibility term, would have prohibited bailout.

Once again, no merit is demanded of the aggrieved party's allegations, and no discretion is presented to the reviewing court. The covered jurisdiction will once more be forced to litigate even admittedly trivial accusations and endure considerable costs in the process.

This makes no sense at all. The insistence on this provision by the proponents of the bailout as presently constituted raises questions of good faith to my mind, if not of reasonableness.

There are additional issues in the House-passed bailout which fall in the second category. They pertain to policy questions, about which reasonable people can disagree. Examples include the requirement in the House bill that all counties—all counties—within covered States must meet the eligibility standards, as well as the State legislature itself, before the latter can effect bailout.

I believe a two-thirds threshold is preferable. Even a three-fourths threshold would be preferable. But to require complete bailout by every political entity within a State before a State can get out, I think is just unreasonable.

I think these malfeasing jurisdictions, these areas that do not bail out and cannot bail out, could be isolated and public attention be focused on them, rather than to hold the entire State in because of one or two recalcitrant jurisdictions.

Now, I believe fervently that the exclusive use of the three-judge court in the District of Columbia is an affront to circuit courts elsewhere in the country.

The fifth circuit, for example, holds one of the strongest civil rights records in this country, though it is situated principally within the covered jurisdiction. An amendment was offered in the House which would have permitted local circuits to be used so long as two of the three judges were circuit judges—that's U.S. Court of Appeals judges—and none were from the jurisdiction petitioning for bailout.

I think you would all admit that, while you may differ as to policy, this is a reasonable proposal. It was neverthless labeled a crippling amendment and summarily rejected.

Now, we know the civil rights establishment is here in Washington and has easy access to its courts. By using courts in a more appropriate venue, with these guarantees against hometown justice, local officials and witnesses will also enjoy equal access to the courts, which seems to me an essential element of justice.

Finally, I do not think the condition for bailout which requires the elimination of "voting procedures and methods of election which inhibit or dilute" minority access should be interpreted to mandate the elimination of at large electoral systems where they have not been found to have been created or to be operated for a discriminatory process.

I'll treat this issue more fully in the next part of my statement, but at-large electoral systems often serve a number of legitimate political purposes. Since each of you, Senators, is elected at-large, I'm sure you're sensitive to the degree to which such systems often require candidates to moderate their views in order to pull from the mainstream of the electorate, permit minority block voting to influence the whole of the election, rather than just one ward or district, and tend to break down the special interest representation generally associated with small and occasionally rather extreme political constituencies.

I would encourage jurisdictions to alter their electoral practices in order to integrate minorities into government. That was the thrust of my original draft. I prefer, however, that the "constructive efforts" of the jurisdiction in question be taken as a whole in determining whether or not to grant bailout.

Different facts dictate different actions on the part of the petitioning jurisdiction. Presenting each requirement as a complete bar, as H.R. 3112 does, seems to me, again, both unreasonable and, in the long term, counterproductive.

What does section 2 really mean? If section 2 of H.R. 3112 ever becomes law, it may well be the most far-reaching legislation ever adopted by Congress. It purports to be a clarifying measure, designed to return the law to what it was prior to the Supreme Court's ruling in Mobile v. Bolden. It is also marketed as a replacement for an "impossible" burden of proof established by Mobile, with a disclaimer tacked onto the end of the House amendment, which is reassuringly alleged to erase any fears of quota requirements.

All of these claims are erroneous. The House devoted just 1 day to the merits of the new language and presented as witnesses three attorneys supporting the changes, including the attorney for the losing side in Mobile.

Senator HATCH. Could I interrupt you, Congressman Hyde?

Mr. HYDE. Sure.

Senator HATCH. How many total days did the House hold hearings?

Mr. HYDE. We had 100 witnesses, but I'm not sure how many days, but they were extensive hearings.

Nineteen days, I'm just informed.

Senator HATCH. Nineteen days. I see. And they only gave 1 day for the discussion of this problem?

Mr. HYDE. That's right.

Senator HATCH. Go ahead.

Mr. HYDE. Before accepting the arguments of the House at face value, I encourage you——

Senator HATCH. Excuse me, again. Could I interrupt you again?

Mr. HYDE. Sure.

Senator HATCH. I'm sorry, Henry, to interrupt you again, but, as you know, to me, section 2 is the problem. Now, would you disagree that, section 2 creates the potential for a monumental problem?

Mr. HYDE. Senator, I think section 2 is a major key to what we're doing. I agree, and I confess to not paying sufficient attention to this issue in the House. I personally got wrapped up in trying to work an acceptable compromise on bailout out with all of the interested parties and my focus was not on this issue, hoping instead that in a compromise we could reach a satisfactory package.

We weren't able to do that, but following the dismemberment of my bailout a few hours before the Judiciary Committee's hearing, I was able to pay more attention to this, and, frankly, though I had expressed concern, I now view this as before, perhaps more important, really, than the bailout, and I hope that you'll devote the attention to it that we did.

Senator HATCH. Well, I haven't meant to find fault, but I concluded early in my research on this issue that it is going to be very difficult to ever get a reasonable bailout provision, because there is more heat than light in this matter. There's an unwillingness on the part of many members of Congress to really address that issue, even though it deserves it, as you're doing right now.

I just cannot overlook the section 2 problem, because it's——

Mr. HYDE. Senator, the tradeoff in the House, as I envisioned it and tried to fashion it, was not a 10-year extension for preclearance but a permanent extension. And I keep hearing television commentators and others talk about a 10-year extension.

Senator HATCH. Oh, it's permanent.

Mr. HYDE. That's not before you.

Senator HATCH. That's right. It's permanent.

Mr. HYDE. The way Peter Rodino originally introduced it was to maintain the status quo for 10 years but add an effects test to section 2.

You have a House bill before you that contains permanent preclearance. The tradeoff was a decent, workable bailout, and we ended up with permanent preclearance, and a virtually impossible bailout, so, sadly, what passed may, in part, be unconstitutional.

Senator HATCH. I think it is impossible. I don't think there is any way that anybody is ever going to bail out under the requirements prescribed by the proposed legislation. I personally understand why these jurisdictions that have made real efforts in this area—some of which have been pretty successful—feel very bitter about it.

Mr. HYDE. Well, Senator, I think you could work a decent bailout.

Senator HATCH. Oh, I think we can, too. I don't think this is it, however.

Mr. HYDE. No. I agree, but I won't repeat my criticism.

Senator HATCH. Senator Biden?

Senator BIDEN. Mr. Chairman, I apologize for interrupting you. I'm not even a member of this subcommittee, and I know all you Republicans are going to want to follow me over to the hundredth year commemoration ceremony.

Senator HATCH. I wish I could go. I really do. I would like to go.

Senator BIDEN. I not only wish, I must.

But I'd like to just raise one point, Congressman, and maybe you can clarify it a little bit, with regard to how much attention you paid to section 2 or not. Obviously, I guess you'd have to say that's the single most contentious element of this whole debate, and during your hearings, in an exchange with Professor Walburt—I believe that's the correct pronunciation—you said:

Mr. Hyde, if I could just jump in, we have preempted so much time, and you have been very generous. I have been most interested in the discussion. If you could come up with some suggested language that would allay the fear that proportional representation might be mandated, that would go a long way toward resolving some of the concerns some of us have. This is new language that hasn't been interpreted by the courts, and they're just not predictable. Well, they just aren't.

And then Professor Walburt said, "Bolden would confirm that." And the response by Congressman Hyde is,

So your point is that you wouldn't be disturbed by that. That's helpful, politically helpful, to get something like that in the words.

And then on the next page, you say,

Sure, it's something that should be looked at and, in effect, as long as we're talking about it, I'd like to look at the totality of the situation, because I can conceive, as you can, of situations where there is a submergency or a dilution of minority voting strength, but the need for it outweighs the unhappy consequences. You know, like amputation is a terrible thing, but it may save the body. Under any effects test that we can crank in, I would hope that the Court and the Justice Department could review the totality of the circumstances in evaluating whether this in fact is a voting rights abuse. I think we understand each other on that, do we not? Would you agree?

Professor Walburt: One hundred percent.

The reason I bother to bring it up, it sounds to me like you pretty well knew what you were talking about. What in the interim has changed—I mean, you're obviously not——

Mr. HYDE. I ratified my statements there. I think what I'm trying to say, and I think what can be done, is a codification of the Washington v. Davis case, which is a fairly recent case, in which the Court said the totality of the circumstances should be studied to see whether or not invidious discrimination exists.

But the "disclaimer" in the bill highlights simply one factor, one circumstance, which I interpret as are numbers, results. That means numbers, and if there——

Senator BIDEN. But I thought you talked about effects.

Mr. HYDE. Yes, that's an effect. A result is an effect. The effect of this law is to preclude minorities from being elected. How do you show that? Well, they just aren't being elected? There are none elected, therefore, it's invidious.

Rather than to leap from A to B like that, I would like the totality of the circumstances looked at, as in Mobile v. Bolden, where you had more than just the mere failure of the election of three blacks, but you had them losing in the black districts as well. You had limited campaigning. They couldn't even carry majority black districts. So if you simply said, "Look, they weren't elected. The effects must be discriminatory," I think the totality of the circumstances ought to be looked at.

And I think the test as set down in Washington v. Davis, which is on page 21 of my statement, would be the way to do it. If that could be codified in this section 2 or some appropriate place, I think we could avoid the problem we seem to be moving toward, because proportional representation is a very dangerous concept, in my judgment. Justices Marshall and Brennan thought it was appropriate in Mobile, so you've got two Supreme Court Justices opting for proportional representation.

Senator BIDEN. But I didn't think that's what either Mathias or Kennedy attempted to do with section 2. I mean, that's not my understanding.

Mr. HYDE. Let's say it, then, and not leave it to some court to interpret. That's my point. If we're all agreed on what we want to do, let's avoid ambiguities in the language and let's say that proportional representation is not the sole determining factor, not what we're looking for; we're looking at the totality of the circumstances. That's all. And I think that's what the Supreme Court has held, especially in Washington v. Davis.

Senator BIDEN. Well, I have some concerns about section 2, but I keep coming back to that I thought that that's exactly what the bill now says is what you're suggesting that it says.

Mr. HYDE. You're talking about section 2, now?

Senator BIDEN. Section 2. Yes, just section 2.

Mr. HYDE. Well, Section 2 in H.R. 3112 highlights only one factor, and that is proportional representation.

Senator BIDEN. I appreciate your allowing me to interrupt, but we're going to be talking about this——

I don't want to cut you off, but I'm now beginning to upstage a subcommittee I'm not even on.

Senator HATCH. We always respect the Senator from Delaware.

Senator BIDEN. I appreciate it. I'm sure we're going to talk a lot more about this. I know I plan on listening to all the testimony.

Mr. HYDE. If we agree we don't want an effects test to mandate proportional representation—I think that's what you said Senator Kennedy and Mathias wants—let's say that in an unambiguous——

Senator HATCH. This section simply says that——

Mr. HYDE. Yes. Let's say that, and then we're fine.

Senator HATCH. Good.

Senator BIDEN. Thank you very much, Congressman.

Senator HATCH. Let me just say this to you, Congressman, as a followup to the other point that I made. We are really trying to make these hearings well balanced during the 9 days of hearings that we're having. I think we're calling some of the best people on both sides that we can get, but unfortunately we can't get everybody, and there are some appalling reasons for that. That's all I can say.

Let me ask you this: You had 100 witnesses. Did you feel that those hearings in the House were balanced, with only one day devoted to section 2 issue, which I believe is the most important issue to be addressed in any discussion of the proposed bill.

Mr. HYDE. Well, Senator, in all candor, let me say this: No witness whom we wanted to call was denied an opportunity to be heard. I found a reluctance, sadly, among people who ought to come forward to oppose some of these notions, a reluctance to testify. We were not inundated by requests from attorneys general and others to come forward and testify on section 2 or other parts of the bill.

Now, we asked an awful lot of people to come forward. Perhaps—and I shouldn't speculate—but I sense that some of them felt that our forum was not objective. We had one witness, a black lawyer from Mississippi, who was going to testify not in accordance with the zeit geist, with the establishment, on this and he was harassed.

Senator HATCH. Harassed by whom?

Mr. HYDE. Well, by political figures in his state. Even members of his family called him and said, in effect "You're not going to go up there and testify against the Voting Rights Act," and this man is a very well-known black civil rights lawyer who was a very interesting witness. He did testify, but I was very disturbed by what I personally evaluate as harassment.

So there may well have been that feeling among others that there wasn't much point to coming up here. Now, I don't share that feeling. I think if someone has something to say, he ought to come forward and say it.

And I do not charge Chairman Edwards or the majority staff—I think they clearly had a point of view they wanted to further. We just weren't inundated by people who wanted to testify on possible changes.

Senator HATCH. Well, I know of several instances on this side where people we have asked to testify, have been unable to testify, due to the harassment to which they were being subjected as a result of the invitation to testify. I am appalled by this situation, to be honest with you.

I personally don't think that one day is adequate to address this issue. I'm not trying to assess any blame or responsibility, but I think it an unfortunate oversight. We're trying to address it here on both sides.

I have to admit that to me it's one of the most important constitutional issues ever addressed by this body, and the section 2 question really transcends many of the other problems in this matter.

Mr. HYDE. Senator, I'll take some responsibility for that. We couldn't find anybody, and we did look. Now, I have one staff person for the three of us. The majority has how many staff?

Mr. BOYD. They have five.

Mr. HYDE. They have five, and we had one, and Mr. Boyd did a great job. But they would have heard someone if we could have come up with them, and we had trouble, frankly.

Senator HATCH. Please forgive me for raising this.

Mr. HYDE. Surely.

Senator HATCH. I haven't wanted to find fault with anybody, but, as you know, this is hardly an inconsequential issue. This is a very important issue. It is, in my opinion, a major change in statutory law.

Mr. HYDE. It may radically restructure the electoral process if an effects test like that in H.R. 3112 becomes law, because every losing candidate then will have a cause of action.

Senator HATCH. That's right. We're going to have witnesses on both sides; I'm sure that point will be addressed from both perspectives, the one which you have just expressed, and that held by those who say the change will have no such impact at all.

Mr. HYDE. That's right.

Senator HATCH. It simply makes it easier to prove these cases.

Mr. HYDE. Well, then, let's spell it out. Let's spell it out, as Senator Biden said that Senator Kennedy and Senator Kennedy intend, that we don't mean proportional representation but totality of circumstances.

Senator HATCH. But, you can't do that. The proponents want the effects test knowing that if they can get it here, then they could have similar success in other areas of civil rights. With this type of revision in present housing legislation they could overrule land use planning and zoning ordinances on merely the basis that the effect of having an acreage or lot-size requirement effectively excludes black because in that area they can't afford to buy them, even though there was no intent to discriminate in establishing those laws to begin with.

This example clearly illustrates how much more involved this issue is in reality. It is not just the Voting Rights Act at issue here. This is just the beginning. And, frankly, fair housing was a beginning last year of trying to institutionalize the effects test so that it would be much easier to prove any discrimination case, regardless of intent.

Well, let's go back to your statement.

Mr. HYDE. If I may.

Before accepting the arguments of the House at face value, I encourage you carefully to read the Court's opinion in Mobile and review the oral arguments, if you can, of the advocates before the Supreme Court. Once you've done that, I suspect the simplistic positions which have been taken will assume an entirely different character.

To summarize, Mobile involved an at-large electoral system through which three members of the city's governing commission were elected by the populace. Created in 1911, it came under attack because in three attempts black candidates had been unable to overcome racially polarized voting and gain election to the commission.

This fact, combined with the 35-percent minority voting block which blacks represented in the city of Mobile, led the district court to decide against the city, reaching its decision on 14th and 15th amendment grounds, not, as has been claimed, on a private right of action under section 2 of the Voting Rights Act.

The Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit affirmed, but the Supreme Court reversed, holding that the effects test applied by the district court was incorrect, that discriminatory purpose must be established to prevail on a constitutional claim. That is a case brought under the 14th and 15th amendments.

One congressional critic has summarized Mobile as a decision which is all over the lot. Not so. Six Justices reversed the decision of the district and circuit courts, five of them agreeing that Justice Marshall's claim of a constitutional right to proportional representation was ill founded.

In the first place, the House language is not intended to return the law to what it was before Mobile, as claimed again and again by editorial writers and commentators.

The fifth circuit, while holding against the city of Mobile on constitutional grounds, nevertheless noted in passing that a statutory claim under the Voting Rights Act "was at best problematic." It knew of no successful dilution claim expressly founded on section 2.

Indeed, Mobile was never a case under the Voting Rights Act. The argument that the act might be involved was made before each court, including the Supreme Court, but was dismissed there as it had been below. In fact, James U. Blacksher, attorney for the plaintiffs, confessed before the Court that "In its motion to dismiss early in the case, the district court held that we did not have a cause of action."

Furthermore, if it were true that intent—and I think this is important, and you hear this again and again; it was in the Washington Post this morning—if it's true that intent is as impossible to prove as has been predicted, we would have few criminal convictions in this country, for each is invariably based on some showing of intent, and many result from circumstantial evidence which does not involve a smoking gun.

Similarly, we would have no judicial findings of de facto educational segregation resulting in busing, for each is based on proof of intent under the equal protection clause of the 14th amendment, the same clause now applicable in voting dilution cases.

If intent were impossible to prove, a dilution case could not be successfully pursued. Let me repeat that. If you can't prove intent, then you'll never successfully pursue a dilution case, right? Wrong. In February of last year, the fifth circuit, following Mobile, held that an at-large electoral system in Escambia County, Fla., was purposefully discriminatory. Since Mobile is now being relitigated, its result may change as well.

Circumstantial evidence, then, can prove a case under section 2 of the present act, after all, just as it can in a criminal context.

The plurality in Mobile rejected the fifth circuit effects test articulated in Zimmer v. McKeithen, a 1973 case, East Carroll Parish School Board v. Marshall, a 1976 case, and held firm to its own decision in Washington v. Davis, a 1975 case, which followed Zimmer.

Now, the Washington standard seems to me quite reasonable, and clearly disproves charges that proof of intent is impossible. In defining discriminatory purpose, Justice White wrote—and this is in the Washington case, 1975—that intent need not "be expressed or appear on the face of the statute."

An invidious discriminatory purpose, he said, "may often be inferred from the totality of the relevant facts, including the fact, if it is true, that the law bears more heavily on one race than another * * *. Disproportionate impact is not irrelevant, but it is not the sole touchstone of an invidious racial discrimination forbidden by the Constitution." I think that's key to this whole issue.

How can this test be fairly characterized as impossible?

In the Escambia County case, as in Mobile, there was no smoking gun available. Nevertheless, the fifth circuit, in reviewing the totality of the evidence surrounding the motives behind the selection of the at-large electoral system for the school board and city council races, and in tracing its decision to the guidelines set forth in Justice Stewart's plurality decision in Mobile, held the at-large system unconstitutional in both cases.

Contrary to propaganda asserting that the Mobile test is impossible, the fifth circuit inferred from the totality of the facts that the electoral procedures in Escambia County were created and, indeed, were maintained—and that word is important; if you can't prove they were created with discriminatory intent, you can show that they're operated or maintained—for discriminatory purposes. The county and city of Pensacola chose not to appeal.

The fault in Mobile, if there is fault, lies not in the opinion of the Supreme Court, as some would suggest, but rather in the imperfect record presented to the Court by the plaintiffs.

In the first place, the district court in Mobile rested its holding—I'm talking about the district court—"primarily on the fact that no Negro had ever been elected to the city commission." It was unable to find that the at-large system, created back in 1911, was originally designed to serve a discriminatory purpose.

But the inference it took to reach its decision was contradicted by its own findings. Specifically, the only three black candidates ever to seek election to the city commission did so in 1973 and were adjudged by the district court to be "young" and "inexperience," a fact not lost on the Supreme Court. They didn't campaign at large. They failed to carry even black wards. It is at least reasonable, therefore, that factors other than race could have resulted in the failure of these candidates to achieve success.

The district court also attempted to correlate the failure of qualified black candidates to gain election to the county school board, also determined at-large with the failure of the three black candidates in the city commissioners race. County boundaries, however, were not identical to those of the city and, though they overlapped to a degree, the constituencies were considerably different.

The Supreme Court also noted the district court's findings that blacks "register and vote in Mobile" without hinderance "and that there are no official obstacles in the way of blacks who wish to become candidates for election to the commission." The mere fact that they had not yet been elected was insufficient to "work a constitutional deprivation."

Thus, having failed to establish satisfactorily that the at-large system in Mobile was created in order to discriminate against blacks or that the black candidates for the Mobile City Commission lost because of their race, the district court was left with one rather tenuous presumption: that the failure of the Alabama legislature to take affirmative steps to remedy disproportionate representation was, and I quote, "as effective as * * * intentional State action," and therefore "sufficient to support a finding of unconstitutionality." This conclusion was upheld by the fifth circuit, but this holding was dismissed by the clear majority of the Supreme Court, not just the plurality of the Supreme Court.

In short, Mobile was not a good test case and probably should never have been chosen as one. It was, as I have said, never a voting case under section 2 of the Voting Rights Act. It was a case brought under the 14th and 15th amendments from the beginning.

So what is it that the House language is attempting to accomplish, if not proportional representation? Cries that legislative history will clarify the congressional intent that quotas are not required mean little if, as a matter of constitutional construction, such history is not "permitted to control the customary meaning of the words . . . ," United States v. Dickerson.

If we look at the words alone, we find that disproportionate representation, "in and of itself," is not supposed to constitute a violation of section 2. It is a "high relevant" factor, however, according to our House report. Since no other "highly relevant" factor is listed in the statute, I would argue that "highly relevant" translates into a presumption and that statistical imbalance, with little more than a scintilla of additional evidence, would indeed constitute a violation of the House amendment. In other words, a claim of voting discrimination under section 2, as amended by the House, will survive so long as the record is not "wholly barren of evidence."

Very simply, then, what we are talking about here is quota representation based on race, a principal which, though camouflaged by the rhetoric of effects or results, nevertheless demands some rather dismal assumptions. It suggests the worst kind of racism, a policy which concludes that prejudice is infinite, that blacks cannot be represented by whites and, with equal logic, whites cannot be represented by blacks.

Justice Marshall's protest that what he referred to as an "inequitable distribution of political influence" was not synonymous with a constitutional right to representation was unpersuasive to a clear majority of the Supreme Court. They felt that proportional representation was precisely the issue. So do I.

I would not object to the codification of the holding in Washington in order to clearly articulate that the totality of the circumstances are, and should be, properly considered in proving intent in a constitutional case. The political issue here, though, is proportional representation, just as it was in Mobile. Only the personalities have changed. No one has yet proposed the codification of Washington, but I suggest to this committee respectfully that it consider this middle position.

Experience has shown us that the effects test now in section 5 of the act is very broad in its application. Proponents of the House amendments to section 2 wish to extend that breadth nationwide. Since the section 5 requirements are based on a congressional finding in 1965 that reprehensible State action had occurred in jurisdictions now so covered, I do not believe a case has been made which demonstrates that the same onerous test should be applied at all levels of elective government nationwide. It will be too strong an antibiotic to the body politic of this country, resulting in an affirmative action plan for minority public officials.

The litigation from disappointed candidates which such a radically new electoral process would generate can only overwhelm our court system for generations.

While I'm sympathetic to the frustrations which must prevail in Mobile—the hearings I attended in nearby Montgomery opened my eyes immeasurably—it's important not to lose sight of the fact that the failure of the litigants in Mobile was not caused by an aberration of constitutional interpretation. Rather, the fault lies at the feet of those whose burden it was to make the case for change.

The challenge was met in Escambia County; it was not met in Mobile.

I surely thank you for your patience throughout this long presentation. I would be happy to answer any questions that you might have.

Senator HATCH. Well, thank you, Congressman Hyde. We appreciate the extensive efforts that you have gone to to present us with your analysis of the House bill and, of course, the present state of affairs.

I don't have any questions. Senator Thurmond?

Senator THURMOND. It's a great pleasure to have you here, Congressman Hyde, and thank you very much.

Mr. HYDE. Thank you, sir. It's a great pleasure to be here.

Senator HATCH. Senator East?

Senator EAST. I would, again, just like to thank the distinguished Congressman for coming here and being a part of this discussion, and we greatly appreciate the work that he's done on the House Judiciary Committee on this vital matter.

I appreciate your indulgence, Mr. Chairman.

I would like to make sure, now, that I understand, Congressman, your fundamental conclusion. As you see this House bill, one, we in effect institute a system of preclearance.

Mr. HYDE. Only in exchange for a workable, fair, practical bailout. I'm not troubled by preclearance in perpetuity, if you can realistically qualify for escape.

Senator EAST. Right. But your point is, we have, as you put it—and I want to make sure I understand your position—we have the worst of both worlds?

Mr. HYDE. Now, we do, yes.

Senator EAST. Because we have permanent preclearance, and we have, as a practical matter, impossible bailout, and, as I understand it, that is your position. I think it's perceptive. I personally agree with it, and coming from one of those States that has been vitally affected by this statute, I think it needs fundamental and major overhauling.

Right now in my State, we cannot even hold primaries for the House of the Representatives because of the incredible turmoil, having nothing to do with racial discrimination, currently being practiced in the State. And I hope that in the course of these hearings—and thanks to your great spade work and your insightful comments, I think at least we can open up a serious dialog on what we're doing here, because I sense we're getting a little bit of a rush from many quarters just to move this through, and we're dealing with some very fundamental, long-term constitutional matters.

You put your finger on this question of proportional representation. If what you're trying to do is to guarantee in the statute the right of individuals to register and vote, irrespective of race, that's one thing, but where a statute is designed to guarantee specific results, be it white representation, be it black representation, Mexican-American or whatever, proportional representation, that's a wholly new concept in the American democratic electoral process.

And I would like to end on this note—because I don't want to overindulge the courtesy of the chairman here—if we accept this, we go down a very new and strange world in the electoral process in this country, which is not predicated upon the idea of proportional representation, but is predicated upon the idea that the individual, irrespective of race, ought to be able to register and to vote and to participate. It's that fundamental point that troubles me.

And the thing that troubles me the most in the treatment of this in the public arena is the implication that if you have any question about it, you are some way or other tainted with racism. And I would remind the critics that not everything done in the name of fighting poverty helps fight poverty, and not everything done in the name of anticommunism is anti-Communist, and not everything done in the name of national defense is national defense, and not everything done in terms of improving the electoral process in this country necessarily does so.

And I think this Voting Rights Act as it's currently proposed, with the limitations that you have noted and the deficiencies you have noted points up the need to hit this thing head on, and to engage in serious public discussion and dialog on it, because if we don't, as our distinguished chairman has indicated, we are going to saddle this country, and certain sections of this country, with unworkable, impractical legislation, and legislation that is contrary to the fundamental essentials of the electoral process, democratic process in the United States.

Senator HATCH. I might add, Senator East, this issue is certainly more involved than that. If this section 2 is adopted, it would apply to every jurisdiction in this country, and that's what the people in this country better start learning, because if it is applied to every jurisdiction in this country, two-thirds of which are at-large voting districts, you're talking about an upheaval in this land that will be second to none, politically.

Mr. HYDE. Senator, may I just say something?

Senator HATCH. Yes.

Mr. HYDE. First of all, on this section 2, which we all agree is crucial, the language that I personally prefer would state that intent can be inferred from the totality of the circumstances. If one factor is to be highlighted, as it is in the House language, then a list of other "highly relevant" factors should be included as well, but I prefer what is the law today, that the totality of the circumstances be studied.

Senator HATCH. That is the law today.

Mr. HYDE. That's correct, that is the law today.

Senator HATCH. It was under Mobile.

Mr. HYDE. Having said that, let me talk about two other things. Chief Justice Burger is reported in the press as expressing great concern about the tidal wave of litigation that's inundating the present Federal court system. I suggest if we have a nationwide effects test such as is in H.R. 3112, our court system may not be able to support the litigation that——

Senator HATCH. But, Henry, the court's ability to handle the case load is not a consideration in passing the type of law if the law were right. In other words, if the courts couldn't handle it, we would have to get more courts, because we've got to work against discrimination. I know you believe the same way I do on that. But the problem here is that the solution offered by this particular legislation is not right. That's the problem.

Mr. HYDE. Well, Senator, I agree with you, but the real world has to be considered by people who want perfection.

Senator HATCH. Sure.

Mr. HYDE. And the price of perfect justice, as we know, sometimes can't be paid. Society can't pay it.

Senator HATCH. But my contention is that this bill would not get us to perfect justice.

Mr. HYDE. Well, Senator, if we have an impossible bailout, combined with permanent preclearance, that may be the best of all worlds for the civil rights establishment, but I suggest it's like having the fist in the bottle. There are serious constitutional problems in that. The constitutional justification for preclearance, which was held to be an extraordinary remedy in 1966 was—the underpinning for that was the extraordinary conditions that existed pre-1965.

Senator HATCH. That's right.

Mr. HYDE. We're now in 1982, and those same extraordinary conditions are absent. Methods are more sophisticated, so, instead of terminating the extraordinary remedy because the extraordinary conditions aren't there, we're making it perpetual, but with the virtual impossibility of bailing out. That, I suggest, is probably unconstitutional.

And in the zeal to get the toughest bill, I suggest the civil rights community may get no bill.

So I'm just talking about the bailout and the permanent continuation of preclearance, but on section 2, I just hope that you're not going to be stampeded, as the House was. Every amendment, no matter how reasonable, was labeled crippling.

Moreover, having to bring the cases up here, where witnesses from these little rural counties have to get on an Amtrak, if they can find one, or a bus and get up here, it's great for the civil rights establishment. The media are here, their offices are here, but the action, the witnesses, the violations, are out there, and we have a Federal court system, and if they're afraid of hometown justice, then let's use two U.S. court of appeals, and let's get a third judge who isn't from that district.

The fifth circuit is every bit as sensitive, if not more so, than the District. And these amendments are reasonable even though they are labeled as crippling.

Senator GRASSLEY. Mr. Chairman?

Senator HATCH. Senator Grassley?

Senator GRASSLEY. It's now 6 months since you said that the act passed, and prior to the passage, you didn't have adequate time to reflect upon section 2 because of your concern over bailout. Now, after that, and kind of in summary of what you said, but to direct it with a rifle, what's your druthers? Would you think that the effects test should not be in there? Or, as you suggested, possibly language should be written in from the Washington case, or that we ought to just spell out more than the House did, that the effect case could not in any way be read to apply to proportional representation?

Mr. HYDE. Well, my druthers, Senator, would be that the language in section 2 would state clearly that intent can be inferred from the totality of the circumstances, which, in my judgment, is the holding of the Supreme Court in the Washington v. Davis case. I think if that's spelled out, then you do not have simply a numbers game where you've got x number of blacks who are registered to vote, you have the candidates, the blacks didn't win, therefore we're in court.

Senator GRASSLEY. But you would not strike out the effects case totally?

Mr. HYDE. No. An effects test means you just judge simply by the effects. Discriminatory purpose has nothing to do with it. I want intent, which is a standard in every criminal case, and in busing cases. I want intent there, but I do not want to limit proof of intent to the probing of the brains and the motives and the subterranean——

Senator HATCH. Nobody makes that claim except those who are activists on the civil rights side.

Mr. HYDE. That's right. They claim intent requires a "smoking gun" and that's a justification for the effects test, and that simply isn't true; it's an unreasonable distortion of how you prove intent. The totality of the circumstances will help you prove intent, as in every criminal case.

Senator HATCH. Are there any further questions?

[No response.]

Senator HATCH. Thank you, Congressman Hyde. We appreciate your time and effort.

Mr. HYDE. Thanks for your great patience. I know what an endurance contest this is.

Senator HATCH. It has taken a lot of time.

Let's call Mr. McDonald back. We will turn to Burt Wides, Senator Kennedy's counsel, who has some questions from Senator Kennedy for you, Mr. McDonald.

Mr. WIDES. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator HATCH. Do you have any estimate as to how long it's going to take? I'm running out of time.

Mr. WIDES. No more than 15 minutes.

Senator HATCH. Let me just tell all witnesses that I don't think any Senator can sit here all day like we did yesterday. I just can't do that, so we're going to have to try and summarize.

Mr. WIDES. Yes, sir.

Senator HATCH. I'm not trying to shorten you, but I do want to have everybody cognizant of the time.

Go ahead, Mr. Wides.

Mr. WIDES. Mr. McDonald, these are the questions that Senator Kennedy had wanted to ask you, and I'm quoting from his questions.

I think the most important point you make is on the bottom of page 6 and top of page 7, Mr. McDonald. If I understand you, what you're saying is that based on your extensive experience, the legal standard that Senator Mathias and I have in our bill, the test of White v. Regester, was the law for many years until the Bolden case. Is that correct?

Mr. MCDONALD. I really think there is no doubt about that. Judge Wisdom fairly, I think, characterized what the law of the fifth circuit had been.

Mr. WIDES. Did you or other plaintiffs you are familiar with and plaintiffs' attorneys or defense attorneys in your briefs or the courts in their opinions indicate that there was an intent requirement or that the evidence you put in had to be used to show circumstantially that there was a discriminatory purpose before Bolden?

Mr. MCDONALD. We never argued that intent was required. We always took the position, which I think was the status of the law, that we could prevail if we showed either purpose or effect.

Mr. WIDES. My understanding is that that is also true to the extent they participated in such cases of the Justice Department. Is that your understanding of their position, as indicated in their filings?

Mr. MCDONALD. Yes; that's correct. And, as a matter of fact, the Department of Justice filed an amicus brief in the fifth circuit in Lodge v. Buxton—it's now, of course, Rogers v. Lodge in the Supreme Court—in which they made the precise argument that section 2 of the Voting Rights Act of 1965 dispensed with a requirement of showing invidious purpose, where, as in that case, at a minimum you had evidence of prior discrimination in voting and additional evidence of the existence of electoral schemes which perpetuated those past effects. Proof of adverse effect made out a violation.

Mr. Wides, if I may, I have a copy of an amicus brief which was prepared on behalf of about eight or nine organizations, including the NAACP, the Georgia Association of Black Elected Officials, by Tom Atkins and Margaret Ford of New York, and John Meyer of Atlanta, Ga., who was the lead attorney, by the way, in White v. Dougherty County, and it discusses, among other things, the section 2 issue. If I may, I'd like to introduce that into evidence.

Mr. MARKMAN. That's fine.

Mr. WIDES. Regardless, there was some testimony yesterday—I think the Attorney General emphasized that the Bolden case was the first case in which there was a clear-cut addressing by the Court of section 2, and I think there was other testimony that the White v. Regester case and the Whitcomb v. Chavis case, which are the two cases embodying the test that is in the bill of Senator Mathias and Senator Kennedy, were 14th amendment cases, but the point that is central, it seems, in your testimony is that whether they were 14th or 15th amendment cases or whether they were section 2 cases—I take it what you're saying is that we do have a track record when we look to the standard of what is in the Mathias-Kennedy bill. And the question is raised, "Is this a strange new animal that will unleash a Pandora's box where plaintiffs can knock down at-large elections left and right?" Are you saying that there is a track record under precisely that standard, and that in that track record there was no quota requirement or proportionality, the cases were hard to win, and they were arduous and not cases in which you could do what has been suggested could be done under that standard in our bill?

Mr. MCDONALD. That's an accurate summary of my position and testimony.

Mr. WIDES. And that's based on your wide experience with the litigation in voter dilution cases prior to Bolden?

Mr. MCDONALD. That's correct.

Mr. WIDES. OK. Now, with respect to those cases, are you familiar with the standard in section 5 preclearance under the Voting Rights Act?

Mr. MCDONALD. Yes; I am.

Mr. WILES. We heard yesterday a reference to several cases by Mr. Burns and others, which were section 5 cases, such as the Williamsburg case. Was the standard applied by the courts in White v. Regester, which is embodied in the Mathias-Kennedy bill, the same section 5 standard that was involved in the Williamsburg case?

Mr. MCDONALD. No.

Mr. WIDES. How did they differ?

Mr. MCDONALD. Well, section 5, as you know, contains a regression standard, so that voting changes which make minorities worse off are objectionable under section 5, but that's clearly not the standard for section 2.

Mr. WIDES. All right, let me turn to the second main question that was raised yesterday, and that is whether the Bolden case would have a devastating impact on civil rights enforcement. Two cases have been held up as the prime example that it would not, the Escambia case and Lodge v. Buxton. Can you comment on each of those again—you touched on them in your testimony just briefly—as to what they show, in your view, about whether Bolden is really not a big problem for civil rights enforcement?

Mr. MCDONALD. Well, I would respectfully take issue with Congressman Hyde, because McMillan v. Escambia County was a smoking gun case. Then Gov. Reuben Askew testified in that case that he was aware that one of the council members had voted to go from a district election system to at large after a black ran for office, because he wanted to avoid "a salt-and-pepper council." That's an explicit statement of racial purpose. If that's not a smoking gun, that will do until we find one.

Mr. WIDES. Would you say that that was an unusually fortuitous circumstance of the Governor coming in and being able to testify to that, or based on your experience would you say it would be fairly common or easy for you to come across evidence of that kind?

Mr. MCDONALD. Well, Mr. Wides, in all of the lawsuits that we have litigated, some 70 voting rights cases, we have never had a public official who would give such testimony. In point of fact, they invariably give precisely the opposite testimony.

Mr. WIDES. They deny racial motive?

Mr. MCDONALD. Absolutely.

Mr. WIDES. With respect to the kinds of procedures that are in effect and have been in effect since prior to 1965 but where there is a choice before the city or county whether they will continue—for example, a referendum—have there been situations where there have been referendums on whether to switch from at-large to other kinds of districting and that has been rejected?

Mr. MCDONALD. Yes, frequently.

Mr. WIDES. In those cases, what has the fifth circuit said now, with respect to those cases, about the ability of a plaintiff's lawyer under Bolden to try to use evidence, whether it's exit polls or statements or the editorial campaign or the political campaign waged as to whether the decision of the electorate in a referendum was a discriminatory purpose action?

Mr. McDONALD. The fifth circuit recently, in the Kirksey case involving reapportionment of the city government in Jackson, has concluded that the motives of the electorate in referenda are immune from judicial inquiry, in the same way that the motives of public officials in choosing particular electoral devices have been suggested to be immune from judicial inquiry by the circuit courts and the Supreme Court itself.

Mr. WIDES. You anticipated my next question, but with respect to decisions taken by legislative bodies, whether they were city council, county supervisor or State legislature, would it be very easy for plaintiffs to inquire in a court proceeding under the controlling law as to the motives of those legislatures?

Mr. McDONALD. In Arlington Heights, the Supreme Court indicated that a legislative privilege would normally be available, and in this fourth circuit case that we had, Bly v. McLeod, there's a very clear statement—I object to it, admittedly, but a clear statement that it wouldn't be permissible for the courts to inquire into legislative motives.

Mr. WIDES. Would it be true to say, to sum up, then, that in trying to meet the test of Bolden, you would be faced with at least three hurdles in the case of old laws of dead legislators, in the case of new laws passed by legislative bodies, legislators relatively immune from your inquiry as to their purpose, and with respect to the fairly common situation of referendums and measures retained in a decision by the electorate, immunity of the electorate from your inquiry as to their purposes?

Mr. McDONALD. Absolutely.

Mr. WIDES. With respect to the question of whether it is unusual for a statute to require only effect and not intent in the civil rights area, what is the case law, the prevailing and controlling case law with respect to title VII cases under the Civil Rights Act, as to whether plaintiffs need to prove a discriminatory purpose?

Mr. McDONALD. Well, the effects standard is very common to civil rights statutes, as you well know, Mr. Wides.

Mr. WIDES. What about title VII?

Mr. McDONALD. Title VII has an effects standard.

Mr. WIDES. What about title VIII, fair housing under the case law?

Mr. McDONALD. Effects standard as well, I believe.

Mr. WIDES. Those standards are continually upheld by the court, even after the Washington v. Davis and Arlington Heights cases as to what is required at the constitutional level, if you sue directly under the 14th amendment, is that correct?

Mr. McDONALD. Precisely that point was made in the companion case to City of Mobile, that is, City of Rome, in which the Supreme Court——

Mr. WIDES. Now, with respect to the continuation of section 5 on a permanent basis, given a bailout that is not geared to 1992, as the original bill was, I think you were here when Congressman Hyde testified that based on the evidence he heard in the House hearing, there is still very ample record of the need for section 5 in the covered jurisdictions. Did you hear that?

Mr. McDONALD. Yes.

Mr. WIDES Would you agree with his characterization of the House hearing testimony, if you're familiar with it?

Mr. MCDONALD. Absolutely.

Mr. WIDES. In the Rome, Ga., case, decided the same day as Bolden, the Supreme Court addressed the question of whether section 5 might not have continued constitutional validity because we had come so many years from the original evidence concerning 1965, is that correct?

Mr. MCDONALD. Correct.

Mr. WIDES. In an opinion, I believe, by Justice Marshall, the six Justices, including Justice Burger, Justice Blackmun, and Justice Stevens, Justice Marshall indicated that the continued constitutional validity of section 5 was satisfied by the fact that Congress in 1970 and 1975, when they renewed the act, had made renewed findings of the continued need for section 5. Is that right?

Mr. MCDONALD. That's correct.

Mr. WIDES. Would you say, based on your reading of the Rome case, that the comment that Congressman Hyde made—not his comment, but the evidence that he referred to—would satisfy the test laid down by the six Justices in Rome, as to the continued constitutional validity of section 5, even though it's many years since 1964?

Mr. MCDONALD. In my judgment, the record has been made and renewed, and, incidentally, there's an entire section of our report that's devoted precisely to that. It's not hyperbole to say the continuing record of noncompliance with section 5 is spectacular in the covered jurisdictions.

Mr. WIDES. I have just three more questions.

With regard to the bailout, Congressman Hyde raised questions about some of the details of differences between the bailout that he prefers and the bailout that was passed by the House of Representatives. With respect to settlements and consent decrees, although normally the law favors settlements, based on your experience in dealing with communities, would you say that they have been or are likely to settle a case that would require them—let me back up.

As you know, in the Mathias-Kennedy bill, as in the House bill, settlements are only counted as a bar where they result in the cessation of the practice that was challenged. Not all settlements count as a bar. Are counties and cities likely to settle a case requiring them to completely uproot and scramble their election system merely to avoid the inconvenience of a lawsuit, as they might if it was a $3,000 damage action, or are they likely only to do that if their hand was caught in the cookie jar and there's a strong case of a discriminatory system?

Mr. MCDONALD. The worst cases are the ones that are settled by consent decrees. The jurisdictions do so because of, really, the overwhelming evidence that the plaintiffs are able to bring forward. They only settle, I might add, after you do all the work, unfortunately.

Mr. WIDES. Second, with respect to the question of the units that must bail out, Congressman Hyde addressed the question of whether all of the units in the State should have to bail out before the State as a whole can bail out. Under the present bailout law, as addressed in the Rome case, may a county or city that is covered by section 5 and has section 5 obligations, because it is in a State which is covered in its entirety, bail out or must it wait until the whole State bails out?

Mr. McDONALD. It has to wait.

Senator HATCH. Let me interrupt for a second. On consent decrees, maybe you can clarify this for me. How many consent decree cases and bailout cases are made each year, do you know?

Mr. McDONALD. Senator, we have had consent decrees involving some 14 jurisdictions. Now, we've had less cases than that, because in some instances we sued two or three jurisdictions in a case.

Senator HATCH. So how many would you say you average on an annual basis?

Mr. McDONALD. Well, I think on the average we filed about three lawsuits, three dilution lawsuits a year, and the ones that have been settled by consent decrees normally have involved dilution.

Am I answering the question?

Senator HATCH. Yes, however, I missed the last part of your statement there. Would you mind repeating that section.

Mr. McDONALD. The consent decrees that I spoke of, the 14 would have involved dilution claims.

Senator HATCH. So you're saying you file about three a year.

Mr. McDONALD. That is roughly correct, yes. That's a rough approximation.

Senator HATCH. Is the annual rate always under five or is three an average of a greatly varying rate, one to five, made on the basis of your experience with this kind of case over the years.

Mr. McDONALD. Some years, there might have been less, yes. Probably no years more than that.

Senator HATCH. OK, and in total, how many of these cases have been filed, if you know?

Mr. McDONALD. How many have been filed, Senator?

Senator HATCH. Yes.

Mr. McDONALD. Well, let's see, over the past 10 years, we have filed about 70 lawsuits. Not all of those were dilution. I suppose 20 to 25 have been dilution, probably 25 or 30 have been section 5 enforcement suits, and a few criminal defense cases. We've represented clients who were sued for voter fraud, for example, and there have been several of those. The other cases have really included everything else, challenges to felon disfranchisement provisions of State law, malapportionment claims. Georgia even had a law which prohibited a woman from having a residence different from that of her husband for purposes of being a registered voter. We represented a woman who attacked the law in Cain v. Fortson. There are lots of other kinds of cases that make up about a third of our docket.

Senator HATCH. Are you about through, Mr. Wides?

Mr. WIDES. I am. He was in the middle of one, and then I had just one more.

The question I started to ask you relating to—you mentioned that the bailout in the Mathias-Kennedy bill actually makes it easier than present law for individual counties to bailout, so they can't do that now if the whole State is under, but you heard Congressman Hyde suggest that the whole State should not have to wait until each county was eligible to bailout before the State could bailout. Based on your experience with the relationship between the State and the counties in some of the covered jurisdictions, would you comment on that?

Mr. McDONALD. Well, based on my experience in States such as Georgia and South Carolina, the State legislature exercises direct and significant control over the local jurisdictions. For example, in most of our lawsuits in South Carolina, even those that have involved local apportionment plans, such as in Edgefield and Lee County, for example, the State attorney general—a State entity—represented the defendants. I also know that when the local jurisdictions have needed reapportionment plans they generally have gotten the State demographer to develop them. In addition, when the counties have needed legislation, it's the State that enacts it through a bill of local application.

So I think there is such involvement there that it seems entirely fair to require the States, as a condition for bailing out, to insure that the counties that are subject, I think, largely to their control have cleaned up their act.

Mr. WIDES. My last question, Mr. McDonald, for Senator Kennedy is this: Yesterday there was a lot of emphasis on what might be termed hypotheticals at one extreme; that is, whether this law would enforce 30 percent or 50 percent proportional representation, and I know you point out in your testimony, for example, that Congressman Butler's use of that hypothetical in his report simply would not have been found to be a violation of the standard under White v. Regester that is in the bill.

But Senator Kennedy's concern is what the Bolden test would do with respect to the other side of the coin, namely, those counties and towns that you've discussed where it is not a question of whether there will be exact proportional, but where there have been no blacks elected, or virtually no blacks elected, and they've been shutout of the process completely, such as the ones you describe in your testimony.

Now, today it's been suggested that under Bolden and the test in Washington v. Davis for the use of circumstantial evidence in a purpose test, there still would not be a problem. Could you address, as a practical matter, in light of the plurality's opinion in Bolden and what they said about circumstantial evidence there, how you interpret the Bolden case when you are challenging a situation of an extremely clear shutout of blacks or Hispanics from the electoral process?

Mr. McDONALD. We all say what we think Bolden means, but it may even be more to the point to consider what we do or what we have done in light of that decision. I am here to tell you and this subcommittee that as of April 22, 1980, which was the date of the Bolden decision, we have not filed a single dilution lawsuit. The reason we have not done so is that we quite frankly do not know what the law is.

No. 2, to the extent that we do think we know what Bolden means, and that is that circumstantial evidence or the Zimmer factors are not enough to win a case——

Senator HATCH. Could you repeat that, please? I missed that.

Mr. MCDONALD. I say to the extent that a prudent person can guess what the Supreme Court really means in Bolden—and I say guess because it is one of those fragmented decisions with six separate opinions, there's a concurring opinion as to judgment, a concurring opinion as to result, and it goes on. It's difficult to know precisely what the Court is saying.

What the holding of that case is, though, is quite clear. The Bolden plaintiffs lose, and the reason they lost is because the Zimmer evidence, the circumstantial evidence, was not enough to make out a violation.

If black plaintiffs walk into my office, as they have done since that decision, from Taylor County, from Elbert County, or Hart County, for example, and they say, "We have run for office and have never been elected in the city and the county and we want to bring a lawsuit," I have told them, "I quite frankly do not know whether there is any chance for you to win unless you come up with this direct smoking gun thing."

Senator HATCH. Let me interrupt here for a second. My gosh, that's the kind of statement that any attorney would make to a potential client. If your circumstantial evidence doesn't rise to the dignity necessary to give an inference under the Bolden case of intent, sure you're not going to have a case. I've turned people away time and again for only having circumstantial evidence like that on which to base their case.

All the decision held in the Mobile case was that four of the Justices did not feel that the circumstantial evidence rose to the dignity of showing an inference of intent.

Justice White did. He felt that there probably was enough, but the others chose not to agree with him. However, Justice White agreed with them that the intent standard should be the standard in the 15th amendment voting rights cases, and that that was really what it already was.

Simply because a black runs for office and doesn't get elected, I don't think that's circumstantial evidence that everybody in his area is a racist or that there is an illicit, conspiratorial plan in operation to keep him from holding office. Now, there may be, I don't know, but I think you've got to have more than the statement that "I lost the election" on which to establish a case.

Please don't tell this committee, as an attorney, that because an individual comes to you and says, "I lost, therefore I want you to sue," that you would say, "Well, gee, under the Mobile v. Bolden case, that may not be enough circumstantial evidence to get you there." My gosh, I don't know anybody in this world who wouldn't agree that that statement wouldn't and shouldn't be enough circumstantial evidence on which to base a case.

But let's say that the individual comes in and says, "I lost, but they were stopping blacks from voting," or "they were intimidating blacks," or 101 other things. Then perhaps, it would become a matter that the courts could determine.

But standing alone, your assertion about that statement bothers me a great deal, as you are intending it to be interpreted.

Mr. MCDONALD. Let me respond precisely to the two things that you've said.

Senator HATCH. Sure.

Mr. MCDONALD. The Supreme Court in Bolden said that the Zimmer factors were not enough, specifically said they were not enough to make out a violation of the Constitution, and the Zimmer factors included the laundry list of things, a history of discrimination, the lack of access, the continuing effects of discrimination and so on. The Court said that was not enough, and there is no way——

Senator HATCH. I agree with the Court's decision that Zimmer did not apply.

Mr. MCDONALD. And so when these plaintiffs come in from Elbert County, I tell them that the mere fact that they lose is obviously not enough to win a case, but that all the circumstantial evidence, the history, the things which had before been deemed relevant, are not enough for them to win.

Senator HATCH. The courts simply did not agree with you.

Mr. MCDONALD. Let me answer, please. No. 2——

Senator HATCH. Yes, but it didn't agree.

Mr. MCDONALD. Please, Senator, let me finish, because this is important.

Senator HATCH. Go ahead.

Mr. MCDONALD. I do not know of a single case—and I again respectfully challenge you to show me one—that says the mere absence of blacks from office is ever enough to violate either section 2 or the 14th or the 15th amendment. Not only are there no cases that have ever said that, but every case says precisely the opposite.

Mr. WIDES. Mr. McDonald, with regard to the point that Senator Hatch just raised, how would you answer the claim that Lodge v. Buxton shows that you can win under Bolden? That is, why wouldn't you be able to win under similar cases? Suppose you had similar cases with similar fact patterns. Doesn't Lodge v. Buxton show that you're likely to be able to win?

Mr. MCDONALD. Well, as I say, the Supreme Court, I fear, has reservations about Lodge v. Buxton, and not only has the Court agreed to review that case on appeal, but they have issued an injunction staying the implementation of the mandate of the lower court.

No. 2, I've never seen a case in which the plaintiffs prevailed on every single one of the primary Zimmer factors, every single one of the enhancing factors and, moreover, I have yet to read a case in which the Court was as almost intemperate in its characterization of the significance of race as in Burke County.

The Court of Appeals—and I don't think I've ever seen quite as explicit language—said that "the vestiges of racism"—and this is a quote—"encompass the totality of life in Burke County." I honestly, very pragmatically, wonder if plaintiffs in any other case would be able to meet that standard.

Mr. WIDES. Are there comparable cases you have lost since Bolden?

Mr. MCDONALD. I think Cross v. Baxter, to be quite frank, is indistinguishable.

Mr. WIDES. Thank you.

Senator HATCH. Senator Thurmond?

Senator THURMOND. Mr. McDonald, do you live in Atlanta?

Mr. MCDONALD. Yes, I do, Senator.

Senator THURMOND. I know the McDonald family in South Carolina.

Mr. MCDONALD. Yes, sir.

Senator THURMOND. They originally came from Winnsboro. Some moved to Chester, some to Greenwood, some to Columbia. Hayward McDonald is a State senator down there now.

Mr. MCDONALD. Yes, sir. He's my cousin, Your Honor.

Senator THURMOND. Who was your father?

Mr. MCDONALD. Tom McDonald from Winnsboro.

Senator THURMOND. Tom is your father?

Mr. MCDONALD. Yes, sir.

Senator THURMOND. Well, he was a good friend of mine.

Mr. MCDONALD. I know he was, Senator.

Senator THURMOND. We've tried cases together.

Mr. MCDONALD. Yes, sir.

Senator THURMOND. And I had the pleasure of appointing your mother to the State Hospital Board. She is a very lovely woman.

Mr. MCDONALD. And nothing has ever pleased her any more in her life, I might add, Senator, than that appointment. She speaks about it often to me. [Laughter.]

Senator THURMOND. I had just wondered if you were connected with the McDonalds there, because they are all very fine people, and friends of mine.

Mr. MCDONALD. Well, I appreciate that, Senator Thurmond.

Senator THURMOND. I have no questions. Thank you.

Senator HATCH. I knew Senator Thurmond was a legend in his own time, but I didn't realize he knew everybody in the South. [Laughter.]

Mr. MCDONALD. I think he just got my vote when I move back to South Carolina. [Laughter.]

Senator HATCH. Is Senator East here? I understand he has a question.

[No response.]

Senator HATCH. Maybe while we're waiting for Senator East, I might just say that in my opinion the intent standard is not a new standard created by the decision in Mobile or, for that matter, with Washington or Arlington Heights, and I don't believe that you can show me any 14th or 15th amendment case, or, for that matter any other case, prior to those cases which employed anything less than an intent standard to arrive at a decision.

Indeed, it seems to me that an intent standard was normally implicit, even in those cases, which did not state it expressly. It was only after some of the innovative and creative jurisprudential arguments of the 1970's that anyone ever considered the prospect that racial discrimination might not require some demonstration of intent. I believe that is illustrated by an examination of the cases which address this issue.

I would also say that an intent standard does not require direct proof or the necessity of entering the person's mind to prove intent. This has been stated explicitly in the Arlington, Washington, Feeney and Mobile cases. Simply because the Zimmer case did not agree with your evaluation of the value or the merits of a particular set circumstantial evidence does not mean that circumstantial evidence cannot be used to satisfy the test in any case. The fact is, the Court just didn't find the circumstantial evidence in that particular case weighty enough to meet the standards of the intent test.

Now, admittedly, Justice White felt that it could have been sufficient, but the other Justices simply did not agree. The point that Justice White did make, however, was that intent has been the standard, still is the standard, and should continue to be the standard. This is certainly the interpretation I made in my reading of the case.

I don't find the intent standard to be an impossible standard to satisfy. Your desire to make it easier to prove ACLU cases in civil rights is something I think every trial lawyer desires. We all desire to win. We may do that for the most commendable of purposes, because we ourselves understand our clients' cases better than anybody else, and in that interest perhaps we wish there weren't stringent limitations of the evidentiary rules in evidence and in law; but that doesn't mean that the standard is not a good standard.

I think intent is and always has been the 14th and 15th amendment standard. I think the Court has ruled that. It certainly has been ruled to be the standard for the school busing cases. I might add that it's the standard that has been satisfied in cases subsequent to Mobile. I think you have to admit, this is true of both the Escambia and Lodge v. Buxton cases.

Now, those are the problems that I have with what you've been saying here today, at least some of the problems.

Is Senator East here?

[No response.]

Senator HATCH. Can you stay for a little while longer until Senator East gets here, Mr. McDonald, and answer a question or two?

Mr. MCDONALD. Yes, sir, certainly.

Senator HATCH. Why don't we defer any further questions from Mr. McDonald until Senator East gets here. We'll move on to our next witness while we are waiting.

Mr. MCDONALD. Fine.

Senator HATCH. If you can wait until then, we'll give him the opportunity of asking you any questions he desires.

Our next witness will be Professor Barry Gross of the City College of New York. Professor Gross is the author and editor of several recent works on the subject of racial discrimination in the United States.

Professor Gross, we're honored to have you here, as we are all witnesses, and we'll look forward to your testimony at this time.

Senator THURMOND. Mr. Chairman, could I just say a word to Professor Gross?

Professor GROSS. Senator?

Senator THURMOND. Professor Gross, I have an invitation to the White House for lunch in honor of the Roosevelt birthday.

Senator HATCH. I have one, too.

Senator THURMOND. And so I hope you'll excuse me, because I've promised to go, but I just want to say we're glad to have you here.

Professor GROSS. Thank you very much, Senator.

Senator THURMOND. I'll read your testimony with great interest.

Professor GROSS. Thank you, again.

STATEMENT OF PROF. BARRY R. GROSS, YORK COLLEGE, OF THE CITY UNIVERSITY OF NEW YORK

Professor GROSS. Mr. Chairman?

Senator HATCH. Professor Gross.

Professor GROSS. I greatly fear that I'm going to duplicate what Congressman Hyde said so eloquently, but I'll try to say it quickly.

I'd like to begin my testimony by quoting Mr. Justice Brandeis in a 1928 Fourth Amendment case. He wrote, "Men born to freedom are naturally alert to repel invasion of liberty by evil-minded rulers. The greatest danger to liberty lurks in the insidious encroachment of the men of zeal, well-meaning but without understanding."

All eligible of the citizens of the United States are entitled to vote in elections and to have their votes counted. Because that right was so long denied to black citizens, even after its guarantee by the 15th Amendment, special vigilance is now required and will continue to be required. That is the true premise upon which the Voting Rights Act rests.

The act is the central piece of legislation which, together with a congeries of other acts and events, including a rightly rising consciousness of the equality of all Americans, has resulted in a 1,000-percent increase in the number of registered voters in a State like Mississippi, and between 1964 and 1978, it has resulted in a remarkable 1,608-percent increase in the number of black elected officials nationwide.

Clearly, something has been going well. It must be continued. The right to vote, to an unhindered access to the ballot, is one of the fundamental rights guaranteed to all Americans. In view of their shameful treatment, that right was expressly granted to black Americans. But before the 1960's, the guarantee was far too often dishonored. The right continues now to need protection, and the protection must be continued. I think everyone in the debate is agreed on this.

But in the extension or amendment of certain provisions of this legislation, we do not face Armageddon. No matter how the extensions are written, there will be no going back to the bleak days before 1965. We must shake off the siege mentality that already surrounds the issue, and we must look with open eyes at what is the case and what we propose should be the case.

The right to vote needs continual protection, not only because eternal vigilance is the price of liberty, but because for black citizens that liberty is so newly won. The protection of that right must be continued within the bounds of reason, and it must be continued without violating the rights of others.

We face, therefore, what I see as a fundamental question: Is the purpose of the 1965 Voting Rights Act and its amendments uninhibited access to the ballot in an integrated election process, or is that purpose minority political power—seats in proportion to minority population?

The purpose of the act was precisely and only to increase the number of black registered voters. In the 1960's and earlier, to those who fought for it, equality meant equality of opportunity—in this case, the opportunity to vote. We do well to keep this in mind as we contemplate the attempt, and I quote, "to clarify the standard of proof in section 2 voting discrimination cases. . . ."

The alleged clarification actually imports a new standard into the Act, though the committee report disclaims this in the new breath. That new standard is proportional representation, and I believe it's impermissible.

The very language of the amendment proposed for section 2 imports proportional representation into the act where it did not exist before. I quote:

> The fact that members of a minority group have not been elected in numbers equal to their proportion of the population shall not in and of itself constitute a violation of this section.

That language must mean, can only mean, that proportionality is the major factor in judging a violation, that lack of proportionality plus a scintilla of further evidence proves the violations.

The committee report itself bears this out in commentary. I quote:

> The number of minority elected officials is still a fraction of elected officials. Only five percent of elected officials in the Southern covered states are black in an area where 26 percent of the population is black.

Senator HATCH. Your point that the mere lack of proportionality plus one other scintilla proves the validity of a claim in a case seems to be very significant.

Professor GROSS. That is my point, Senator.

Senator HATCH. I don't think many people understand that.

Professor GROSS. But I believe the language can mean only that.

Senator HATCH. I don't see how anybody could deny that point.

Professor GROSS. Well, I think people don't wish to see it.

Senator HATCH. We've just had Mr. McDonald deny that. Or, at least, the way I interpreted what he had to say was that they are not really seeking after proportional representation in this language and in this bill.

Professor GROSS. Well, I believe he's wrong on that issue.

If the intent standard is eliminated in favor of mere result, then if the act is to be implemented, there must be a way to measure the results. What way could that be? We are not told, but language in the report already cited and cases cited by the report make it clear that the impermissible result is dilution of the potential numerical strength of a minority voting block, and the measure of that strength is the number of minority representatives it ought to elect. Either the intention behind some change in voting regulations or structure must be decisive, or lack of proportional result must be decisive. No other standard is offered, and indeed there is no other standard.

Intent is no novel doctrine in the law. The Senator has already made that point several times. For centuries it's been an element in the criminal and tort law of civilized nations. Courts have had little difficulty in handling it. Evidence is easily obtainable. You need not look into a man's head or stumble over a smoking gun. If you want to know whether a man intended to shoot another, you ask how long he had the gun, when he got the ammunition, whether he uttered threats, what the relations were between them, what sort of man he was, the attitudes of both men just before and at the moment of shooting, whether it could reasonably be explained in any other way, who benefits, and the like. Surely, that's not a mystery.

A literature and the line of cases already mentioned has grown up about the issue of intent as a standard in equal protection and voting rights cases. The holdings are plain and unambiguous. They require no clarification. Congressman Hyde has already mentioned Washington v. Davis. I think that's an excellent standard.

In Mobile Mr. Justice Stewart wrote:

> The ultimate question remains whether a discriminatory intent is proved in a given case. Those features such as a majority vote requirement tend naturally to disadvantage any voting minority. They are far from proof of purposeful discrimination against anyone.

A court wishing to make such a determination will have to look at a large number of factors, among them the place of the minority in the jurisdiction, access of its members to the ballot, to schooling, to appointive and elective offices, to slating committees, to municipal services, the current status of minority/majority relations, the level of rhetoric versus the level of reality.

But here, as in other branches of the law, there is no mechanical jurisprudence. There's no legal rule of inference which automatically works. Common sense with a bit of wisdom should enable a court to distinguish a high school principal seating blacks and white separately because he claims it looks better, from a prison warden separating inmates by race during a tense period. Permissible purposes may have differential impact. If we can't suppose commonsense and a bit of wisdom, then our legal system is truly undone.

The House committee report claims that intent must be dropped as a standard because it embodies "highly subjective factors which create inconsistencies among court decisions and confusion about the law." It goes on to cite approvingly many commentators who have said it's difficult or impossible to determine legislative intent or motivation.

Without doubt, this is sometimes the case, but it is also sometimes the case in questions of individual criminal or tortious action as well. From this we can scarcely arrive at the conclusion that it is so in most cases, or that because of this intent must be dropped everywhere in the law.

Jurisdictions will know in advance that changes in voting regulations bear a heavy burden of justification. It is not likely they will cloak them in mystery.

An effects standard denies there are permissible and legitimate purposes for which an alleged minority voting block could be diluted. It also denies there are other reasons why minorities might not elect candidates. If the dilution of a minority potential voting strength or an alleged consequent failure to elect a particular proportion of minority officeholders triggers a violation, then no one could do any of the following:

No jurisdiction containing minority voters could move from single-member districts to at-large voting to break up corruption.

No jurisdiction could annex suburbs to broaden its tax base.

No jurisdiction could annex suburbs to break up restrictive zoning.

No politician could engage in honest gerrymandering.

And, in the unlikely event that Boston decided to annex Brookline for the purposes of integrating its public schools, it would stand in violation.

The effects standard presupposes that the prime and perhaps the sole reason for failure to elect a determinate ratio of minority office holders is impermissible action on the part of the jurisdiction concerned. But Karnig and Welch, two social scientists who take minority proportional in electoral results as desirable, write that far and away the most critical variables affecting the election of black candidates were black resources. Almost without exception, this cluster accounted for the most variation in black candidacy and representation rates.

From the fact that every eligible citizen has the right to be free of hindrance in casting a vote, it does not by any imaginable logic follow that any citizen or group of citizens has the right to win an election or to special representation through the electoral process. This I understand to be the meaning of Mobile.

Proponents of the effects standard and proportional representation have conflated a correct understanding of a right which everyone has to unhindered access to the ballot, with a misunderstanding of a second right, to be free of hindrance in the attempt to form groups and launch candidates. From this they attempt to derive a third but nonexistent right: to be represented as groups in electoral results and numbers reflecting their voting strength. This they attempt to buttress by arguing that unless there is some such right, their votes have lost full value.

But this must be wrong. There is no constitutional right like this. The value of a vote is full when it is freely cast and accurately counted. There is no other right nor value. And I quote from John Hart Ely:

> * * * [There must be juries, but no one has a constitutional right to sit on one. Nor has any of us a constitutional right to have the boundaries of Tuskegee drawn to include his house. The point of Gomillion v. Lightfoot * * * was that * * * nonconstitutional right was distributed on an unconstitutional basis.

Senator HATCH. Professor Gross, if we could, your time is up. I wonder if we can put the rest of your statement in the record as though read?

Professor GROSS. With great pleasure, Senator.

Senator HATCH. We appreciate it. I'd like to have a little more time for questions.

On the point, concerning the Gomillion case, Mr. McDonald indicated that that case basically did not involve intent. But as I read that case, it appeared to me that they simply assumed that there was intent because of the outrageous 28-faceted instance of gerrymandering that existed. Am I incorrect in that interpretation?

Professor GROSS. No; I'm not a constitutional expert, Senator, but I believe that's true. That's my reading of the case, that intent was inferred.

Senator HATCH. Well, let me ask you this: You've indicated that should section 2 pass in its present form that it is going to be interpreted to impinge upon every major city in this country.

Professor GROSS. I believe that's true, yes.

Senator HATCH. Even if Boston brought in a nearby suburb for annexation for the purpose of upgrading its school system or something like that, it would be clearly objectionable in the eyes of proponents of the section 2 change.

Professor GROSS. I think it would have to be struck down under this standard, yes.

Senator HATCH. Why, then, would you think that a large number of individuals would support this type of a change? What possible objective could they hope to achieve through the passage of such a change.

Professor GROSS. I don't expect anyone's thought it through. I expect that people want results. Mr. McDonald is a lawyer, and evidently a very good one. He litigates cases. He likes to get good results. He's on the right side, and anything that will help him——

Senator HATCH. But I want to get good results, too. I don't want discrimination in this country, but it seems to me that if this section 2 becomes the law, then there will exist a propensity toward creating all black districts representing blacks, all white districts representing whites, all Hispanic districts—with each group having the right to come in and claim that they have a right to be represented in this manner.

Professor GROSS. Well, I think that's true, but there's another problem, of course, that—— Senator HATCH. Don't you find even the suggestion of implementing such a color conscious system reprehensible?

Professor GROSS. That is, I think, constitutionally impermissible. I believe it to be absolutely reprehensible. The Constitution, as I read it, speaks only of individuals and political subdivisions. I know of no provision that makes any room for proportional representation.

Senator HATCH. I made the point yesterday that politicians should be representing individuals, not blocks of special interests.

Professor GROSS. I believe that's true.

Senator HATCH. Doesn't this proposed bill move us toward representing blocks of special interest?

Professor GROSS. I believe that whites can represent blacks and blacks can represent whites, because we're all citizens.

Senator HATCH. I do, too. Would you describe for us, as specifically as possible, the relative merits and disadvantages of a system of representation based upon interest groups, as opposed to a system of representation in which the individual is the primary unit?

Professor GROSS. Oh, yes. You'll form factions much more easily, factions more liable to be unstable. I think you'll increase racial polarization. You'll have a serious problem, because you have a great many minorities, not just one. In New York, we have quite a few, you may have noticed. They don't all have the same interests. Not all members of one minority have the same interest.

I think that what you will do is to keep people apart, and I understood the purpose of the Voting Rights Act was to bring people together. I don't see how that can be done under a proportional representation standard, and I can't see any other interpretation of that language.

Senator HATCH. As you know, the amended version of section 2 in S. 1992 contains a disclaimer provision with respect to proportional representation. In your opinion, what would be the effect of that disclaimer provision?

Professor GROSS. The effect of that disclaimer is to make it the most important thing to look for. That's how I would read it if I were a judge

Senator HATCH. When you summed it up and said that proof of at-large voting, plus any scintilla of any other evidence, would constitute a violation under the new bill——

Professor GROSS. Yes, and the other evidence would be clearly secondary. This would be the major factor.

Senator HATCH. The point I made yesterday in the hypotheticals I posed to Senator Kennedy and Senator Mathias was that the city would not even have to try to annex a suburb to have all kinds of difficulties under section 2. All they would have to do is recognize that there is a smaller percentage of blacks being represented, disproportionate to the percentage of blacks living within the city of Boston, to be found in violation under the new bill. Isn't that correct?

Professor GROSS. That's quite true. Or, if in one election, let's say 15 percent of the population is black, 5 percent of the representatives were black, and in the next election it went down to four. You might have a case.

Senator HATCH. I presume that would also be true about New York.

Professor GROSS. Well, it certainly seems to be, yes.

Senator HATCH. It would certainly be true about Cleveland, wouldn't it?

Professor GROSS. Well, it is true about New York. I can't think of a more sterile dispute than over the city council redistricting now going on in New York, where the representation rate has dropped from 19 percent to 18 percent.

Senator HATCH. Well, if this change in section 2, is passed, then it becomes a much bigger dispute than ever, doesn't it?

Professor GROSS. Yes; so then it becomes——

Senator HATCH. Cut and dried?

Professor GROSS. Cut and dried.

Senator HATCH. In other words, there is no dispute; there would simply have to be proportional representation in those areas?

Professor GROSS. That's exactly what they're asking.

Senator HATCH. It's the same thing in Cleveland, isn't it in Wilmington, Del.?

Professor GROSS. Yes.

Senator HATCH. In almost any city, correct?

Professor GROSS. Anyone who cares to bring a case will have a much easier case to bring.

Senator HATCH. You know, some Southern Senators might think that they should convey to the people, who live outside of the nine preclearance States, what they've had to endure over the last few years.

Professor GROSS. Well, I think they should, and I think that the debates ought to be widely publicized. I think that you ought to take a great deal of time over this issue.

Senator HATCH. Well, if I were a Southern Senator, the thing I would be concerned about is that this not only worsens the situation for the South, creating divisiveness all over the region, with a system where only blacks represent blacks, whites whites, and polarizing is encouraged, but that it will make the situation considerably worse throughout the entire country as well.

Professor GROSS. Oh, I would think that it would bring every jurisdiction in the country right under the Voting Rights Act. I don't see how anyone could escape.

Senator HATCH. Every jurisdiction will be under the effects test of the Voting Rights Act if this bill is passed.

Professor GROSS. I'm sorry, I did one of those misspeaks that you mentioned before. I meant under litigation.

Senator HATCH. I know what you meant. You meant that the section 2 change would constitute a new element that would automatically bring almost every jurisdiction in this country under its umbrella, with the chance of an overwhelming number of lawsuits once people realized the significance of the changes contained in this particular section.

Professor GROSS. No, I think that's absolutely true. I think it imports a completely new constitutional standard as to who deserves representation.

Senator HATCH. How is an "effective vote" defined in terms of group politics?

Professor GROSS. I would think the only way to define it is that your group has an effective vote if you vote in the proper percentage of people of your group's persuasion, whatever that happens to be. Whatever groups are protected by the act will then have a proportional right to representation.

Senator HATCH. Can it realistically mean anything short of proportional representation?

Professor GROSS. No one has told me yet what it would mean, no.

Senator HATCH. So you're quite positive that it can only mean proportional representation?

Professor GROSS. Yes. I think if you don't mean that, then that amendment ought to be struck out.

Senator HATCH. We've heard a lot of comment today from Mr. McDonald about dilution. Can you explain to me what voting dilution is?

Professor GROSS. I don't know what that means, Senator. I said in my remarks that a vote was full when it was freely cast and accurately counted. They don't dissolve in water. I can't think of anything you can do to dilute them.

Senator HATCH. Would you, for the benefit of this committee, show us what would be cut and dried; summarize if you please the New York City Council debate right now, of which you have been very critical here?

Professor GROSS. I'm sure there are others in the room who can do it better, but I'll try. We had a redistricting after the census. We got 43 council seats, instead of 42. No new minority districts were created. The districts were created in the usual manner. There are currently eight minority members on the city council. All of them voted for the redistricting, and the redistricting indeed preserved all of their seats on the council. That was to be expected.

They didn't apply for preclearance in time originally, because I believe the redistricting came too late and they couldn't get the information there in time. When they did apply for the preclearance, though it is odd that New York should have to preclear, the Justice Department denied it on the ground that the minority population had risen and minority representation had been diluted. I think they had—what was it—from 8 seats out of 42 to 8 seats out of 43. That went down from 19 to 18 percent or something like that.

The city then went back and tried to redistrict. The primarily election was at that time suspended. The city went back and tried to redistrict, and so far has not done so to the satisfaction of the Justice Department.

Senator HATCH. OK, thank you. Senator East?

Senator EAST. Mr. Chairman, I would like just to ask Professor Gross one question.

First of all, I'd like to thank him for his testimony and statement, which I think is very expertly done and very professionally handled.

On this matter of proportional representation, which you say section 2 would in effect ensconce—I just wanted to ask you if my thinking is clear on this—we tend in the discussion, of course, because it comes out of the concern for black voting rights, to assume that it would always be interpreted and applied as far as whether there is a proportional representation of minority strength or a dilution of it.

But in terms of the potential of this section 2, would it not also apply—I think this is now a problem down in the city of Richmond; I mean, it's going to cut both ways—if we ensconce the idea of proportional representation, then, of course, white voters might also claim the same thing; that is, if a black city council altered a district line or some way or other altered the electoral process to dilute the proportional voting strength of the white 50 percent, 51 or 52 percent, would that not be a violation of section also?

Professor GROSS. I would think it would have to be so interpreted, Senator, yes.

Senator EAST. Are we not here in effect ensconcing the status quo of proportional representation based upon certainly race and possibly even ethnic origin? Are we not into those troubled waters?

Professor GROSS. I would think that it would be open to a future Supreme Court to decide that those rights existed for other groups as well, yes.

Senator EAST. It seems to me it does great violence to two fundamental premises. One you've stressed heavily. The first is the purpose of the 15th amendment in the Constitution—and I think we accept that—is to, in any legislation reasonably drafted to that end, ensure the right of the individual to register and vote. That is what is critical as far as voting rights, to register and vote irrespective of race.

Professor GROSS. That's right.

Senator EAST. But when we move into the troubled waters of ensuring results, proportional representation, we add a whole new dimension to the concept of representative democracy in the United States.

Does it not, as a practical matter, mean the at-large concept in cities, for example, would be gone?

Professor GROSS. I would think so, unless you could demonstrate that—— Senator EAST. And then it brings up this very fascinating question that Professor Burns raised yesterday, the whole idea of consensus building, the Madisonian model, where one in a diverse population group—and Congressman Hyde alluded to this—attempts to bring that consensus together and to represent a whole, a composite, the melting pot, if you will. That's obliterated.

I mean, it has fascinating implications in terms of making American politics more parochial, more provincial, more intensified, and maybe that's what we want to do, I don't know. I think it raises enormously fascinating questions of democratic political theory, one, and, of course, as you have rightly said, very fundamental questions of constitutional law.

Because in effect we are saying that we will guarantee proportional representation in election based upon race, be it black, white, or whatever else it might be.

Do I exaggerate the problem? Maybe there's too much rhetorical flourish to it, but do I exaggerate the troubled water we're moving into?

Professor GROSS. Not to me, Senator. I think that that's exactly where we're headed if we make a standard like this.

Senator EAST. Thank you.

Senator HATCH. Senator Grassley?

Senator GRASSLEY. No, I have no questions.

Senator HATCH. Well, thank you, Professor Gross. I think it's important to re-emphasize some of the important points that you've made, and that is that the lack of proportional representation, plus one scintilla of evidence, constitutes a section 2 violation under this particular bill.

Professor GROSS. That's right.

Senator HATCH. And that it will apply to every jurisdiction of any real size in this country.

Professor GROSS. That's right.

Senator HATCH. That it could disrupt jurisdictions who have had no intention whatsoever to discriminate on the basis of race. Is that correct?

Professor GROSS. That's correct.

Senator HATCH. And that it isn't just limited to the South, where there may have been a pattern of discrimination through the years. I think almost every witness has come in and testified that the extraordinary reasons for the Voting Rights Act, to begin with, and the preclearance provisions have basically been satisfied by section 5 of this act, is that correct?

Professor GROSS. I think that's correct, yes, Senator.

Senator HATCH. And when we say lack of proportional representation plus a scintilla constitutes a section 2 violation, we can define "any scintilla" as being any number of bits of proof, such as at-large voting districts.

Professor GROSS. Yes, that would do it.

Senator HATCH. Just that alone could be a sufficient scintilla?

Professor GROSS. That would do it.

Senator HATCH. Reregistration?

Professor GROSS. That would do it.

Senator HATCH. Impediments to independent candidacies?
Professor GROSS. Yes.
Senator HATCH. Economic disparities relating to the registration process?
Professor GROSS. Yes.
Senator HATCH. Limits on single shot voting?
Professor GROSS. Yes.
Senator HATCH. Majority vote requirements?
Professor GROSS. There is almost nothing that you can think up that won't prove it.
Senator HATCH. Well, registration disparities? And there are going to be registration disparities in every city in this country, aren't there?
Professor GROSS. Yes. Mine, for example.
Senator HATCH. In other words, it's mind-boggling to consider the myriad of possible, if not probable, ramifications of these revisions. You can come up with almost any excuse to trigger section 2 against any jurisdiction in this country.
Professor GROSS. That's right.
Senator HATCH. And yet in the House they gave only 1 day to this matter, out of 19 days and 100 witnesses.
Professor GROSS. I believe you're determined to give several more.
Senator HATCH. Yes, I am determined to do that. And, if necessary, several more on the floor.
Professor GROSS. Good.
Senator HATCH. The fact of the matter is that people don't know what in the world is involved here. I don't believe the House Members knew what was involved here.
Professor GROSS. It didn't sound like it.
Senator HATCH. It most certainly did not. And I'm not being critical. I'm saying that this is a difficult, complex issue that you can't just throw aside on the basis of the old arguments claiming that you must be a racist, because you're not just flipping over and going with any suggestion that comes from the so-called civil rights community.
In the process, this change mandates a reverse problem that may turn out to amount to more segregation in the political ghettos.
Professor GROSS. Oh, I think that's exactly what it will do.
Senator HATCH. It has a reverse problem to pit black against white, Hispanic against black.
Professor GROSS. Oh, yes.
Senator HATCH. This is so profound to me, I can't understand why anybody would be for section 2.
Professor GROSS. Well, I can't either.
Senator HATCH. You cannot understand why anybody would be?
Professor GROSS. No, I cannot understand it, Senator, and I hope that you can get your message across.
Senator HATCH. Well, I listened to the two principal sponsors yesterday. I did not receive an awful lot of light from them yesterday on why section 2 is such a wonderful section the way it's written in this so-called Rodino-Kennedy-Mathias bill. I question whether anybody knows the full implications of how really bad this is.

Is there a good reason to do this?

Professor GROSS. I can't think of one.

Senator HATCH. Does this help blacks?

Professor GROSS. I can't think of one, no.

Senator HATCH. Do you think this is going to help end discrimination here? Give me one reason why it will.

Professor GROSS. No. I'm a friendly witness. [Laughter.]

Senator HATCH. Well, I'm glad I have one friend, that's all I can say.

I'll tell you, for the life of me—I'm as concerned about discrimination as anybody, I feel very deeply about it, but I'll tell you, I just don't understand how anybody can make the arguments that have been made on this bill to try and sustain it. I just don't. And I'm listening, I'm paying attention, and yet, I'll tell you, the case law doesn't back up what's been said.

Well, I appreciate your coming in. I'm sorry that I seem a little overly concerned about this.

Professor GROSS. I'm glad to see it.

Senator HATCH. I think this could turn America upside down. This country, every minority group and every individual in this country, stands to be hurt by the proposed legislation which is why it does concern me so.

I think your testimony has certainly been enlightening and extremely helpful on this matter. Perhaps we'll get others; however, who can show us why this is so important, and why this will result in less discrimination in our society, rather than more.

Professor GROSS. I'll be eager to hear it.

Senator HATCH. So will I. Well, thank you, Professor Gross.

Professor GROSS. Thank you.

SUMMARY

All eligible citizens of the United States are entitled to vote in elections and to have their votes counted. Because that right was so long denied to black citizens even after its guarantee by the Fifteenth Ammendment, special vigilence is now required and will continue to be required. That is the true premise upon which the 1965 Voting Rights Act rests.

The language of H.R. 3112, Sec. 2 imports proportional representation into the bill in the very statement of denial. Such a requirement is neither mandated nor permitted by the Constitution. Indeed, it is offensive to it. No one has a right to slate a candidate, or to win an election, or to proportional representation. Every citizen has a Constitutional right to be free of let or hindrance in the attempt to do the first two of these. Those rights are not violated absent actions done with the intent to prevent citizens either from voting or from the attempt to slate candidates. Every eligible citizen has a right to vote. This right is exercised when that vote is freely cast and accurately counted. There is no possibility of a dilution either of the right or the vote. Either the right is abridged and the vote is not freely cast or accurately counted, or it is exercised and the vote is both freely cast and accurately counted. There is no third possibility.

The right to attempt to form an effective political group is properly exercised when states, local jurisdictions, or citizens do no act whose motive is to block the attempt. Burden of proof lies on those who make the accusation that an act is so motivated. Evidence of such motivation can be found by examination of the actions, words, and relations of all parties in context and is no more difficult to produce here than in other branches of the law where motive and intent are also common currency. Upon exhibiting prima facie evidence of such motivation or intent, the burden shifts to defendants to show a substantial and permissible goal which is met at least as well by the action in dispute. Many such goals exist. Failure to discharge this burden convicts initiatrs of the action of the intent.

The Constitution neither provides for nor permits proportional representation for groups. Individuals alone are represented through political subdivisions.

INTRODUCTION

The 1965 Voting Rights Act is the central piece of legislation which, together with a congeries of other acts and events, including a rightly rising consciousness of the equality of all Americans, has resulted in a thousand percent increase in the number of registered black voters in a state like Mississippi between 1964 and 1968.[1] There black registration had jumped from seven percent of the black population to 60 percent. And between 1964 and 1978 it has resulted in a remarkable 1608 percent increase in the number of black elected officials nationwide.[2] Clearly something has been going well. It must be continued. The right to vote, to an unhindered access to the ballot, is one of the fundamental rights guaranteed to all Americans. In view of their shameful treatment that right was expressly granted to black Americans. But, before the mid 1960's the guarantee was far too often dishonored. That right continues now to need protection. The protection must be continued.

All in the debate are, I hope, agreed on this. But in the extension of certain provisions of this legislation we do not face Armageddon. This is no case of all or nothing, of do or die. No matter how the extensions are written there will be no going back to the bleak days Before 1965 because the permanent non-expiring provisions of the Act will not permit that. We must shake off the siege mentality that already surrounds this issue. We must look with open eyes at what is the case and what we propose should be the case.

The right to vote needs continual protection not only because eternal vigilence is the price of liberty, but because for black citizens that liberty is so newly won. The protection of that right must be continued within the bounds of reason and it must be continued without violating the rights of others. We face, therefore, a fundamental question: is the purpose of the 1965 Voting Rights act uninhibited access to the ballot in an integrated election process, or is the purpose minority political power--seats in proportion to minority population?

NEW LANGAUGE AND NEW STANDARDS

The purpose of the 1965 Voting Rights Act was precisely and only to increase the number of registered black voters. In the 1960's and earlier to those who fought for it, equality meant equality of opportunity--in this case the opportunity to vote. We do well to keep this in mind as we contemplate the attempt ". . .to clarify the standard of proof in Section 2 voting discrimination cases. . . ."[3] The alleged clarification actually imports a new standard into the act, though the committee report disclaims it in the same breath. That new standard is proportional representation. It is impermissible.

By the beginning of the 1970's in some circles the definition of equality had begun to be changed from equal opportunity to equal result. Opportunity in employment and elsewhere began to be measured by group parity, by proportional representation. This was not the intent of reformers prior to 1970, nor was it the intent of the 1965 Voting Rights Act. The legislative history of the act makes this abundantly clear. Yet the very language of the amendment proposed in 3112 for Sec. 2 imports proportional representation into the Act where it did not exist before. "The fact that members of a minority group have not been elected in numbers equal to their proportion of the population shall not, in and of itself, constitute a violation of this section."[4]

That language must mean, can only mean that proportionality is the major factor in judging a violation. That lack of proportionality plus a scintilla of further evidence proves violation. Thus does the very denial of proportionality draw it in as a standard. The House Committee Report itself bears this out: "The number of minority elected officials is still a fraction of elected officials . . .[O]nly 5 percent of elected officials in the Southern covered states are black, in an area where 26 percent of the population is black."[5] Could anything be plainer?

Proponents of the amended language deny this. But their denials at best are ingenuous. If the intent standard is eliminated in favor of mere result, then if the act is to be implemented there must be a way to measure results. What way could this be? We are not told, but language in the Report already cited and cases cited by the Report[6] make it clear that the impermissible result is dilution of the potential numerical strength of a minority voting block. And the measure of that strength is the number of minority representatives it "ought" to elect. Either the intention behind some change in voting regulations or structure must be decisive in assessing a violation of the rights of minrity voters, or lack of proportional result must be decisive. No other standard is offered and, indeed, there is no other.

PERMISSIBILITY

There are a great many ways in which one could increase the number of minority voters, or their power, or their participation in the electoral process, if that were the sole consideration at hand. For example, bilingual ballots in jurisdictions meeting certain requirements, but restricted to only five favored linguistic groups, are obviously insufficient to insure full participation of all minority citizens. This purpose could best be carried out my mandating first that electoral materials be printed in every language spoken by any citizen. Indeed, the limitation to election materials hinders. A legislature wishing full participation for non-English speakers would require that candidates and t.v. commentators speak and newspapers write in each such langauge as well.

It has been remarked that black candidacy is hindered in elections where candidates are party affiliated.[7] A legislature intending stronger minority participation would do well, then, to abolish the party system. Alternatively, a legislative body wishing to strengthen minority voting power could award minority group members with multiple votes, adopting J.S. Mill's suggestion that certain of the electorate should have more than one vote. Or, again, minority votes could be lumped together and cast for seats reserved for them. Perhaps minority voters could be compelled to vote, or fined for failing to vote, or, perhaps, the voting age could be lowered for minority voters.

Clearly, one hopes, none of these avenues is likely to be adopted because increasing minority voting power is not the sole goal of a fair democratic electoral system. There are other values and goals which one would hesitate to override. Thus must any change in the standard of proof of discrimination be within the bounds or reason and permissibility. To say it must be reasonable is to say that it must have a chance of passage, a chance of public aceeptance, and a chance of working. To say it must be permissible is to say it must not violate the rights of others nor the Constitution, itself.

INTENT

Intent is no novel doctrine in the law. For centuries it has been an element in the criminal and tort law of civilized nations.[8] Courts have had little difficulty in handling the notion. Evidence is easily obtainable without it being required either to look into a defendant's head or to stumble over a smoking gun. To discover the indicia of intent one looks at the words and actions of a person in their context. If we wish to know whether one man intended to shoot another we ask such questions as how long he had the gun, when he got the ammunition, whether he uttered threats, what the relations were between them, what sort of a man he was, the attitudes of both men just before and at the moment of the shooting, whether it could reasonably be explained in any other way, and the like. Surely, here is no mystery?

> Certainly, motives often remain legally determined after the fact. The basic doctrines of intentional torts and crimes depend, by definition,, on after the fact assessments of motive. All individually enforceable civil rights laws, such as fair employment and fair housing statutes, make the respondant's motivation a determinative issue. In other areas of the law the fact that an act satisfies all formal requisites does not inevitably preclude judicial scrutiny of subjective aspects of the process that produced it. A court will invalidate a duly signed and wittnessed will or confession if it is proved that the author was incompetent or coerced. Judicial reversal of agency decisions that could have been reached properly but were made for improper reasons or pursuant to unlawful proceedures is a norm of administrative law. The principles underlying judicial review of unconstitutional motives are no less applicable to legislative enactments than to other official decisions.[8a]

A literature[9] and a line of cases[10] has grown up about the issue of intent as a standard in equal protection and voting rights cases. Holdings are plain and and unambiguous. They require no "clarification." Writing in Washington Mr, Justice White said[11]

> But our cases have not embraced the proposition that a law or other official act, without regard to whether it reflects a racially discriminatory purpose, is unconstitutional solely because it has a racially disproportionate impact.

> Almost 100 years ago, Strauder v. West Virginia , established that the exclusion of Negroes from grand and petit juries in criminal proceedings violated the Equal Protection Clause, but the fact that a particular jury or series of juries does not statistically reflect the racial composition of the community does not in itself make out an invidious discrimination forbidden by the Clause. "A purpose to discriminate must be present which may be proven by the systematic exclusion of eligible jurymen of the prescribed race or by an unequal application of the law to such an extent as to show intentional discrimination." Akins v. Texas, 325 U.S. 398, 403-404 (1945).

And in Mobile Mr. Justice Stewart wrote,[11a] "The ultimate question remains whether a discriminatory intent has been proved in a given case. . . . [T]hose features . . .such as the majority vote requirement, tend naturally to disadvantage any voting minority. . . .They are far from proof [of] purposeful discrimination against Negro voters."

How are purpose and intent to be g aged in discrimination cases? By the same sorts of indicia used elsewhere in the law. First, one looks in terms of stated goals.

> . . .[A]ssume you have before you a law that classifies in racial terms to the disadvantage of a racial minority, and the state wishes to make an argument in justification of it. Naturally you suspect (le mot just)that the law's motivation was that most naturally suggested by its terms, namely a desire to disadvantage blacks. But you know that is not necessarily the case and so you listen. What would it take to allay your suspicion? To start with, a goal the classification fits as well as it fits the invidious goal you suspect was really operative. For if the goal the state comes up with turns out to fit the classification less well than the invidious one, you will ask yourself why they did not classify in terms more germaine to the goal they are now argu ing, and your suspicion that the goal suggested by the face of the statute was the real one will hardly be allayed. If, however, the goal the state is arguing fits the classification as well as the invidious one. . . you should begin to pause.[12]

This fit, together with the substantiality and permissibility of the goal will prove lack of intent. Poor fit, lack of substantiality or permissibility of goal will prove invidious intent.

A court wishing to make a determination of intent will have to look at an indefinitely large number of factors, among them: the place oc the minority in the jurisdiction, access of its members to the ballot, to schooling, to appointive and elective offices, to slating committees to municipal services, the current status of minority-majority relations, the level of rhetoric versus the level of reality. Here, as in other branches of the law there is no mechanical jurisprudence, no legal rule of inference which will work automatically. But common sense with a bit of wisdom should enable a court to distinguish a high school principal's seating blacks and whites separately for esthetic reaaons from a prison warden's separating inmates by race during a tense period.[13] Permissible purposes may have differential impact.[14] If we cannot suppose common sense and a bit of wisdom, then our legal system is undone.

The House Committee Report claims that intent must be dropped as a standard because it embodies "highly subjective factors" which create "inconsistencies among court decisions . . .and confusion about the law among government officials and voters."[14a] It goes on to cite approvingly many commentators who have said that it is difficult or impossible to determine legislative intent or motivation.[14b] Without doubt, this is sometimes the case. But it is also sometimes the case in questions of individual criminal or tortious actions as well. From this we can scarcely arrive at the conclusions that it is so in most cases or that because of this intent must be dropped everywhere in the law or in human affairs.

Though it is the case that some measures are adopted with little debate by legislatures, both the 1964 Civil Rights Act and the 1965 Voting Rights Act have unusually complete legislative histories. The intent of Congress in passing them is plain for those who will see it. Jurisdictions will know in advance that changes in voting regulations bear a heavy burden of justification. It is not likely they will cloak them in mystery. Indeed, it is hardly possible for them to do so. For the issue is very narrow indeed and the boundry line between permissible and impermissible motive is sharp. Though it is possible that for any piece of randomly chosen legislation it may be difficult to impute motive sometimes, in such narrow bounds as voting this is unlikely in the extreme to occur.

EFFECTS STANDARD

An effects standard denies that there are permissible and legitimate purposes for which an alleged minority voting block could be diluted. It also denies that there are other reasons why a minority might not elect candidates. If the dilution of a minority potential voting strength or an alleged consequent failure to elect a particular proportion of minority office holders triggered a violation, then no jurisdiction could do any of the following which common sense supposes are legimate.

No jurisdiction containing minority voters could move from single member districts to at large voting to break up corruption. No jurisdiction could annex suburbs to broaden its tax base. No jurisdiction could annex suburbs to break up restrictive zoning. No politicial could engage in honest gerrymandering. And, in the unlikely event that Boston decided to annex Brookline for the purpose of integrating its schools, it would stand in violation.

But, are these not legitimate and permissible actions of any jurisdiction? Would not all of them be advantageous to all citizens, majority and minority alike in most circumstances? Under none of these actions is anyone disfranchised. But under an effects standard all would be prohibited. I submit that such a standard would be impermissibly overinclusive.

The effects standard presupposes that the prime, perhaps the sole reason for failure to elect a determinite ratio of minority office holders is impermissible action on the part of the jurisdiction concerned. But Karnig and Welch, two social scientists who take minority proportionality in electoral results as a desireable result, write:

> Far and away the most critical variables [affecting election of black candidates] were black resources. Almost without exception, this cluster accounted for the most variation in the black candidacy and representation rates.[15]
> In the South, black representation is low primarily because blacks have fewer resources. The gaps between blacks and whites in economic and educationall attainments are so great that blacks have difficulty competing politically. The shortage of essential socioeconomic resources . . . constrains black political fortunes in the South and thus helps explain the poor representation level.[16]

This conclusion arrived at after exhaustive analysis makes nonsense of the claim that the effect of "diluting" minority voting power can only be the result of improper causal actions on the part of the majority.

ENTITLEMENT

All eligible citizens of the United States are entitled to vote in elections and to have their votes count. Because that right was so long denied to black citizens even after its guarantee in the Fifteenth Amendment, special vigilance is needed now and continues to be needed. This is the true premise upon which the Voting Rights Act rests.

From this it does not follow by any imaginable logic that any citizen or group of citizens has a right to win an election or to special representation through the electoral process. This is the meaning of Mobile[17] "But those features of that electoral system [at large voting] such as the majrity vote requirement, tend naturally to disadvantage any vpting minority, as we noted in White v. Register 412 U.S. 755. They are far from proof that the at-large electoral scheme represents purposeful discrimination against Negro voters."[18] "The Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment does not require proportional representation as an imperative of political organization."[19] "It is, of course, true that the right of a person to vote draws much of its significance from the political associations that its exercise reflects, but it is an altogether different matter to conclude that political groups themselves have an independant Constitutional claim to representation. And the Court's decisions hold squarely that they do not. [Citations omitted] . . . .The fact is that the Court has sternly set its face against the claim, however phrased, that the Constitution somehow guarantees proportional representation."[20]

Proponents of the effects standard and proportional representation have conflated a correct understanding of a right which all citizens have to unhindered access to the ballot, with a misunderstanding of a second right, to be free of hindrance in the attempt to form groups and launch candidates. Thus they derive a third, but non-existent right: to be represented as a group and in electoral results in numbers reflecting their voting strength. This they attempt to butress by arguing that unless there is some such right, then their votes have lost full value.

But they are wrong. There is no such Constitutional right. The value of a vote is full when it is freely cast and accurately counted. There is no other right nor value. ". . .[T]here must be juries, but no one has a constitutional right to sit on one. Nor has any of us a constitutional right to have the boundaries of Tuskegee drawn to include his house. The point of Gomillion v. Lightfoot, 364 U.S. 339 (1960), was that that nonconstitutional right was distributed on an unconstitutional basis."[21] You have no right to sit on a jury. You do have a right to be free of hindrance from so sitting.

An effects standard marks the shift from the Constitutionally permissible perspective of minority enfranchisement to the Constitutionally impermissible standard of guaranteed minority power. There is a double seduction. First, the powerless will become powerful and the granting of this power serves as a compensation for its previous wrongful denial. Second, it is seductively easy to count. Perhaps partof the reason that the 1965 Voting Rights Act has been hailed as the greatest piece of social legislation in our history is that you can prove it works. Just compare the numbers before and after. Such is also the appeal of the effects standard. Merely compare numbers if you want to see whether there is a violation. Nineteen percent minority representation before and eighteen percent after? Ergo, Violation!! Is there a more fruitless dispute than the current one over the NYC City Council redistricting?[22]

PROPORTIONALITY

The notion that groups are usually represented in elective bodies in proportion to their percentage in the general population is bankrupt in social analysis, in logic, and in Constitutional theory. In fact, groups taken arbitrarily are not so represented, as any analysis by occupation, ethnic background, age, sex, status or any other factor reveals. One reason for this, of course, is that individuals are not naturally added together in any particular way to form a group. Each individual is potentially a member of a large number of different groups. Which group one counts him in depends upon a great many factors, not least of which is the particular interest of the counter at that time.[23]

Where no group is represented in electoral bodies in a proportionate way it is easy, though virtually meaningless, to pick out one set of individuals, band them together into a group and show that they are not proportionately so represented. But, what does this prove? It is tragically true that in the United States discrete and insular minorities have been constituted through historic persecution and indifference to it by a majority of their fellow citizens. However, this gives them no more natural cohesion than any other artificially formed group might have. It requires a further argument to the conclusion that they ought to have special status, to make the case for proprtional representation.

In the case of blacks this move also requires us to maintain both that racial block voting is in fact the norm and that it is, or ought to be a Constitutionally protected norm. For racial block voting to be the norm it is further required that all blacks have the same interests. This is both a political fiction and a racist misperception. As a group blacks have divided interests which vector out on class, business, religious, ethnic, regional, and political lines.[24] Some blacks vote for whites and some whites vote for blacks. Where blacks make up swing votes whites court their votes as they do those of other factions. In Indianapolis, despite Judge Kerner's findings, the Supreme Court discovered no evidence of racial block voting nor of black isolation. Rather, there was regular political intercourse. Failure of election resulted from heavy black Democratic party membership in a largely Republican jurisdiction.[25] In East Carrol Parish blacks received white support[26] and an equitable amount of municipal services. Indeed, if racial block voting were the norm it is hard to see how Mr. Bradley became mayor of Los Angeles, nor how intelligent politicians can conceive of backing him for the governorship of California.

Apart from the artificiality of group construction and lack of racial block voting, there are other reasons for a lack of proportionality in electoral results. Lack of interest in politics, lack of resources[27], lack of political awareness, satisfaction with present representation, scattered population[28] or unfortunate party affiliation all work to that end.

We have, too, to consider whether even if racial block voting were the norm and were permissible, it would be worth protecting. Times change; things change. Change in a divided society is presumably what w we wish. We wish for the divisions to break down. It can scarcely, then, be rational policy to reify these divisions, to supply vested interests which will then work to preserve them. If our goal is one society it bodes ill indeed to create legislatively reasons for preserving its division in two.

The Constitution speaks only of individuals[29] and political subdivisions. There are many theories of political representation and many ways in which people, groups, and interests may be represented.[30] But only one of these is enacted in the Constitution.[31] Individuals choose by election other individuals to represent them from political subdivisons spread out over regions. There is no provision for group representation no matter how shamefully treated they were, nor how tragic their history. The remedy for the vast wrongs inflicted upon black citizens is not more separation but amalgamation within an integrated electoral process where the interests of all are represented as best they can be under the Constitution and with human foibles.

If there is no group representation then lack of proportionality can be no indication of vote "dilution" for there is no such thing. Nor, then, can it be a denial of the right to vote as provided for in the Constitution.

THE RIGHTS OF THE PEOPLE

There are legimate and permissible actions already ennumerated[32] which States may take that have many unmotivated and unintended effects. Among these may be the effect of thining out one or another minority population for voting purposes. It would thus be an infringement of the rights of the citizens of these jurisdictins, white and black, to prohibit such actions. These rights are guaranteed under the Constitution.[33] If there were a right to proportional representation, then in taking some of these actions the states would present a clash of rights—rights in conflict. But there is no right to proportional representation; hence in taking actions permitted to them the people of individual jurisdictions work no Constitutional wrong unless they take such actions with the intent to prevent some group of citizens from forming a partyor launching a candidate. Action so intended is clearly unconstitutional. But action not so intended is not unconstitutional. To deny the people the right to take such action is to abridge their rights unconstitutionally. An effects standard must cause such unconstitutional violation.

MALEFACTORS

Importing an unconstitutional claim to proportional representation, a result standard would label as malefactors those elected officials who took any action impermissible under it. Hence, their right, absent cause, to be free of taint is abridged. Cause may not be imputed by fiat, but must be shown to flow from some legal or Constitutional violation. Where there is none, there can be no cause. Where there is no cause there can be no legal taint. Where there is legal taint without cause, there is violation of rights.

We must take seriously Mr. Justice Brandeis'caveat. In our zeal to right ancient and terrible wrongs we must not create new ones. We must not in legislation attempt to undo what was done and done for the best under the Constitution. The proposed House amendment to the language of Section 2 of the 1965 Voting Rights Act will work just this mischief. We must not agree to it.

Senator HATCH. The next witness will be the Honorable Henry Marsh, the mayor of Richmond, Va.

Mayor, we're very happy to have you here. Welcome to the committee, and we look forward to your testimony.

Go ahead.

STATEMENT OF HON. HENRY L. MARSH III, MAYOR OF THE CITY OF RICHMOND, VA.

Mayor MARSH. Mr. Chairman, members of the subcommittee, and Senators, I appreciate the opportunity to testify before you today on the important questions of extending and strengthening the Voting Rights Act of 1965.

I have a prepared statement which, with your permission, Mr. Chairman, I would like to include in the record of these hearings.

Senator HATCH. It will be included as though fully delivered, without objection.

Mayor MARSH. My name is Henry Marsh, and since 1977 I have been mayor of the city of Richmond, Va. I've held elective office in the city of Richmond for the past 17 years.

In addition to my public service as an elected official of the city, I have also been a practicing attorney for the past 21 years, during which time I have specialized in civil rights and voting rights litigation.

I would like to share with you some of the experiences in Virginia, the black people in Virginia, and it is because of these experiences that I strongly supported the original Mathias-Kennedy bill and testified in support of its companion bill, House rule 3112, before the House subcommittee, and also I am here today to urge your support of Senate bill 1992.

The provisions of this bill, while reflecting a significant compromise, continue the protections essential to the rights of minorities to particpate in the political process.

I think everyone has conceded that the Voting Rights Act should be extended. Some think that the problem of minorities becoming registered voters and voting are over, and that the problem now is dilution of black voting strength. This is not the case. It's certainly not the case in Virginia today. Although the poll tax, the literacy test, and the blank voter registration forms have been effectively outlawed by the Voting Rights Act, serious obstacles to blacks registering and voting and gaining the ballot in Virginia remain.

Just one statistic, according to the 1980 figures from the Bureau of the Census, only 49.7 percent of the eligible black citizens in Virginia are registered to vote, as opposed to 65.4 percent of the eligible whites.

In my written testimony today, I outline many of the problems that the blacks in Virginia experience in registering and voting, but because of the other testimony today and the testimony of the Attorney General, and the admitted need for the extension of the act, I will not dwell on the need for the extension. Instead, I would like to discuss some of the critical questions raised by the testimony and the comments today.

Specifically, I would like to discuss whether the amendment to section 2, as proposed, is needed; and would the section 2 amendment require proportional representation; and, third, would the results test overrule the Mobile decision, and is it inconsistent with the 14th and 15th amendments?

The black organizations and voters in Virginia are strongly committed to the amendment to section 2 of the act to incorporate the results test and consider it just as important as extending the Federal preclearance requirements of section 5 and the bilingual assistance provisions.

This amendment is absolutely necessary to enable the black voters of Virginia to overcome the existing barriers to full political participation in the State. Any effort to pass a bill which omits or eliminates this proposed section 2 amendment would gut the House-passed bill, and would be widely interpreted as providing aid and encouragement to those who seek to maintain racially discriminatory barriers to the meaningful ballot in the State of Virginia and in the Nation.

In the Mobile case, a plurality of the Supreme Court, but not a majority, interpreted section 2 of the Voting Rights Act as it presently exists to require proof of discriminatory intent, and we've heard other summaries of what the various factions of that Court decided.

Congress lacks the authority to overrule the Supreme Court on its interpretation of the Constitution, but it clearly has the authority to address the proper interpretation and construction of the Voting Rights Act protected by section 2 of the Voting Rights Act.

As I said, I am a practicing attorney and for the past 21 years, I have been litigating—and there are practical experiences in proving discrimination in all types of cases. Based on my experience in civil rights litigation, I know that the proof of discriminatory intent generally is not required in cases brought pursuant to our civil rights statutes.

We are all familiar with Griggs v. Duke Power Co. where the Supreme Court held, in a decision written by Chief Justice Warren Burger, that title VII of the Civil Rights Act prohibits employment practices which have a discriminatory effect in absence of an intent, and the absence of an intent is no defense. This holding has been reaffirmed in many cases, Albemarle v. Moody and others.

Similarly, the Court has held that title VI of the Civil Rights Act prohibits actions also which do not have a discriminatory intent but which have a discriminatory effect.

Both of these statutes were enacted pursuant to the congressional enforcement of the 14th amendment, and they show that Congress does have the power, by appropriate legislation, to prohibit discriminatory practices that have an adverse racial result.

For the minority citizens whose votes are being diluted or cancelled out by discriminatory voting laws, proving discriminatory intent is virtually an impossible burden to meet. The intent requirement ultimately demands a determination of what was in the minds of the legislators who enacted a voting law alleged to be discriminatory.

As Judge Amalya Kearse has aptly pointed out, overtly bigoted behavior has become more unfashionable, and evidence of discriminatory intent has become harder to find. Clever men may easily conceal their discriminatory motivations.

The need for this proposed amendment to section 2 and the extreme difficulty of meeting this onerous intent requirement were recently described in the reapportionment litigation, which is discussed extensively in my testimony.

I will not go into a discussion of the details of the case in the interest of time, but this case dramatically demonstrates how the Mobile decision has changed the law in this area. Prior to Mobile, racially discriminatory multimember legislative districts were struck down in the States of Alabama, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, South Carolina in the House, and in Texas, either by Federal courts declaring them unconstitutional under the then-prevailing White v. Regester decision or standard or by section 5 objections of the Attorney General. Now, under Mobile, it is clear that nothing less than a smoking gun, direct evidence of discriminatory intent, will suffice.

I would like to respond to the question that has been raised about whether or not there is a need for proportional representation, or whether or not the proponents of this change are claiming proportional representation, and I would say that really what we are asking for is simply a return to the large body of case law which existed during the 15-year period prior to the Mobile decision.

The White v. Regester case, which was the Supreme Court case, made it clear that the proponents are not seeking any special treatment or proportional representation, and I will quote from the Supreme Court in terms of what kind of proof is required: "To sustain such claims, it is not enough that the racial group allegedly discriminated against has not had legislative seats in proportion to its voting potential. The plaintiff's burden is to produce evidence to support findings that the political processes leading to nomination and election"—and this is critical—"were not equally open to participation by the group in question, that its members had less opportunity than did other residents in the district to participate in the political processes and to elect legislators of their choice, not of their color." This is in the Supreme Court 412 U.S. 765.

Now, under this standard, not all at-large election systems or multimember legislative districts would be prohibited, but only those which are imposed or applied in a manner which accomplishes a discriminatory result and denies minorities equal access to the political process.

The measure of whether a challenged voting law or practice achieves a discriminatory result would be whether it denies minorities equal access to the political process. The standard does not incorporate the more vigorous effects of Beer v. United States; that is, no voting law would be struck down merely because it is retrogressive or leads to a retrogression in the position of racial minorities with respect to their effective exercise of the political process.

Although, according to the Mobile majority, violations of the 14th and 15th amendments require a showing of an intent to discriminate, the section 2 amendment is well within the legislative authority of Congress. For instance, as early as 1966 in South Carolina v. Katzenbach, and as late as 1980 in the case of City of Rome v. United States, the Supreme Court has made it clear that Congress has broad remedial power to enact legislation which goes beyond the specific prohibitions of those amendments to protect the rights secured by the 14th and 15th amendments.

So I think it's clear that the horror stories about proportional representation which we've heard here today are simply not relevant to the discussion that we have. We simply want to restore the law to what it was, and during the period of this law, we have not had an overwhelming avalanche of blacks frustrating the political process. Blacks still constitute 5 percent of the elected officials in an area where they are over 26 percent.

So I can't understand the concern that if we would turn to what we had, it would result in the chaos that some people are predicting.

I would submit that the amendments are very appropriate, and that there is no more basic right provided by the Constitution than the right to vote. The Voting Rights Act has been the most powerful tool devised by Congress to protect that right. The section 2 amendment and the retention of the bailout provisions of this bill are critical to protect the right to vote and to strengthen the guarantees of the Voting Rights Act.

The facts which I have presented demonstrate the compelling need to pass Senate bill 1992.

I'll be happy to respond to any questions.

Senator HATCH. OK, thank you.

[The prepared statement of Hon. Henry L. Marsh III, follows:]

PREPARED STATEMENT OF HON. HENRY L. MARSH

My name is Henry Marsh and I am presently the Mayor of Richmond, Virginia. I have held elective office in the State of Virginia for the last 17 years. I first ran for elected office in 1966 and gained a seat on the nine-member Richmond City Council. In 1970 I was elected Vice-Mayor by my colleagues on the Council and held that position until 1977 when I was elected by the Council to serve as Mayor.

I would like to share with you some of the political experiences of black people in Virginia. It is because of these experiences that I strongly supported the original Mathias-Kennedy bill and testified in support of its companion bill, H.R. 3112 before the House Subcommittee on Civil and Constitutional Rights. I am here today to urge your support of S. 1992. The provisions of this bill, while reflecting a significant compromise, continue protections essential to the right of minorities to participate in the political process.

A. THE NEED FOR EXTENSION OF THE VOTING RIGHTS ACT

The reality of black political participation reflecting the impact of past and present racial discrimination is revealed in statistics which show both progress resulting from the Voting Rights Act and the distance we have yet to go in opening the democratic process to all citizens regardless of race. The number of black elected officials in the state increased from 36 in 1970 to 126 in 1981. It is progress, but blacks are only 4 percent of the 3,599 elected officials in a state where approximately 20 percent of the population in black. Only one black has been elected, since Reconstruction, to the Virginia Senate which has 40 members. There are only four black members of the 100-member House of Delegates. All four of the black House members were elected since 1975 when the Voting Rights Act was last extended. Prior to the passage of the Voting Rights Act there were no black state elected officials.

Continuing discrimination in voter registration

1980 Voter registration figures from the Bureau of the Census also reflect obstacles to equal access to the political process. Only 49.7 percent of eligible blacks are registered to vote compared to a registration level for eligible whites at 65.4 percent. These statistics are significant because they reflect the result—not of the normal give-and-take of politics—but the countinuing impact of racism which denies to black citizens the right to fully participate in the political process.

Some people think that problems of minorities getting registered and voting are over, and that the only problems encountered now are dilution of minority voting strength. That is not the case in Virginia today. Although the poll tax, the literacy test, and blank voter registration forms have been effectively abolished by the Voting Rights Act, serious obstacles to blacks registering to vote and gaining the ballot remain. Many black citizens in Virginia are simply denied a fair opportunity to register to vote. Virginia's voter registration laws prohibit voter registrars from actively soliciting anyone to register (Va. Code § 24.1-46(1): "no registrar shall actively solicit any application for registration") and require registrar's offices to be open only "a minimum of one day a week" (Va. Code § 24.1-49). The following examples show the determination which still exists among some white officials to deny blacks access to the political process.

1. A number of registrars are unwilling to establish additional temporary locations for registration. In Waynesboro, the local NAACP branch put in a timely request for temporary registration site, to be informed by the General Registrar that if she went to the requested shopping center, she would be discriminating against shoppers at the other shopping center. The registrar further indicated that if anyone wanted to register they could do so at City Hall "since everyone is in City Hall at least once a month anyway." The registrar's husband is the chairman of the local electoral board.

2. In the County of Nottoway (39 percent black) where the Central Office for registration is in a different part of the County, the local NAACP requested the registrar to establish a temporary site in the two towns that were preparing for a town council election in 1980. The request was denied by the Registrar who informed branch officials that she had been to one of the towns back in 1956 and she did not register that many people there then. A black was running for one of the council seats and lost by a thin margin in the town of Blackstone which is 43 percent black.

3. In Caroline County which is 43 percent black, the local NAACP branch reported that the General Registrar is negative and indifferent and does not demonstrate a willingness to assist prospective registrants, especially blacks.

4. In Hanover County, which is 13 percent black, the local NAACP branch reports that the request of the Hanover Civic Association to have a black deputized as an Assistant registrar was denied.

5. In Pulaski County, the local NAACP branch reported that the registrar is unwilling to register voters at places other than her office because she feels that "if people are interested enough, they will come to the office."

6. In Mathews County, the General Registrar's office is located in the Mathews Furniture store. There is no identifying sign outside or inside the store to indicate that persons may register there. The registrar's office is in the back of the store and the storeowner is the registrar.

7. In Southampton County, which is 48 percent black, the General Registrar's office is located next door to the sheriff's office.

8. In Mecklenburg County (40 percent black), the Registrar's office is in a sporting goods store.

It is hardly coincidental that a number of registrar's offices have no signs on the outside of buildings to indicate where the registrar is located; yet many of these same locations have signs indicating the offices of the Clerk of the Court and the County Treasurer.

Other practices and problems connected to the electoral process include:

1. There are only 2 black registrars out of a total of 136 in the State of Virginia;

2. Of the 136 local electoral boards, not one has a black majority;

3. There are few assistant or deputy registrars and even fewer blacks serve on the 136 local electoral boards;

4. Most registrars, after purging the rolls, use the single option of posting the names at the courthouse and do not publish the names in a newspaper of general circulation within the jurisdiction;

5. Although the registrar is required to mail a notice to the last known address of the person purged from rolls, failure to mail such notice does not affect the validity of the purge;

6. There are 17 cities and counties where the General Registrar's office is open only 1 day a week and 9 of them are located in cities or counties that are at least 25 percent black or higher. Seven (7) of those cities or counties have only 1 black elected official; 1 county has 2 and the other county has none;

7. There are only 4 counties that are 33 percent black or higher and the registrar's office is open only 2 days per week. Three (3) of the 4 counties have only 1 black elected official.

A major problem in the State is that most registrar's offices in cities and counties are open only 1 or 2 days a week during working hours and some of these are closed during the normal lunch hour.

In Greenville County, which is 57 percent black, and the City of Emporia (40 percent black), the registrar's office is closed even during some regularly scheduled hours. Both locations are open only 1 day per week.

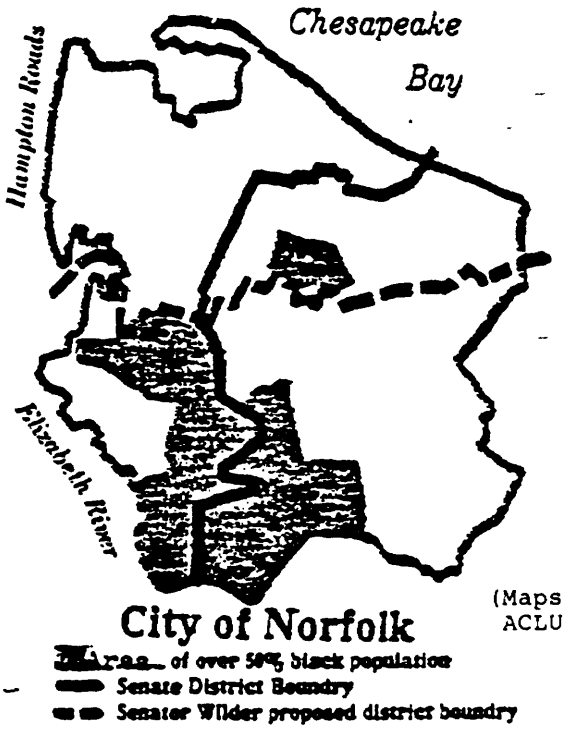
All of these problems—purging of voter registration rolls without giving adequate and personal notice to those purged, refusing to establish voter registration sites convenient to minority voters and maintaining offices at unmarked and unaccessible locations, allowing registration only one day a week during working hours, refusal to appoint qualified blacks to assist in the voter registration and electoral process—effectively deny blacks in many areas of Virginia the opportunity to register and participate in the electoral process. These persistent and continuing problems militate against any weakening of the bailout in S. 1992.

Continuing racial gerrymandering and dilution of black voting strength

In July, 1981, the Attorney General objected pursuant to Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act to Virginia's Senate and House legislative reapportionment plan for unlawful dilution of black voting strength. In both cases, the Attorney General stated that he was unable to conclude that the proposed district lines were drawn without any racially discriminatory purpose or effect. In other words, both plans gerrymandered district lines to dilute black voting strength. These two Section 5 objections were the first Voting Rights Act objections to statewide legislative reapportionment plans drawn up after the 1980 Census. Since then, the Attorney General has objected under Section 5 to the North Carolina congressional redistricting plan, state legislative reapportionment plans in North Carolina, South Carolina and Texas, and city council redistricting plans in New York City and Montgomery, Alabama. We now have a whole new era of recial gerrymandering, and the protections of Section 5 must be continued to stop it.

The recent effort to reapportion the Virginia Senate and House of Delegates amply shows the continued need for the protections of S. 1992. The Virginia legislature has spent more then $1 million, indulged in more than 12 special sessions, and passed five different redistricting plans—it has been a spectacle of resistance to adopting a non-discriminatory plan.

According to the 1980 Census, the City of Norfolk, with 93,987 black residents, has the second largest black population of any city in Virginia and enough to comprise a majority in a Senate district. Census data show that Norfolk's black population is most heavily concentrated in a number of contiguous, majority black voting precincts in the Southern part of the city. In drawing the lines for the two Norfolk Senate districts, the Virginia Senate split this black population concentration almost equally between the two districts. As a result of this division, one district (District 5) was 62 percent white in population and the other district (District 6) was 60 percent white.



(Maps by Judy Goldberg, ACLU of Virginia)

During the floor debate in the Senate, Senator L. Douglas Wilder of Richmond, the only black senator in the 40-member Virginia Senate, strongly criticized this division of black voting strength in Norfolk as racially motivated:

"What we're talking about is a situation that dilutes votes," Wilder said. He added that Norfolk blacks who support single-member districts must be "invisible men" to the city's Senate delegation. And he said, "We haven't injected racism into Virginia politics for a long time."

Sen. Wilder offered a floor amendment to the Senate bill which would have equalized population between the two Norfolk Senate districts without dividing this black population concentration, but the amendment was defeated by a vote of 35 to 3. The proposed floor amendment resulted in a majority black senatorial district which would have been over 52 percent black.

In objecting to this splitting up of black voting strength, the Justice Department noted that "one of the most striking elements of the plan" was its similarity to previous Senate redistricting plan to which the Attorney General objected in 1971, and that "this choice of district lines was made with the full awareness and expectation that it would fragment the black electorate and create two majority white districts."[1] The Justice Department also found that Virginia "presented no plausible non-racial justification for its choice of district lines . . ."

The objected-to House plan reduced the number of majority black districts from three (prior plan) to one (1981 plan), and the number of delegates elected from majority black districts from seven to four.

The district with the highest black percentage (61.09 percent, 1980 Census) in the prior plan was District 30, consisting of the City of Petersburg. Under the new Census, Petersburg lacked the population necessary to remain a correctly-apportioned district. Given the House Privileges and Elections Committee's preference for keeping political subdivision boundaries intact, Petersburg could have been combined with Brunswick, Dinwiddie, Greensville, and Sussex Counties and the City of Emporia in a two-member, 55-percent black district with a population variance of only −0.95 percent. Instead, Petersburg was combined with the adjacent, almost totally white community of Colonial Heights to form a single-member House district which was 60–64 percent white.

[1] Copies of the Attorney General's objection letters are attached to my Statement.

In the prior plan, Colonial Heights had been placed in a two-member district with Chesterfield County, of which it originally was a part, and during the public hearings in March, officials of both Chesterfield County and Colonial Heights testified in favor of retaining this alignment.

The other majority black district which was eliminated in the House plan was District 45, which consisted of the four majority black Southside counties of Charles City (70.62 percent black), Surry (62.50 percent black), Sussex (61.02 percent black), and Greensville (56.64 percent black), and white majority New Kent County and the City of Emporia. Altogether, District 45 was 53.09 percent black in population. In the 1981 plan, all four of these majority black counties were split up and distributed among five separate districts, all of which were majority white in population. In new District 27, Greensville County, which is majority black, and the City of Emporia were connected to Dinwiddie County, with which Greensville County is contiguous only at a point consisting of a two-mile stretch of the Nottoway River.

According to Del. Elise B. Heinz, House Committee members acknowledged in informal conversations that splitting up this majority black district would dilute black voting strength:

It was mentioned in conversation, although not in committee discussion, that open season on Ray Ashworth's district [District 45] would involve, and would—disposing of the counties and city, in that district, would have the effect of diluting the black vote because that was, other than the City of St. Petersburg [sic], the blackest district of the case.

So, once we dismantled it, it wasn't so black anymore. * * *

There were one or two occasions in which somebody at the committee table remarked that, for instance, using one or more of the counties in Ray Ashworth's district to fill out some other district in the neighborhood certainly would not please the black folks, but that is as far as it ever went.

During the House redistricting subcommittee's deliberations, a draft plan respecting all political subdivision boundaries was proposed which would have created a new equipopulous district consisting of portions of the same area with a black population of 52.81 percent and a population variance of only −1.51 percent.

Had it not been for the Voting Rights Act, these plans would have gone into effect. Because of the Act, Virginia was forced to abandon these discriminatory districts and to devise new districts.

Before the General Assembly acted on these new districts, I met with officials of the Justice Department and specifically requested an opportunity to comment on any new districts submitted under Section 5 to replace the discriminatory districts of the objected-to plan. Justice Department officials assured me that there would be adequate opportunity for me to submit my comments to Department officials. Subsequently, this opportunity was denied. The new districts were passed by the General Assembly on August 11, 1981, signed by the Governor, and approved by the Justice Department the same day, without giving any voters affected by the new districts or their representatives any opportunity to comment on them. Instead of going to single-member districts in these affected areas, the Virginia legislature enacted new multi-member districts which diluted black voting strength.

The second plan proposed by the legislature was held unconstitutional by a three-judge federal court in a pending action in which I represent several plaintiffs.[2] The third plan was vetoed by Governor Dalton, in part because of discriminatory multi-member districts. At one point, the legislature passed two plans—one containing multi-member districts for the House and an alternative "fall back" plan of 100 single-member districts in case the multi-member plan was found to discriminate against black voters by either the Attorney General or the three-judge court. The plan finally passed by the legislature in January, 1982 and signed by the governor, uses single-member districts except in Norfolk and has not yet been precleared.

At the county level, 94 counties in Virginia must redistrict as a result of the 1980 Census. Five of these counties are 50 percent black or higher and blacks govern only two of them. Among counties with populations over 40 percent black, four have no blacks on the board of supervisors, five have one black on the board, one has three blacks on the board. Among the thirteen counties with black populations of over 30 percent, 9 have no black county elected officials. Without section 5 coverage, the black citizens of these counties will not have effective protection from discriminatory redistricting.

All but 8 of Virginia's 41 independent cities elect city council members by at-large, citywide voting. Because of Virginia's history of discrimination affecting the right to vote including the "Massive Resistance" of the recent past, the prevalance of racial bloc voting, the staggered-term device, and discriminatory slating, these at-large systems discriminate against black citizens in cities where district elections would provide an opportunity for blacks to elect candidates of their choice. For example, in Hopewell, Virginia where blacks are approximately 20 percent of the population, the city council is elected at-large and has always been all-white. In November, 1981 a referendum to change to a mixed ward-at-large system was overwhelmingly defeated by the white majority. A subsequent poll shows that 61 percent of those whites voting against the change to wards considered race as a factor in their decision.

The recent history of the city of Richmond shows the continued need for the Voting Rights Act. Had it not been for the Voting Rights Act, it is doubtful that I or any other black person could be Mayor of Richmond, even though Richmond has a substantial black voting population. Because of my personal success, and because of my length of public service, I would like to describe the experiences of Richmond under the Voting Rights Act. In doing so, I'd like to highlight the problems black voters face in Virginia and the several reasons why the State of Virginia should continue to meet the Section 5 preclearance requirements of the Act.

In 1966 Richmond was using at-large election schemes for all of the nine seats on the city council. The city had used at-large elections since 1948. In 1966 I was one of three blacks who ran for the council, we all won seats even though I ran as an independent candidate, and the other black candidates were part of a predominately white, well-financed team. Two years later the other two black candidates lost, so that I was the only black member of the City Council.

Richmond's black population during the period from 1966–1970 grew to 52 percent of the total population. Along with its growth came a greater demand for representation in elective office. Voter registration and education became a prority. Because of the election of blacks to the city council the voter registration was stimulated as was the desire for better community services, schools, and a more responsive government.

Just as the enthusiasm grew in 1969, the Mayor or Richmond and a few members of the city council decided to compromise a pending suit to annex portions of Chesterfield County, Virginia with the sole purpose of diluting the black vote. I knew that this change was racially motivated because the news accounts and public statements during that period demonstrate the predominent desire of the negotiators of the 1969 annexation settlement was to acquire 44,000 additional white citizens for Richmond.

In explaining the need for the annexation compromise, Mayor Phil Bagley was quoted at public events stating "I don't want niggers to take over the city." Another indication of their intent was the fact that Mayor Bagley and others who spearheaded the plan moved so quickly that they sacrificed several benefits of expansion such as lucrative industrial sites, tax revenues, and utilities in order to gain 44,000 white voters by the 1970 elections. In addition, the negotiations made no arrangements for schools for the new citizens of Richmond so the students had no place to go.

The leaders of the annexation movement failed to consult with the City Boundary Expansion Coordinator and with the those of us on the City Council who were unlikely to agree with the plan. In fact, it was not submitted to the Justice Department unitl 1971, over a year after the annexation was adopted, and after the 1970 City Council elections. These elections took place in clear violation of the Voting Rights Act. I submit to the committee that had it not been for the annexation of white voters, Walter Kenney, a black candidate for city council in 1970 would have won. Election returns showed that Kenney received a majority of votes in the old city boundaries. The Justice Department lodged an objection to the annexation, but the decision was appealed to the District Court and finally the Supreme Court of the United States. After the 1970 elections, the Supreme Court enjoined all city council elections until litigation was completed in 1977.

The City of Richmond was allowed to retain the annexed portions of Chesterfield County in view of the fact that the City had shifted from at-large elections to single member districts as recommended by the Justice Department. Since 1977, Richmond has had a nine-member city council, five of whom are black.

The point of my discussion of the Richmond annexation suit is to demonstrate that despite the preclearance requirements of the Voting Rights Act, the voting rights of blacks in Richmond were abridged, diluted or otherwise violated for seven years because of the determination of the pre-existing government. Some Virginia legislators will argue that my story about Richmond is history and that Virginia no longer needs preclearance. While progress has been made, it is very recent. Indeed, progress came only because of the protections of the Act, some 107 years after the passage of the 15th Amendment. Four years of the opportunity to effectively participate in the electoral process in the town is hardly indicative of the Act that has outgrown its usefulness.

Other sections of Virginia continue to benefit from the Voting Rights Act. In the City of Petersburg, Virginia, for example, the city government attempted to annex 14 square miles of the surrounding area in 1970. The effect of the annexation would be to reduce the percentage of the black population from 55 to 46 (from a majority to a minority). The annexation combined with the system of at-large elections and a historical pattern of racial bloc-voting had the effect of eliminating the opportunity for black representation. This change was submitted to the Justice Department under Section 5. The Attorney General interposed an objection, the City appealed his decision to the District Court. The District Court as well as the Supreme Court agreed with the Justice Department. The Department stated in their brief in Petersburg v. United States:

". . . in readopting the at-large election system in the context of a significant change of population—from black to white majority—and simultaneously rejecting a proposed ward system, the potential for an adverse and discriminatory voting effect has been written into the Petersburg election law." 410 U.S. 962 (1973).

Petersburg now has ward rather than at-large elections. It has a seven member city council, and three of the council members are black.

When one contrasts and examines the experiences of Richmond and Petersburg under the Voting Rights Act, one has to conclude that the Voting Rights Act provides the opportunity for blacks to have a choice as to who represents them. Prior to the Voting Rights Act, blacks in Petersburg and Richmond had no choice because the at-large election schemes, racial bloc voting, discriminatory annexation, precluded their right to participate effectively in the electoral process. Even though Richmond and Petersburg eventually adopted single-member or ward elections while blacks were a majority of the population, blacks now comprise a majority of the council in Richmond and a minority in Petersburg. The Voting Rights Act does not guarantee proportional representation of blacks nor does it require quotas. It serves as a deterrent to further discrimination.

Some have argued that municipal annexations were not intended to be covered by the Section 5 preclearance requirement, and that the Justice Department has erred in requiring them to be precleared. This view cannot be sustained. The Supreme Court first held that municipal annexations were covered by Section 5 in 1971, only six years after the Act was passed: "Moreover, § 5 was designed to cover changes having a potential for racial discrimination in voting, and such potential inheres in a change in the composition of the electorate affected by an annexation."

Perkins v. Matthews, 400 U.S. 379, 388-89 (1971). This holding was reaffirmed by unanimous Supreme Courts in City of Petersburg v. United States, 410 U.S. 962 (1973) (Powell, J., not participating), and City of Richmond v. United States, 422 U.S. 398 (1975) (Powell, J., not participating).

B. THE NEED FOR A "RESULT" TEST IN SECTION 2

The House-passed bill (H.R. 3112) and S. 1992 amend Section 2 of the Voting Rights Act to prohibit any voting laws and practices which result in a denial or abridgement of the right to vote on account of race. The amendment also provides: "The fact that members of a minority group have not been elected in numbers equal to the group's proportion of the population shall not, in and of itself, constitute a violation of this section."

Black organizations and black voters in Virginia are strongly committed to this amendment to Section 2 of the Act to incorporate this "result" test, and consider it just as important as extending the Federal preclearance requirement of Section 5 and the bilingual assistance provisions. This amendment is absolutely necessary to enable black voters in Virginia to overcome existing barriers to full political participation in the state. Any effort to pass a bill which omits or eliminates this proposed Section 2 amendment would gut the House-passed bill and would be widely interpreted as providing aid and encouragement to those who seek to maintain racially discriminatory barriers to a meaningful ballot in Virginia.

In City of Mobile v. Bolden, 446 U.S. 55 (1980), a plurality of the Supreme Court—but not a majority—interpreted Section 2 of the Voting Rights Act as it presently exists to require proof of discriminatory intent. Justices White, Blackmun, and Stevens did not discuss the statutory issue of the correct interpretation of Section 2, and Justices Marshall and Brennan expressed the view that present Section 2 would prohibit voting laws and practices which are racially discriminatory in purpose or effect. However, a majority of the Court did hold that the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments require proof of discriminatory purpose.

Congress lacks the authority to overrule the Supreme Court on its interpretation of the Constitution, but it clearly has the authority to address the proper interpretation and construction of the rights protected by Section 2 of the Voting Rights Act.

In addition to my public service as an elected office-holder in Virginia, I have been a practicing attorney for the past 21 years, specializing in civil rights and voting rights litigation. Based on my extensive experience in civil rights litigation, I know that proof of discriminatory intent generally is not rquired in cases brought pursuant to our civil rights statutes. For example, in Griggs v. Duke Power Co., 401 U.S. 424 (1971), the Supreme Court held in a decision written by Chief Justice Warren Burger that Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 prohibits employment practices which have a discriminatory effect, and absence of an intent to discriminate is no defense. This holding was reaffirmed in Albermarle Paper Co. v. Moody, 422 U.S. 405, 422 (1975). Similarly, in Lau v. Nichols, 414 U.S. 563, 567-69 (1974), the Supreme Court held that Title VI of the Civil Rights Act prohibits actions having a discriminatory effect.

Both of these statutes were enacted pursuant ot the congressional enforcement provisions of the Fourteenth Amendment. They clearly show that Congress does have the power, by appropriate legislation, to prohibit discriminatory practices that have an adverse racial result.

For minority citizens whose votes are diluted or cancelled out by discriminatory voting laws, proving discriminatory intent is a vitually impossible burden to meet. The intent requirement ultimately demands a determination of what was in the minds of legislators who enacted a voting law alleged to be discriminatory. As Circuit Judge Amalya Kearse has aptly pointed out, overtly bigoted behavior has become more unfashionable, and evidence of discriminatory intent has become harder to find. Clever men may easily conceal their discriminatory motivations.[3]

The need for this proposed amendment to Section 2 and the extreme difficulty of meeting this onerous intent requirement were recently demonstrated in the Viriginia reapportionment litigation. Before and since the Voting Rights Act was enacted, the vast majority of the members of Virginia's House of Delegates have been elected at-large in multi-member districts. Multi-member districts in Virginia minimize and cancel out black voting strength by submerging black population concentrations large enough for separate representation in white citywide and districtwide majorities. As a result, although Virginia is 20 percent black, there are only four black delegates (4 percent) in the 100-member House of Delegates.

In April, 1981 the Virginia General Assembly enacted a new statewide reapportionment plan for the House of Delegates in which 33 of the 52 districts were multimember and floterial districts with at-large voting. Black voters whose voting strength was diluted by the new plan filed suit, alleging that the new plan was unconstitutionally malapportioned and also unconstitutionally diluted black voting strength through racial gerrymandering and multi-member districts. When the new plan was submitted to the Justice Department for preclearance under Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act, the Attorney General objected to racial gerrymandering of district lines. However, no objection was lodged to the discriminatory multi-member districts, apparently because of the Supreme Court's decision in Beer v. United States, 425 U.S. 130, 138-39 (1976), holding that at-large voting schemes instituted before the effective date of the Voting Rights Act were not subject to Section 5 review.

After the General Assembly revised the House plan to meet the Attorney General's objection, a three-judge District Court held the plan unconstitutional for failing to meet the one-person, one-vote requirement. Cosner v. Dalton, 522 F. Supp. 350 (E.D. Va. 1981) (three-judge court). However, the District Court rejected plaintiffs' contentions that multi-member districts were unconstitutional for dilution of black voting strength. Adverse racial effect, the court held, was not enough, and under the Mobile decision "must be accompanied by proof of purposeful discrimination" (522 F. Supp. at 362). The court noted that the extensive number of multi-member districts was not required by the state's policy of not crossing political subdivision boundaries because "the State could have created more single-member districts without crossing the boundaries of political subdivisions" (id.). Nevertheless, the court held that the apparently indiscriminate creation of many multi-member districts both in predominantly white areas and in areas with black population concentrations "negates the claim of purposeful discrimination" (id.).

This case illustrates the inherent impossibility of overcoming racially discriminatory barriers to minority political participation under the "intent" standard. Indirect and circumstantial evidence of discriminatory purpose was not sufficient, because the record in the Cosner case contained extensive circumstantial evidence from which a reasonable inference of discriminatory intent could be drawn. Virginia has an extensive past history of racial discrimination and disfranchisement of its black citizens; multi-member districts have a severe discriminatory impact; numerous black organizations and black citizens in the public hearings which preceded enactment of the plan pointed out the discriminatory features of multi-member districts, and therefore this discriminatory impact was inevitable and readily foreseeable; discriminatory multi-member districts were not the unavoidable consequence of a legitimate state policy of preserving political subdivision boundaries; and there were departures from the normal and required state procedures when the House Privileges and Elections Committee unlawfully excluded members of the public and press from committee meetings on the plan.

[3] Robinson v. 12 Lofts Realty, Inc., 610 F.2d 1032, 1043 (2d. Cir. 1979).

This case also dramatically demonstrates how the Mobile decision has changed the law in this area. Prior to Mobile, racially discriminatory multi-member legislative districts were struck down in Alabama, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, South Carolina (House only), and Texas, either by Federal courts declaring them unconstitutional under the then-prevailing White v. Regester, 412 U.S. 755 (1973), standard or by Section 5 objections of the Attorney General. Now, under Mobile, it appears that nothing less than a "smoking gun," direct evidence of discriminatory intent, will suffice.

The Mobile decision has brought efforts to overcome discriminatory barriers to minority political participation almost to a complete halt. In the twenty-one months since that decision, minority voters challenging structural barriers to electoral participation have been successful in only two cases decided at the appellate level. In McMillan v. Escambia County, 638 F.2d 1239 (5th Cir. 1981), there was a "smoking gun." Lodge v. Buxton, 639 F.2d 1358 (5th Cir. 1981), is the only post-Mobile case in which an appellate court sustained plaintiffs' claims on the basis of circumstantial evidence, and that case currently is on appeal to the Supreme Court and the Supreme Court has scheduled plenary oral argument. In two companion cases, Cross v. Baxter, 639 F.2d 1383 (5th Cir. 1981), and Thomasville Branch, NAACP v. Thomas County, 639 F.2d 1384 (5th Cir. 1981), plaintiffs lost on facts virtually identical to those present in Lodge.

The "intent" test is detrimental to equal black political participation in Virginia in other ways, as well. In Virginia, all but eight of the 41 independent cities elect all members of their city councils in at-large, citywide voting. As a result, Virginia has the lowest number of black municipal elected officials of any state covered by the Voting Rights Act. In some cities, black city council members have been elected in at-large voting, but in the vast majority of cities at-large voting prevents black citizens from electing municipal officials of their choice. The discriminatory impact of at-large municipal elections in Virginia has been previously noted. A 1979 study by the Institute of Government of the University of Virginia concluded: "In summary, both the national data and the Virginia data on the impact of at-large elections show a general (if inconsistent) relationship between at-large election and depressed levels of minority representation on local governing boards."[4]

Similarly, a 1977 study by the Virginia Municipal League found:

". . . [W]hite males dominate the office of council member in Virginia cities and towns, although a marked increase in the numbers of females and blacks have been noted since 1970. Nevertheless, the percentages of females and blacks serving on council are still quite small.[5]

According to this survey, of the 873 city and town council members in Virginia, only 54 (6 percent) are black in a state which is 20 percent black. Because they were adopted before 1964, none of these municipal at-large election systems are covered by the preclearance requirement of Section 5. Because city council members are all elected at-large, no redistricting is required to adjust for changes in population. The only time they are subjected to Section 5 scrutiny is when these municipalities attempt further to dilute black voting strength by municipal annexations, as in the Richmond and Petersburg cases.

Proving that these discriminatory at-large election systems were adopted for a discriminatory purpose would be extremely difficult. Most of these municipal at-large election systems were originally adopted years ago by city council members and legislators who are now dead. As the Birmingham (Alabama) Post-Herald noted in an editorial supporting the House-passed Section 2 amendment: "It would be a neat trick to subpoena them from their graves for testimony about their racial motivations."

In addition, the courts have erected other legal barriers to proving discriminatory intent. In Arlington Heights, 429 U.S. 252, 268 (1977), the Supreme Court held that calling legislators to the stand to question them about their motivation "frequently will be barred by privilege." Last month, in Kirksey v. City of Jackson, 663 F.2d 659 (5th Cir. 1981), the Fifth Circuit ruled that the motivation of the voters in adopting and retaining a discriminatory at-large election system by popular referendum is completely immune from judicial scrutiny. Thus, the best sources of legislative motivation are cut off by restrictive court rulings barring important, sometimes critical evidence.

The proposed amendment to Section 2 of the Act would resolve the confusion and difficulties caused by the Mobile decision. In that case the nine Justices of the Supreme Court were unable to agree on a majority opinion setting forth the proper legal standard for proving discriminatory intent. As Justice White noted in dissent, the Mobile decision "leaves the courts below adrift on uncharted seas with respect to how to proceed" (446 U.S. at 103).

The proposed amendment would restore the pre-Mobile standard under which a violation could be established by direct or indirect evidence focusing on the context, nature, and result of the challenged voting law or practice. This standard was followed by the courts for the fifteen-year period prior to Mobile, and is illustrated by the decisions in White v. Regester, 412 U.S. 755 (1973), and Zimmer v. McKeithen, 485 F.2d 1297 (5th Cir. 1973) (en banc), aff'd on other grounds sub non. East Carroll Parish School Board v. Marshall, 424 U.S. 636 (1977). The amendment would make clear that proof of discriminatory intent is not required in cases brought under Section 2. It does not overrule the law as declared in Mobile because, as I indicated earlier, a majority of the Court failed to reach as conclusion on the statutory issue.

The proposed standard does not mandate a simple "effects" test, but, according to its legislative history in the House of Representatives, restores the approach followed in the pre-Mobile cases under which courts must look to the "totality of circumstances." By its express terms, the amendment does not create a right to proportional representation nor mandate racial quotas. This is clear from the prior cases which incorporate the intended standard. As the Supreme Court declared in White v. Register: "To sustain such claims, it is not enough that the racial group allegedly discriminated against has not had legislative seats in proportion to its proportion to its voting potential. The plaintiffs' burden is to produce evidence to support findings that the political processes leading to nomination and election were not equally open to participation by the group in question—that its members had less opportunity than did other residents in the district to participate in the political processes and to elect legislators of their choice."

412 U.S. at 765–66. Under this standard, not all at-large election systems or multimember legislative districts would be prohibited, but only those which are imposed or applied in a manner which accomplishes a discriminatory result and denies minorities equal access to the political process.[6] The measure or whether a challenged voting law or practice achieves a discriminatory result would be whether it denies minorities equal access to the political process. The standard does not incorporate the more vigorous effects test of Beer v. United States, 425 U.S. 130 (1976); no voting law would be struck down merely because it is "retrogressive" or lead to a retrogression in the position of racial minorities with respect to their effective exercise of the electorial franchise.

Although, according to the Mobile majority, violations of the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments require a showing of an intent to discriminate, the Section 2 amendment is well within the legislative authority of Congress. As early as 1966, in South Carolina v. Katzenbach, 383 U.S. 301, and as late as 1980 in City of Rome v. United States, 446 U.S. 156, the Supreme Court has made clear that Congress has broad remedial power to enact legislation which goes beyond the specific prohibitions of those amendments to protect the rights secured by the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments.

C. WHY THE BAILOUT STANDARDS OF THE HOUSE-PASSED BILL SHOULD NOT BE WEAKENED

The House-passed bill—for the first time—allows jurisdictions with a ten-year history of compliance with the Act and which have eliminated discriminatory voting practices and electoral mechanisms to exempt themselves from the Section 5 preclearance requirement. These bailout provisions provide a strong incentive for covered jurisdictions to comply with the Act and to make necessary changes to insure that minority voters have full and equal access to the voting and electoral processes. These bailout provisions are eminently reasonable and permit jurisidictions which are operating in good faith and which have no intent to discriminate against minority voters to bail out.

Any weakening of these bailout provisions would be tantamount to a "back door" repeal of the Voting Rights Act itself. Watering down these bailout requirements would deprive minority voters of the Act's protections in covered jurisidictions which continue to discriminate. Any attack on these bailout provisions constitutes an indirect attack on the Section 5 preclearance requirement itself, which everyone admits still is needed. The Voting Rights Act would become a farce if the bailout section is weakened any further.

Many civil rights organizations have been against any bailout provision from the beginning. However, in order to gain the fullest possible bipartisan support for an effective extension of the Act, a compromise was reached in the House of Representatives on this new bailout provision. This bailout feature is the result of that compromise. It incorporates 90 percent of the features proposed by Representative Henry Hyde in the House deliberations. Efforts to weaken these bailout provisions were defeated by bipartisan votes of 3 to 1 and 2 to 1 on the House floor. On the final vote, the House bill had the unanimous support of the South Carolina, Louisiana and Florida House delegations and received a majority of the votes of the House delegations from Alabama, Georgia, Mississippi, North Carolina, and Texas.

In light of the overwhelming support already demonstrated in Congress for the bailout provisions of the House bill, the burden is on those who oppose them or seek to weaken them to demonstrate by clear and convincing evidence why these bailout criteria are unreasonable. We ask the opponents who seek to weaken these bailout provisions: You tell us why these bailout criteria are unreasonable and can't be met.

The State of Virginia itself would be barred from immediately bailing out because of the Attorney General's Section 5 objections to the House and Senate legislative reapportionment plans last year. This is fair and reasonable. The House of Delegates knew it was trampling on the voting rights of black citizens when it passed the discriminatory House and Senate reapportionment plans. The court record in the Cosner case proves that closed-door sessions and informal off-the-record conversations, House Privileges and Elections Committee members knew that splitting up old District 45 would dilute the black vote in Southside Virginia. In the Senate, Senator Douglas Wilder, pointed out in the floor debate that dividing the black population concentration in Norfolk intentionally diluted the votes of black Norfolk voters, and charged that the Senate plan was racially motivated. These cases were not accidental or unintentional discrimination; the delegates and senators knew exactly what they were doing.

Many Virginia cities and counties have avoided enacting new voting laws which would draw Section 5 objections, and undoubtedly many of them would be able to take advatage of the new bailout provisons. The fact that there have been so few objections in Virginia goes against weakening the bailout criteria. The bailout criteria should not be weakened because the deterrent effect of the Voting Rights Act is so powerful. Because of the Voting Rights Act cities and counties in Virginia have avoided wholesale discrimination which would violate the Act's provisions, but this does not mean that there is not widespread, racial discrimination in Virginia affecting the registration and electoral processes. In a number of cities and counties there are still discriminatory barriers to qualified black citizens registering to vote and participating in the political process. Virginia still has a law on the books which prevents local voter registrars from soliciting or encouraging any person to register to vote. Should localities be able to bail out which still make it as difficult as possible to exercise so fundamental a right as registering to vote? Should jurisdictions be allowed to bail out which only permit voter registration once a week, or where the registrar's office is hidden away in some unmarked place? Should a city or county which has discriminated in the appointment of registrars or deputy registrars, and which has denied black voters the opportunity to serve as election officials be exempted from the coverage of the Voting Rights Act?

The bailout criteria of S. 1992 are designed to ensure that covered jurisdictions such as these provide an "expanded opportunity for convenient registration and voting for every person of voting age" before they are permitted to bail out. They also require "the appointment of minority persons as election officials throughout the jurisdiction and at all stages of the election and registration process" to ensure the fullest possible participation for minority citizens in the registration and electoral processes. There requirements are not impossible to fulfill; indeed, these opportunities should be provided without legal compulsion in any jurisdiction which has a commitment to democratic government.

CONCLUSION

There is no more basic right provided by the Constitution than the right to vote. The Voting Rights Act has been the most powerful tool devised by Congress to protect that right. The Section 2 amendment and retention of the bailout provisions of S. 1992 are critical to protect the right to vote and to strenghten the guarantees of the Voting Rights Act. The facts which I have just presented demonstrate the compelling need to pass S. 1992.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
CIVIL RIGHTS DIVISION,
Washington, D.C., July 17, 1981.

PERKINS WILSON, Esq.,
Assistant Attorney General, Supreme Court Building, 1101 East Broad Street, Richmond, Va.

DEAR MR. WILSON: This is in reference to the reapportionment of the Virginia Senate by Chapter 2, 1981 Acts of the General Assembly (Special Session), submitted to the Attorney General pursuant to Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act of 1965, as amended. Your submission was received on May 19, 1981.

We have given careful consideration to the materials you have submitted, as well as information and comments of other interested parties and information contained in other Department files. On the basis of our review, the Attorney General does not interpose any objection to the Senate reapportionment except with respect to the districts discussed below.

At the outset, we note that on May 7, 1971, the Attorney General found it necessary to interpose an objection to the division line between Senate districts 5 and 6 in the City of Norfolk. At that time the Department concluded that "[t]he division of Senate districts 5 and 6, which divides concentrations of Negro voters, appears contorted and does not conform to natural boundaries", while more natural boundaries appeared feasible, which would have avoided such an adverse effect on the black voting strength. As a result of that objection the 1971 legislation was amended to relocate the boundary between districts 5 and 6 in such a way as to eliminate substantially the bifurcation of black concentrations in the city. As so modified, the plan was precleared on August 13, 1971.

The precleared plan was not implemented because of the lack of accurate data regarding the residence of Naval personnal. Instead, the federal court ordered an interim plan combining districts 5, 6, and 7 into one multi-member district. That plan was to stay in effect until the General Assembly enacted a single-member district plan consistent with legal requirements. See Mahon v. Howell, 410 U.S. 315 (1973).

Our current analysis shows that one of the most striking elements of the plan presently under submission is the similarity of its characteristics to those of the plan objected to in 1971 insofar as districts 5 and 6 are concerned. Our inquiry has revealed that the boundary between districts 5 and 6 in the 1981 plan cuts through the black community in such a way that neither district has more than a 37-percent black population. At the same time, our analysis shows that the Senate rejected an alternative configuration which would have combined contiguous black neighborhoods, producing a district in which black persons would have constituted a majority. There is substantial information that this choice of district lines was made with the full awareness and expectation that it would fragment the black electorate and create two majority white districts.

In its consideration of the current plan, the Virginia Senate was aware that in 1971 the Attorney General had found it necessary to interpose an objection to the then proposed configuration of districts 5 and 6 because those lines appeared unnecessarily to fragment concentrations of black voters, and that that objection had been overcome by the reconstruction of those districts in a way which did not divide the black concentration in the southern part of the city. The Commonwealth has presented no plausible non-racial justification for its choice of district lines in Norfolk, strikingly similar to the unacceptable 1971 plan.

Under these circumstances I am unable to conclude, as I must under the Voting Rights Act, that the presently proposed district lines within Norfolk were drawn without any discriminatory racial purpose of effect. Accordingly, I must, on behalf of the Attorney General, interpose an objection to Chapter 2, 1981 Acts of the Virginia General Assembly (Special Session) insofar as districts 5 and 6 of the plan are concerned.

Of course, as provided by Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act, you have the right to seek a declaratory judgment from the United States District Court for the District of Columbia that this change has neither the purpose nor the effect of denying or abridging the right to vote on account of race, color or membership in a language minority group. In addition, the Procedures for the Administration of section 5 (Section 51.44, 46 Fed. Reg. 878) permit you to request the Attorney General to reconsider the objection. However, until the objection is withdrawn or the judgment from the District of Columbia Court is obtained, the effect of the objection by the Attorney General is to make the reapportionment of the Virginia Senate legally unenforceable with respect to the districts in question.

To enable this Department to meet its responsibliity to enforce the Voting Rights Act, please inform us within twenty days of your receipt of this letter of the course of action the State of Virginia plans to take with respect to this matter. If you have any questions concerning this letter, please feel free to call Carl W. Gabel (202-724-7439), Director of the Section 5 Unit of the Voting Section.

Sincerely,

JAMES P. TURNER,
Acting Assistant Attorney General.

CIVIL RIGHTS DIVISION,

PERKINS WILSON, Esq.,
Assistant Attorney General, Supreme Court Building, 1101 East Broad Street, Richmond, Va. 23219

DEAR MR. WILSON: This is in reference to the reapportionment of the Virginia House of Delegates by Chapter 5, 1981 Acts of the General Assembly (Special Session), submitted to the Attorney General pursuant to Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act of 1965, as amended. Your submission was completed on July 2, 1981. In accordance with your request, this submission has been reviewed on an expedited basis.

Under Section 5, the Commonwealth of Virginia has the burden of proving that its proposed reapportionment does not represent a retrogression in the position of its black residents, and that the new plan was adopted without any racially discriminatory purpose. See Beer v. United States, 425 U.S. 130 (1976). We have carefully reviewed the material you submitted and for the most part find the proposed reapportionment plan to have neither the purpose nor effect of diluting or abridging the voting rights of black citizens.

However, there is one general area where the proposed plan appears to dilute and fragment black voting strength unneccesarily. According to the 1980 census the southern part of the Commonwealth contains five contiguous rural counties with black population majorities (Brunswick, Greensville, Sussex, Surry and Charles City). The nearby City of Petersburg also has a majority black population of 61.09 percent. Under the pre-existing apportionment plan four of the five black majority counties were grouped together with New Kent County to make up District 45, which by 1980 census figures was 53.09 percent black. In the proposed plan each of the five majority black counties is combined with one or more predominently white counties in such a way that there is a black minority in each of the resulting districts (Nos. 26, 27, 35, 41 and 46). We note that one of the resulting districts (No. 27), which combines Nottaway, Dinwiddie and Greensville Counties and Emporia City, connected only be a two mile stretch of the Nottaway River, does not seem to comply with the Commonwealth's standard of compactness. Testimony prepared for the pending lawsuits indicate that the legislature was aware that dispersing the majority black counties that were in former district 45 would necessary dilute the voting strength of blacks in this area.

Similarly, the City of Peterburg is combined in the plan with the virtually all white city of Colonial Heights resulting in a district (No. 28) which is 43.66 percent black. This district was formed notwithstanding the fact that Colonial Heights had historically been associated with Chesterfield County and, in fact, had been combined under the 1971 plan with Chesterfield to form District No. 36 which, with a population of 157,881, could have been continued as a viable three-member district in the new plan. This latter approach was supported by representatives of the Colonial Heights city government. Material submitted to us indicates there are a number of options available that would not have the effect of diluting the voting strength of the black citizens of Petersburg.

Accordingly, after careful consideration of the materials you have submitted, as well as comments and information provided by other interested parties, I am unable to conclude, as I must under the Voting Rights Act, that the submitted plan for the reapportionment of the House of Delegates is free of any racially discriminatory purpose or effect in the described area. For that reason, I must, on behalf of the Attorney General, interpose an objection to Chapter 5 of the 1981 Acts of the General Assembly of Virginia (Special Session) as it affects the district lines in the Southside Petersburg area.

Of course, as provided by Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act, you have the right to seek a declaratory judgment from the United States District Court for the District of Columbia that this change has neither the purpose nor the effect of denying or abridging the right to vote on account of race, color or membership in a language minority group. In addition, the Procedures for the Administration of Section 5 (Section 51.44, 46 Fed. Reg. 878) permit you to request the Attorney General to reconsider the objection. However, until the objection is withdrawn or the judgment from the District of Columbia Court is obtained, the effect of the objection by the Attorney General is to make the reapportionment of the Virgina House of Delegates legally unenforceable with respect to the districts in question.

We are aware that there is a severe time problem if the Commonwealth is to hold timely elections for the General Assembly. Please be assured that we stand ready to do all we can to assure that any future review of such limited changes as may be necessary to comply with the requirements of Section 5 is accomplished in the most expeditious way possible. If you have any questions concerning this letter, please feel free to call Carl W. Gabel (202-724-7439), Director of the Section 5 Unit of the Voting Section.

Sincerely,

WM. BRADFORD REYNOLDS,
Assistant Attorney General.

Senator HATCH. Senator East?

Senator EAST. Mayor, it's a pleasure to have you here this morning, and I appreciate your valuable testimony.

I will keep this short. In your race for mayor in Richmond—I'm just inquiring as a matter of educating myself as a matter of information—what is the electoral mechanism in Richmond for electing a mayor?

Mayor MARSH. Actually, we have a system where nine persons are elected from districts to council, and then the council by majority vote elects the mayor.

Senator EAST. All right.

Mayor MARSH. So I've been elected three times by a vote of at least five of my peers, but I had to run for a seat in a district.

Senator EAST. So in effect what you have in Richmond, it strikes me, is an example of where we could be headed on a nationwide scale if this act goes through, because—am I not correct here—at-large elections would be out. We would be back to district elections. And it strikes me, mayor, that that could tend over a period of time, ironically, to polarize racial attitudes because blacks would only campaign in the black districts for the black votes, whites in the white districts. There isn't any need to go elsewhere, and so there isn't any building of consensus, isn't any need to harmoniously work together in the political process to build a coalition.

I mean, with all due respect to you, I'm sure an outstanding mayor, it means you really need only build your coalition with blacks, that you can—it's just a sheer numbers game; you've got x number of districts, and blacks represent a majority of those districts, and blacks pick a black mayor.

If I'm not mistaken, I think in Richmond right now, certain white groups are contending their voting strength is being diluted. I don't mean to get into pros or cons of that, and I may, of course, not understand the implications of it.

I don't wish to overstate the case, but it strikes me that what you are defending and what you represent, not because you are not an outstanding person and doing an outstanding job, but it shows us the road we're going to be going down, proportional representation, single districts, no at-large elections, no building of consensus.

That's a very fundamental alteration in democratic political theory. As one Senator from the South, where obviously we have this question of building a consensus, obviously Senators run in at-large elections—it makes one sensitive to the broad base, to the broad coalition you represent. You try to find those reasonable points of agreement and consensus and what seems to be practical and realistic and constitutional.

We can't get away with just representing solely and exclusively a particular clientele, be it racial or otherwise, and I'm not too sure that doesn't produce a better form of democracy, in the long run, than ensconcing a system that rewards a provincial single-district representation which allows us to fragment and polarize possibly on race, ethnic origin generally, conceivably ultimately even religious.

I mean, it has endless ramifications, and in terms of building harmony in the great American melting pot, what about that? What would be your reflection on it, since you've been right in the center of this sort of problem?

Mayor MARSH. Senator, that's an excellent question, and I'm very glad you asked that question, and it's a multifaceted question, so I would like to take a few moments to respond.

The reason why we have a ward system in Richmond is because we were running at large up until we had the ward system.

I first was elected in 1966, and I ran at large, and I appealed to all segments of the community. I got at least 30 or 40 percent of the white vote. And we began to get more and more blacks to register to vote because of the Voting Rights Act.

As our numbers grew, I became a part of coalitions with whites to try to gain more influence in the government, and we ran as a team, black and white, to get control of the government from a single-interest minority group, which was business establishment.

As we began to get close to five votes, three black and two white or two black and three white, the whites then broke the rules of the game, and they annexed some surrounding territory, and the testimony was clear that the reason for the annexation was they did not, quote, want the niggers to take over the city. And the mayor made this statement to many people at that time as to his intent.

So because of this, the Attorney General objected to the annexation or the timing of it. What happened was they compromised it quickly to head off an election where they thought this group of blacks and whites working together would take over the city.

We litigated the case for 6 or 7 years, and from 1970 until 1977, we had no elections. We were frozen in office. Finally, the Supreme Court ruled that the city could keep the territory, but because of the discrimination which had been proven in many courts, it had to go to the district system.

Now, we've had district elections since, and I find myself still trying to build the consensus that I was trying to build in the at-large elections. We're doing it from districts, but every mayor in this country knows that if his city is going to survive, he's got to build coalitions with the business community, because the private sector is where the resources are to save cities.

The legislature has the power to kill a city, to choke it off, or to give it the authority to tax to save itself. We have to build coalitions to save our cities, and we have the need for consensus that you're talking about just as badly as we needed it before.

What Richmond is all about is living proof that you have to comply with the rules of the game, and if you cheat and get caught cheating, then there are laws that Congress has passed to deal with that and there are courts that will enforce those laws.

Now, I would suggest that the Richmond case is a good example of why the Voting Rights Act should not be weakened, because were it not for the Voting Rights Act, this would have been a travesty of one of the fundamental principles of America, the promise of America, that race will not be a barrier to participating in the political process.

So I don't think Richmond is an example of why we don't need a strong act.

The other point you raised is——

Senator HATCH. While you're on that point, Mayor, who was the prior mayor who made that statement?

Mayor MARSH. A gentleman named Phillip Bagley.

Senator HATCH. Egley?

Mayor MARSH. Bagley. He was the mayor at the time who negotiated this compromise with the county, and during these negotiations he gave up valuable land, which I wish I had now.

Senator HATCH. Sure thing. He made the statement, "The reason we don't want annexation is that we don't want niggers to take over our city".

Mayor MARSH. Right. And he said other statements—"We don't want another Washington, D.C.," and other statements. It was clear that the reason for the annexation's compromise was to avoid this coalition of blacks and whites working in harmony to gain influence in the city.

Senator EAST. But there my point would be, Mayor, you are suggesting that kind of talk would clearly indicate intent.

Mayor MARSH. Right.

Senator EAST. But, now, we're talking about an effects results test, so that let's say no intent could be shown of that kind of uncalled-for and inflammatory language. Let's say that, just hypothetically speaking, under this section 2, the city of Richmond decided to annex an area having to do with increasing its tax base as a corollary to that—not any intent, but as a corollary—it diminished white or black voting strength, one way or the other. Immediately under section 2, you have a civil rights problem, voting rights problem, because you simply look at the effect; you don't look at intent.

Now, you're offering a classic case of intent, intent to do something deliberately for the sole and overriding purpose of racial discrimination. I don't think that's the issue before us, because that's an agreed-upon proposition.

We're talking about a law that no longer would look for testimony of that kind. And, by the way, that's a good way of showing you can prove intent.

Mayor MARSH. That's a rare situation, extremely rare.

Senator EAST. Well, in any case, be that as it may, you, out of your own mouth, have shown that you can prove intent, and you did prove it in Richmond.

Mayor MARSH. It was a smoking gun. It was a smoking cannon. [Laughter.]

Senator EAST. But, you see, what you're talking about now—we're talking about a wholly different situation, where you don't have to show any intent. You don't even have to look at the total situation. You would simply say, "Is there an alteration, an effect of diminishing of white or black or any other racial minority voting strength," and if you could show that ipso facto, it is concluded, under the currently proposed legislation, that people are being discriminated against for voting purposes on the basis of race, which simply is not true.

Mayor MARSH. No, sir, I respectfully disagree, and I think that that's a good question, because we need to clarify what this section would mean.

I do not interpret this section as asking for an effects test, rather a results test, going back to the standard we had before Mobile, that you have to have more than just the effect. The Supreme Court specifically said that just having a disproportionate number of legislative seats was not enough.

And the plaintiff's burden—now the plaintiff is the person who is challenging the law—the plaintiff's burden is to produce evidence to support findings that the political process leading to the election was not equally open to participation by the groups in question, that its members had less opportunity than the other groups to participate in the political process and to elect the legislators of their choice.

In many cases in Richmond, blacks have voted to elect whites, rejecting other blacks, and so what we are asking for is not proportional representation by this amendment, but the right of minority people, black citizens of this country, to elect the representatives of their choice, and to prove in court, under the new standard, they would have to meet a burden of showing that they were denied equal opportunity to participate in the political process.

I think it's fair and reasonable. It's not a tremendous burden, and I think that this amendment should be supported, and should not be tampered with.

Senator EAST. Maybe this is the focus, then, and this is a fundamental point of disagreement, but as Professor Gross, who has just testified, and Congressman Hyde—granted, they are on the other side on this point, but obviously I think our chairman is alluding to it—as a practical matter, when it comes to interpreting and implementing section 2, though the supporters of it say to the contrary, the practical effect is going to be, in the real world of law and application, proportional application, period. Though they disclaim that, as a practical matter of reading that language and interpreting it and applying it, that's going to be the result.

And if that is—and obviously we've had some very expert political and constitutional testimony saying it is—that is a fundamental constitutional alteration in the American system of voting, and that's what we have. At least I'm deeply concerned about it, and I don't mean to speak for the distinguished Chairman, but I think that's what anguishes him. When such well-intentioned people can disagree over what it means, we'd better get it clarified.

Mayor MARSH. I agree with you, Senator, and that's one issue where I'm in agreement with you and the chairman and Congressman Hyde. I do not want proportional representation to be a requirement of the law. I find that abhorrent to what the law is supposed to mean, and I think maybe it can be clarified by simply putting the clear language in the legislative history.

But I think it is important that the people who pass this bill recognize that we are a long ways from reaching the results that Congress intended to reach in establishing the Voting Rights Act. It's not enough to come 5 percent of the way. We have to get blacks registered to vote to make this American system work.

And even if they are registered, the dilution issue is very important to get meaningful participation, and to do this, we're going to have to have a strong law to prevent the temptation—the existence of the Voting Rights Act for the past few years has prevented a tremendous—the deterrent effect of that act has prevented many, many opportunities for discrimination, and if it's weakened in the least during this extension fight, it will mean that there will be hundreds and thousands of cases of litigation, there will be situations of discrimination which will not be brought to the attention of the court, and the very essence of our American system will be destroyed by persons who would discriminate against minorities.

And this is a real problem. It's going to exist for many, many years, and I would hope that this committee would not do anything to weaken this provision of the bill.

But we are not asking for proportional representation, but we are asking for this amendment to make sure that we can go back to the standard that we've had over the years.

Let me mention one problem. This case was in litigation 5 or 6 or 7 years. It was very expensive to litigate by the plaintiffs, and even when the Supreme Court finally ruled, they approved a plan that was a compromise plan, and so it's important to understand that under these pre-Bolden rules, it's going to be tough, that only a few cases are going to get to the courts. I mean, we're not going to have a revolutionary change if we go back to what we had.

But what some people are proposing is that we stop the slow, steady progress that we've been making for the past 10 or 15 years, and I say that would be a disaster. It will be a disaster for the country if we let that happen.

Senator EAST. Well, if you want to avoid proportional representation, which you say you detest, it occurs to me the only way you can do it in section 2 is to get rid of the effects test, because the effects test automatically, I submit, is going to give you proportional representation.

The only way you can avoid proportional representation, which you deplore, equally as the rest of us, is to have an intent test. You have to show the intent to discriminate on the basis of race in some alteration of the electoral process, and that's one of the great tenets of tort law, as Professor Gross has said, of the criminal law, and I consider that a radical change just on that matter of intent.

But, back to proportional representation, to me you've got to fish or cut bait. If you don't like proportional representation, you have to go for intent. If you're going to go for effects test, you're going to have to live with the logic of your reasoning, proportional representation, and, again, I submit that's contrary to a number of fundamental tenets of democratic political theory in this country, and it's going to send us down the road of proportional representation throughout the United States.

Mayor MARSH. Senator, I appreciate your concern, and I know we all want to reach the day where race will not be a factor in the political process, that whites will be electing blacks and blacks will be electing whites, which is happening on some occasions in this country, and we want that to be the standard.

We are going through a period of dealing with a history where there has been discrimination against blacks in this country, and we are still in that period; and while we are trying to protect the rights of black citizens to vote, it's very important that no law be passed that will stop this effort.

I guess from the point of view of minority, when you ask for the right to participate in the political process, what you're asking for is a right to subject yourself to the will of the majority, anyway, so when you get elected in most situations, you're trying to convince the minority persons that they should go along with your political point of view.

So it's very important that as you try to get yourself in a position to be a minority, to persuade the majority to go along with your point of view, you should not be frustrated in that effort. In Virginia, we have 1 black in 40 members of the Senate, 4 blacks in 100 in the House, even though we're 20 percent of the population. We have to fight and scrap to get those persons elected.

And if you pass a bill that would frustrate us from getting that 1 black, or those 4 blacks out of 100, and 1 out of 40, then you are further frustrating the political process, and I know you wouldn't want to do that, but I'm just trying to say that what we're asking for is an opportunity to use our minority status effectively, and that's not asking for a lot.

So I really think we need to be careful in not turning back the clock, and we want to go back to what we had before the Bolden decision, because the way the Bolden decision is being interpreted, it's being interpreted as requiring an intent requirement, which we don't believe as lawyers that we can meet. It's not a question of winning a case or losing a case; it's a question of breathing life into the promise that voting rights will mean something.

Senator EAST. Well, as always in the law, in the tort law and in the criminal law, if one cannot show intent, as Chairman Hatch has said, one doesn't have a case, and that's the way it ought to be. I think to cave in on that one would get us into a fascinating area of Anglo-American law and one of the fundamental tenets of our law.

All of a sudden we're being told by distinguished lawyers—for example, the ACLU—we ought to get rid of intent as a qualification in determining tort or criminal liability. I'm appalled that the ACLU, for example, of all people, would say that.

We look at collectivities, we look at results, we look at vague things of this kind, and intent gets trampled underfoot. What happens to the great idea of accountability, wrongdoing based upon intention to violate some fundamental premise of statutory constitutional law?

Again, I don't wish to get too long winded here, but when I hear that one batted around, "We can't prove intent, we can't prove our case; therefore, please skew the law so we don't have to prove anything." You know, criminal lawyers can come in here and want the law skewed their way. Prosecutors come in and want it skewed their way. I begin to think we're being double-teamed here, depending on whether lawyers are representing this side or that.

But our responsibility is just to develop a law that does what? That guarantees the right of individual Americans, irrespective of race, to register and vote, period.

Mayor MARSH. I understand.

Senator EAST. But to guarantee results? No. We're going to have to leave that to the world of coalition building out in democratic politics. That's what Mayor Bradley is going to have to do in California, and he'll probably do a very good job of it.

I think this would tend to localize, fragment, and polarize, and probably in the long run adversely affect black elections in this country, who would be better encouraged to get out into the broad mainstream of the electoral process, as Mayor Bradley is going to do, and build those coalitions, Mexicans, blacks, whites, et cetera. And that's where American politics is at its best.

Mayor MARSH. Well, you've raised a good point, Senator, and I would like to respond briefly.

There are several problems with proving intent, which I think we need to recognize. There is a body of law, a substantial body of law, building up that the motives of legislators in enacting their bills are not material, and the Supreme Court mentioned this in the Arlington Heights case, and if this is substantiated, then even if you are lucky enough to overhear the conversation which would be the smoking gun, or you're lucky enough to find a Governor Askew, who has the courage to come out and say what people told him, it might be ruled out of order because it's immaterial. I think there are real problems with using a criminal law standard in this area of protecting something as vital as the right to vote.

And I think that what the White v. Regester standard would do is not just—when I say results test, it's not just looking at the results; it's looking at the totality of the circumstances, and the results would be one of the criteria, but the main thing is there would have to be a showing that there was a denial of equal opportunity to participate that has to be shown in the test.

And I would invite the committee to go back and read those cases, the pre-Bolden cases, and look at the tough standards that the courts require, and I think if you read those standards, the concerns you've had here today would be alleviated. If you look at those standards carefully, I think you would be reassured that the courts are going to protect the rights.

Someone mentioned that representatives from these little hamlets and villages couldn't be here and couldn't get here to this hearing. Let me assure you that the attorneys general of the various States and the Senators and Congressmen from the various States do have the resources to get here, and if there were countervailing arguments, they would be presented here.

The problem is that the Voting Rights Act has not been the problem that it's been put up to be. The Voting Rights Act has not frustrated the American process; it's made it better.

Senator HATCH. Mayor, nobody is disagreeing with that. I think I set the tone at the beginning of these hearings, and I think everybody here feels that the Voting Rights Act should be extended. The question really is with the proposed changes in section 2.

And I might point out that, other than Richmond, every other city of any consequence—or size—in Virginia is an at-large jurisdiction. This is true of Alexandria, Chesapeake, Hampton, Newport News, Portsmouth, Roanoke, or Virginia Beach, they're all at-large jursidictions. Should this pass, every one of those at-large jurisdictions is going to be attacked, and there is no use kidding about it.

And I might also point out that in your statement you were citing the figures in Virginia to show the differential between white and black registration to vote. Now, I think, if I recall correctly, your figures were 65.4 percent of the whites are registered and 49.7 percent of the blacks.

Mayor MARSH. Voting age.

Senator HATCH. I don't think that proves anything, because I don't think that creates any inference of difficulties in actually registering to vote.

Let me give you a good illustration. In Massachusetts, it shows an even greater differential of whites to blacks. In Massachusetts, the white registration is 73.4 percent and black registration is 43.6. I think you can use statistics, but I don't believe that they conclusively prove anything.

I think the Voting Rights Act is working well at getting people to register to vote, and have the right to register and vote. That was what it was established for, and to overcome these extraordinary approaches that literally were foreclosing blacks from the polling place, and from participation in our representative republic. That's no longer true. Every witness has agreed that those extraordinary conditions no longer are there.

That's why I am so concerned about section 2.

Mayor MARSH. Senator, let me respond. I don't pretend to be an expert on Massachusetts. I've been to Boston a few times. I might suggest that there probably are some problems of discrimination in Massachusetts, as well as Virginia, but I do know about Virginia, and my statement is replete——

Senator HATCH. But there's a difference between discrimination under the civil rights laws and the effect of the Voting Rights Act in ending discrimination with regard to the right to register and vote. Now, that's what this discussion is all about.

Mayor MARSH. Right.

Senator HATCH. I think there is discrimination in probably every State in the Union, more or less.

Mayor MARSH. The only point I was making is we have a unique history in Virginia where we had the constitutional convention in 1902, which disenfranchised blacks widespread, eliminated 90 percent of the blacks who were registered to vote openly. They declared that was their purpose.

Senator HATCH. I understand that.

Mayor MARSH. And up until 1965 we had a poll tax, we had all kinds of—— Senator HATCH. There is no question with that assertion, and everybody agrees that should all be wiped out and that the Voting Rights Act should be extended to insure that that never happens again. That isn't the issue.

The issue is really whether section 2 has been given adequate consideration in the House, and the answer to that is absolutely not. I don't see how anybody could disagree with that. And, second, are we going to give it adequate consideration here, when we look at it and the possible results or effects of that particular enactment in the House bill and how it will affect every municipality, county, and State in this Government.

Mayor MARSH. I share your concern, Senator. I would simply say that what the amendment to section 2 would do, in my judgment, is not what some of the Senators seem to think it would do. I believe the amendment would only restore us back to the White v. Regester standard, the standard followed by the Supreme Court prior to Bolden, and I do not believe that result would be harmful. It's clear, the requirements are spelled out, and I think that's much safer than any other approach, and I think if you read those cases carefully, you will see that there are safeguards there to prevent the proportional representation concern that you have.

Senator HATCH. We'll certainly do that. I do disagree that there was any different standard other than Mobile in the past. But be that as it may, that's your opinion, and we'll certainly take note of that, and I'll try to reread some of these cases.

Thank you for coming. We have two more witnesses to go, but we appreciate your testimony.

Were you done, Senator East? I'm sorry.

Senator EAST. I would just like to thank the mayor for coming. Thank you.

Senator HATCH. Oh, I'm sorry, I didn't mean to cut you off.

Senator EAST. No, that's fine. I had more than my opportunity to talk. Thank you.

Thank you, Mayor.

Mayor MARSH. Thank the committee for giving me the chance to appear.

Senator HATCH. Thank you, Mayor. We appreciate your taking time to testify before this committee today.

Our next witness will be the distinguished Representative from Richmond, Va., Representative Thomas Bliley. Representative Bliley was formerly mayor of Richmond himself, and I understand that he served a considerable length of time in that position, not all of which was your own doing, because you were kept on by the courts for an additional 4 years.

Mr. BLILEY. Five.

Senator HATCH. An additional 5 years, excuse me.

Mr. BLILEY. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman, Senator East.

Senator HATCH. We're glad to have you here.

Congressman, we're trying to keep everybody down to 10 minutes. I've been totally unsuccessful today. In the next hearing, I am hopefully going to be more successful. If you can summarize, we'd appreciate it. We'll put your full statement in the record.

I'm running out of time. I have to leave in no less than probably 20 minutes, and I have another witness after you, but we don't want to——

Mr. BLILEY. I won't be 10 minutes, I don't think.

Senator HATCH. That will be fine. I don't want to stop you from making your full statement.

Mr. BLILEY. Thank you. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

STATEMENT OF HON. THOMAS J. BLILEY, JR., A U.S. REPRESENTATIVE, COMMONWEALTH OF VIRGINIA

Mr. BLILEY. I appreciate your allowing me the opportunity to testify before you today. I regret that I couldn't be present for the testimony presented early today, and I hope to have the opportunity to review it.

By some calculations, the debate over the extension of the 1965 Voting Rights Act culminated a few months ago when the House considered H.R. 3112, which was to have extended the act, as it is now written, for another decade.

While opinions may differ on the need for extension—and they do vary widely—the focus of the extension debate has been on the Voting Rights Act as is. Is it still necessary? Or has it outlived its usefulness?

I have serious concerns with the House-passed version of this extension because it deviates from simple extension. It is not a simple extension of the act, nor even as the act has been twice amended.

Section 2 of H.R. 3112 has changed the Voting Rights Act in such a manner as to alter its entire substance. Under the guise of extension, dramatic changes have been slipped through the House.

The 1965 Voting Rights Act and subsequent extensions prohibited acts which deny or abridge the right to vote, yet the House bill before you prohibits acts which result in a denial or abridgement of the right to vote.

With that, I'm going to summarize my remarks, Mr. Chairman, and then avail myself for questions.

There was nothing spelled out in the House bill in 3112 to define what constitutes effects of discrimination, yet the proponents of that amendment said that the reason for it was that there was nothing in the previous language to spell out what intent was.

Well, here we have it left up to the courts, and it surely will be tested in the courts often to determine what it means.

Now, you've heard testimony to say, "Well, it doesn't mean a quota system. It doesn't mean this." But that's left up to the courts.

In 1965, I stipulate to you, it didn't mean annexations were covered by the Voting Rights Act. Indeed, it wasn't until 1971 in Perkins v. Mathews that annexations were covered, or it was definitely decided that they were covered. And I stipulate to you, if this language comes in, the scenario that you presented earlier to the mayor about going into court could very well and probably will happen.

Indeed, last week it was announced in Virginia, at the city of Hopewell, which is a few miles south of Richmond, not in my district, but that the ACLU was moving into court to challenge the election of members of the city council there in Hopewell, because they're elected at large and the minority population is 20 percent, and there hasn't been a minority member elected, therefore, they're going to ask the court to throw the case out.

Now, you tell me if effects were in that law today that it wouldn't be a prima facie case.

Senator HATCH. It would be a prima facie case, in my opinion.

Mr. BLILEY. And to say just because the minority is only 20 percent, that's the only reason that they haven't had a successful election, is wrong, because to the west of Hopewell and to the west of Richmond is the city of Roanoke.

Senator HATCH. Could I add one other thought? It would be simply more than a prima facie case, because what would you rebut it with? Tell me one thing you could rebut it with.

Mr. BLILEY. Not being a lawyer, I couldn't tell you the first, but I'm sure the lawyers would have a very difficult time, though I am sure for the proper consideration they would be glad to take the case on. [Laughter.]

Senator HATCH. You may have summed up the legal profession pretty well. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLILEY. I paid them a lot when I was mayor. I had them all employed in Richmond, either fighting me or defending me, one or the other.

[Laughter.]

Mr. BLILEY. But to get back to the point I was about to make, in the city of Roanoke the minority population is 22 percent, and the registered voting percentage is a little less than 22 percent. Yet the mayor of Roanoke, elected at large, is minority, and the vice mayor of Roanoke is minority.

So to say that in Virginia, if you have at-large elections it automatically discriminates is wrong. In the city of Richmond today, you have five members of the General Assembly elected at large. Two are minority, and we would have the third, who happened to be running as a Republican and did not receive the endorsement of the black political organization. Had he received it, he would have won. We'd have a majority at large.

So that doesn't automatically establish a case, but the point is, if you leave it effects, as is 3112, and not restore it to the original language of intent, you're going to have quota systems set up throughout much of this country that's covered by this act.

And with that, I will stop and be happy to try to answer any questions.

Senator HATCH. Thank you so much.

[The prepared statement of Hon. Thomas J. Bliley, Jr., follows:]

PREPARED STATEMENT OF HON. THOMAS J. BLILEY, JR.

THANK YOU MR. CHAIRMAN, MEMBERS OF THE COMMITTEE. I APPRECIATE YOUR ALLOWING ME TO TESTIFY BEFORE YOU TODAY. I REGRET THAT I COULD NOT BE PRESENT FOR TESTIMONY PRESENTED EARLIER TODAY. I HOPE TO HAVE THE OPPORTUNITY TO REVIEW IT SOON.

BY SOME CALCULATIONS, THE DEBATE OVER EXTENSION OF THE 1965 VOTING RIGHTS ACT CULMINATED A FEW MONTHS AGO WHEN THE HOUSE CONSIDERED H. R. 3112, WHICH WAS TO HAVE EXTENDED THE ACT, AS IT IS NOW WRITTEN, FOR ANOTHER DECADE.

WHILE OPINIONS MAY DIFFER ON THE NEED FOR EXTENSION, AND THEY DO VARY WIDELY, THE FOCUS OF THE EXTENSION DEBATE HAS BEEN ON THE VOTING RIGHTS ACT AS IS: IS IT STILL NECESSARY? OR HAS IT OUTLIVED ITS USEFULNESS?

I HAVE SERIOUS CONCERNS WITH THE HOUSE-PASSED VERSION OF THIS EXTENSION BECAUSE IT DEVIATES FROM SIMPLE EXTENSION. IT IS NOT A SIMPLE EXTENSION OF THE 1965 ACT, NOR EVEN OF THE ACT AS AMENDED TWICE SINCE.

SECTION TWO OF H. R. 3112 HAS CHANGED THE VOTING RIGHTS ACT IN SUCH A MANNER AS TO ALTER ITS ENTIRE SUBSTANCE. UNDER THE GUISE OF EXTENSION, DRAMATIC CHANGES HAVE BEEN SLIPPED THROUGH THE HOUSE.

THE 1965 VOTING RIGHTS ACT, AND SUBSEQUENT EXTENSIONS, PROHIBITED ACTS WHICH "DENY OR ABRIDGE" THE RIGHT TO VOTE, YET THE HOUSE BILL BEFORE YOU PROHIBITS ACTS "WHICH RESULT IN A DENIAL OR ABRIDGEMENT OF" THE RIGHT TO VOTE. IN OTHER WORDS, H. R. 3112 CHANGES THE VOTING RIGHTS ACT FROM ITS PRESENT FOCUS ON INTENTIONAL ACTS TO PROHIBIT ANY LAW OR ACTION WHICH HAS THE EFFECT OF DISCRIMINATION, REGARDLESS OF ANY OTHER PURPOSE OR UTILITY.

MY EXPERIENCE AS MAYOR OF THE CITY OF RICHMOND, VIRGINIA, SHOWS THE FALLACY OF CHANGING INTENT TO EFFECT.

WHEN I WAS ELECTED MAYOR OF RICHMOND IN 1970, IT WAS NOT GENERALLY ACCEPTED THAT THE ACT COVERED ANNEXATIONS. INDEED, IT WAS NOT UNTIL THE SUPREME COURT DECIDED PERKINS v. MATTHEWS IN JANUARY, 1971, THAT IT WAS ESTABLISHED THAT ANNEXATIONS WERE COVERED. BECAUSE VIRGINIA CITIES AND COUNTIES ARE COMPLETELY INDEPENDENT OF ONE ANOTHER, THE ONLY WAY A CITY CAN EXPAND ITS REVENUE BASE IS THROUGH ANNEXATION OF COUNTIES. RICHMOND HAS USED THIS PROCEDURE NEARLY A DOZEN TIMES IN HER HISTORY, AND IN 1969 ANNEXED APPROXIMATELY 23 SQUARE MILES OF NEIGHBORING CHESTERFIELD COUNTY. THE FOLLOWING MAY, A COUNCILMANIC ELECTION WAS HELD WITH BOTH OLD AND NEW RESIDENTS VOTING. FOLLOWING PERKINS v. MATTHEWS IN 1971, RICHMOND WAS REQUIRED TO SUBMIT ITS NEW ELECTORAL PLAN TO THE JUSTICE DEPARTMENT UNDER SECTION FIVE PRE-CLEARANCE.

AT THAT TIME, RICHMOND HAD HER FIRST AND ONLY OBJECTION INTERPOSED AGAINST HER, AND THE JUSTICE DEPARTMENT DIRECTED RICHMOND TO GO FROM AT-LARGE TO WARD SYSTEM ELECTIONS. RICHMOND OBJECTED, FOR IN THAT VERY SAME YEAR, THE JUSTICE DEPARTMENT APPROVED A PLAN FOR ELECTING FIVE DELEGATES TO THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY FROM RICHMOND, AT-LARGE, AS WELL AS A FLOATER SEAT FOR ALL OF RICHMOND AND AN ADJOINING COUNTY.

WITH THIS MATTER UNSETTLED, THE JUSTICE DEPARTMENT ENJOINED THE CITY FROM HOLDING ANY ELECTIONS, THEREBY BLOCKING AN ELECTION SCHEDULED FOR MAY, 1972. FOR THE NEXT FIVE YEARS, UNTIL THE SUIT WAS SETTLED IN 1977, THE CITIZENS OF RICHMOND DID INDEED HAVE THEIR RIGHTS TO VOTE DENIED. FOR SEVEN YEARS RICHMONDERS WERE PREVENTED, NOT BY THE STATE, NOR BY THE CITY, BUT BY THE JUSTICE DEPARTMENT IN WASHINGTON FROM EXERCISING THE VERY RIGHTS THE JUSTICE DEPARTMENT CLAIMED IT WAS SO DILIGENTLY PROTECTING.

AND IT IS VITALLY IMPORTANT TO UNDERSTAND THE OUTCOME OF THIS ACTION THAT KEPT VOTERS FROM GOING TO THE POLLS FOR MORE THAN HALF A DECADE. IN THE SUPREME COURT OPINION OF THIS CASE, FOR THE SUPREME COURT IS WHERE THE MATTER CAME TO REST FIVE YEARS LATER, IT WAS RULED THAT THE ANNEXATION HAD NOTHING TO DO WITH RACE, BUT WAS INDEED ECONOMICALLY MOTIVATED.

THE IMPLICATIONS OF THIS SEVEN YEAR STRUGGLE ARE CLEAR: INTENT TO DISCRIMINATE WAS NEVER PRESENT. YET, TO AVOID PROLONGED AND EXPENSIVE OUT-OF-STATE LITIGATION AND TO ALLOW HER CITIZENS TO VOTE AGAIN, RICHMOND WAS FORCED TO ABANDON AT-LARGE ELECTIONS, WHICH HAD RECEIVED OVERWHELMING SUPPORT IN A PREVIOUS REFERENDUM, AND CAPITULATE TO A BUREAUCRACY WHOSE DEDICATION TO RICHMOND VOTING RIGHTS WAS AT BEST DUBIOUS.

IN THE CASE OF MOBILE VERSUS ROLDEN, THE LANGUAGE OF SECTION TWO OF THE VOTING RIGHTS ACT WAS CLARIFIED TO INDICATE THAT PROOF OF INTENT TO DISCRIMINATE WAS NECESSARY TO SUSTAIN AN OBJECTION TO AN ELECTORAL PRACTICE. THE COURT IN THIS CASE, WROTE THAT SECTION TWO WAS, IN PRACTICE, A REITERATION OF THE FOURTEENTH AND FIFTEENTH AMENDMENTS. IN 1981 THE SUPREME COURT CONCURRED IN THE LOWER COURTS FINDINGS.

MANY OF YOU, IN FACT, EVERY CONGRESSMAN AND SENATOR, HAS BEEN PETITIONED NOT TO ACCEPT ANY AMENDMENTS TO THE VOTING RIGHTS ACT. SO-CALLED CIVIL RIGHTS GROUPS NATIONWIDE DECRY ALL AMENDMENTS TO THE 1965 ACT AS CRIPPLING, WEAKENING THE VERY BASIS OF VOTER PROTECTIONS. YET WHY SHOULD THESE GROUPS OR ANYONE ELSE SUPPORT THE HOUSE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE'S AMENDMENT? WHAT DOES IT DO TO THE ORIGINAL ACT?

WHAT THE HOUSE BILL DOES IS SUBSTITUTE EFFECT FOR INTENT. ITS IMPLICATIONS ARE FOR GUARANTEED PROPORTIONAL REPRESENTATION -- THE BASIS OF AN ELECTORAL QUOTA SYSTEM. THIS COMMITTEE AMENDMENT, REVERSING THE WISDOM OF NOT ONLY THE MOBILE CASE BUT ALSO THE ACT ITSELF AS ORIGINALLY WORDED, DEFIES A BASIC TENET OF OUR SYSTEM OF GOVERNMENT. AND THAT IS, GOVERNMENT BY CONSENT OF THE GOVERNED. THIS LEGISLATION PRESUMES THAT ALL AT-LARGE ELECTIONS ARE DISCRIMINATORY. THIS LEGISLATION STRIPS THE VOTERS OF A COVERED JURISDICTION OF THE POWER AND THE RIGHT TO DECIDE HOW THEY WISH TO BE GOVERNED.

WHILE THE BURDEN OF PROOF IS CHANGED FROM INTENT TO EFFECT, IT IS NOT ACCOMPANIED BY A DEFINITION OF "EFFECT," NOR BY ANY STANDARD FOR DETERMINING SUCH EFFECT. YET WHEN THE BILL WAS INTRODUCED CONTAINING THIS CHANGE, ITS PROPONENTS DECLARED THAT IT WAS NECESSARY BECAUSE THERE WAS NO CLEARLY ARTICULATED STANDARD FOR PROOF OF INTENT TO DISCRIMINATE. YET THESE PROPONENTS OF CHANGE HAVE BLATANTLY SIDE-STEPPED FORMULATING A CLEAR STANDARD OF EFFECT.

UNDER THIS CHANGE, BY MY CALCULATIONS AND ACCORDING TO THE LIBRARY OF CONGRESS' AMERICAN LAW CENTER, LITIGATION WOULD UNDOUBTEDLY INCREASE UNTIL A CLEAR STANDARD IS ESTABLISHED, LEAVING THE COURTS FREE TO EXERCISE THEIR WILLS THROUGH INTERPRETATION OF THIS NEW LAW. AND THAT WILL LIES NOT HERE IN THE CONGRESS BUT INITIALLY WITH THE DISTRICT COURT FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA. THAT COURT OR ANY COURT COULD REQUIRE THAT THE RACIAL COMPOSITION OF A GOVERNING BODY EXACTLY REFLECT THE RACIAL COMPOSITION OF THE COMMUNITY. TITLE TWO OF THIS BILL LAYS PRECISELY SUCH A GROUNDWORK. AT THIS POINT I WOULD LIKE TO ENTER INTO THE HEARING RECORD THE REPORT I REFERRED TO EARLIER.

WHEN H. R. 3112 WAS CONSIDERED IN THE HOUSE, I OFFERED AN AMENDMENT TO PRESERVE THE VOTING RIGHTS ACT AS ORIGINALLY WRITTEN AND SUBSEQUENTLY INTERPRETED BY THE SUPREME COURT. I URGE YOU NOW TO REJECT THIS PROVISION OF THE HOUSE LEGISLATION. I AM PLEASED TO READ IN THIS MORNING'S WALL STREET JOURNAL THAT THERE ARE OTHERS WHO FEEL THE SAME WAY.

AGAIN, MR. CHAIRMAN, GENTLEMEN, THANK YOU FOR INVITING ME. I WILLCERTAINLY BE HAPPY TO ANSWER ANY QUESTIONS.

ANALYSIS OF TITLE II OF H.R. 3112, 97th CONGRESS, WHICH WOULD AMEND SECTION 2 OF THE VOTING RIGHTS ACT

Title II of H.R. 3112, 97th Congress, would amend section 2 of the Voting Rights Act, 42 U.S.C. § 1973, by striking out "to deny or abridge" and inserting in lieu "in a manner which results in a denial or abridgement of." The amended section would then read:

> No voting qualification or prerequisite to voting, or standard, practice, or procedure shall be imposed or applied by any State or political subdivision in a manner which results in a denial or abridgement of the right of any citizen of the United States to vote on account of race or color, or in contravention of the guarantees set forth in section 1973b (f)(2) of this title.

No accompanying statement by Congressman Rodino, the sponsor of the bill, was found in the Congressional Record on the date of its introduction, April 7, 1981, but Senator Mathias stated at 127 Cong. Rec. S 3540 (daily ed. April 7, 1981), that the purpose of section 2 of his S. 895, whose language is identical to H.R. 3112, is to:

> [a]mend section 2 of the act to clarify the burden of proof in voting discrimination cases and thus remove the uncertainty caused by the failure of the Supreme Court to articulate a clear standard in City of Mobile against Bolden.

At S 3542 of the same volume, Senator Kennedy, a cosponsor of S.895, stated:

> Until the Supreme Court decision in Mobile against Bolden last spring, a violation of section 2 would be established by a variety of direct or indirect evidence concerning the context, the nature, and the result of the practice in question. This position had been unanimously supported by the Supreme Court in White against Register in 1973. In Mobile, the Court's plurality opinion suggested that direct proof of explicit intent was a necessary element to establish a violation of the Act. That, of course, is usually an impossible task. Because of the absence of a clear standard for section 2 violations after the Bolden decision, it is important for Congress to clarify this provision. We should expressly restate the earlier understanding of Congress and the courts that section 2 violations can be established by direct or indirect evidence showing the discriminatory circumstances of the challenged practice.

City of Mobile v. Bolden, 446 U.S. 55 (1980), was brought by plaintiffs alleging that Mobile, Alabama's, practice of electing its City Commissioners at-large unfairly diluted the voting strength of blacks in violation of section 2 of the Voting Rights Act and of the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments. The Court only briefly discussed section 2 of the Voting Rights Act, believing that it merely reiterated the Fifteenth Amendment. At 60-61 the Court stated:

> Although required by general principles of judicial administration to do so ..., neither the District Court nor the Court of Appeals addressed the complaint's statutory claim -- that the Mobile electoral system violates § 2 of the Voting Rights Act of 1965. Even a cursory examination > of that claim, however, clearly discloses that it adds nothing to the appellees' complaint... Assuming, for present purposes, that there exists a private right of action to enforce this statutory provision, it is apparent that the language of § 2 no more than elaborates upon that of the Fifteenth Amendment, and the sparse legislative history of § 2 makes clear that it was intended to have an effect no different from that of the Fifteenth Amendment itself.

> Section 2 was an uncontroversial provision in proposed legislation whose other provisions engendered protracted dispute. The House Report on the bill simply recited that § 2 "grants ... a right to be free from enactment or enforcement of voting qualifications ... or practices which deny or abridge the right to vote on account of race or color." H.R. Rep. No. 439, 89th Cong., 1st Sess., 23 (1965). See also S. Rep. No. 162, 89th Cong., 1st Sess., p. 3, pp. 19-20 (1965). The view that this section simply restated the prohibitions already contained in the Fifteenth Amendment was expressed without contradiction during the Senate hearings, Senator Dirksen indicated at one point that all States, whether or not covered by the preclearance provisions of § 5 of the proposed legislation, were prohibited from discriminating against Negro voters by § 2, which he termed "almost a rephrasing of the 15th [A]mendment." Attorney General Katzenbach agreed. See Voting Rights: Hearings on S. 1564 before the Senate Committee on the Judiciary, 89th Cong., 1st Sess., p.1., p. 208 (1965).
> In view of the section's language and its sparse but clear legislative history, it is evident that this statutory provision adds nothing to the appellees' Fifteenth Amendment claim. We turn, therefore, to a consideration of the validity of the judgment of the Court of Appeals with respect to the Fifteenth Amendment.

A plurality of the Court went on to hold that Mobile's at-large electoral system did not violate either the Fourteenth or Fifteenth Amendment because the plaintiffs could not prove that the system was intended to result in racial discrimination. The District Court and the Court of Appeals had found that blacks in Mobile were able to register and vote without hindrance; these lower courts had not found that there was purposeful racial discrimination behind Mobile's at-large electoral system. According to the Supreme Court, these lower courts erred in finding violations of the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments without also finding racially discriminatory intent. The Supreme Court reversed the lower courts' decisions and remanded the case for further proceedings.

Title II of H.R. 3112 would appear to attempt to do away with the racially discriminatory intent requirement as a prerequisite for finding a voting requirement to be in violation of 42 U.S.C. § 1973. Instead, for a voting requirement to be illegal, it would be necessary to show only that the requirement was imposed in a manner which resulted in denial of the right to vote because of race or color. Thus, language of the bill seems to change the burden of proof from an intent requirement to an effect requirement.

It is very difficult to speculate as to what impact this language would have on approval or disapproval of voting requirements by the courts. The standard of proof is not provided for in the bill, and it would seem safe to say that increased litigation would occur in this area until the courts have laid down the standard of proof which must be met in order to show that a voting requirement has the effect of discrimination. Since the standard of proof is not provided for in the bill, the courts would seem to be free to choose what they feel is most appropriate. One such choice which comes to mind in the area of redistricting and councilmanic elections is to require that the percentage of racial representation on the governing body of a jurisdiction approximate the racial mix of the citizens of the jurisdiction. For example, if a jurisdiction were to be 40% black and 60% white, the racial composition of its governing body might be required to reflect these percentages.

However, it appears to be impossible to discuss with any certainty what standard of proof the courts would establish for showing that a voting requirement has the effect of racial discrimination. The bill itself does not contain the standard of proof which is to be applied, nor does the legislative history thus far seem to indicate an applicable standard of proof. Thus, if Title II of H.R. 3112 is enacted, the courts likely would be called on to establish the standard of proof which will be applied to determine whether there is a discriminatory effect caused by a voting requirement.

Senator HATCH. There are one or two questions I would like to ask that are kind of practical questions, and I think it's only fair to say, your viewpoint seems very well reasoned to me. Why, then, has the House voted as overwhelmingly as it has for this bill?

Mr. BLILEY. Well, I pushed the amendment on the floor. I offered the amendment.

Senator HATCH. You offered the amendment, too?

Mr. BLILEY. To put it back to intent.

Senator HATCH. Yes.

Mr. BLILEY. The majority of the House had been contacted, and I talked with many of the members, and they had signed off by the League of Women Voters and the civil rights organizations not to accept any amendments, and they agreed to that in advance, without ever hearing the amendments. They didn't consider any of them, and didn't accept any of them.

Senator HATCH. It doesn't sound like a very representative approach, does it?

Mr. BLILEY. No, not to me, not this member.

When I went into this, I started out with the position that I was against the extension of the act, because I had only been familiar with Virginia, in which there hasn't been a single claim of a person being denied the right to register or vote, much less having it sustained, to my knowledge, so I felt that it had served its purpose.

But in reading the testimony and following the hearing, I changed my mind. There are some communities in our country, unfortunately, I think, that have not been as forthright in dealing with this matter as they should, so it should be extended. But we should have intent. In my opinion, we ought to have two other things at least. One of those is an adequate and a meaningful bailout, which we don't have in 3112. Anybody with a filing fee can move into court and stop you dead in your tracks if you try to get out from under it the way it is currently written.

Senator HATCH. There's no question that's not a bailout in my eyes.

Mr. BLILEY. And I think that you ought to be able to try the case where the crime is alleged to have been committed, rather than have to do everything up here in the District of Columbia.

Senator HATCH. What's wrong with the District of Columbia courts? I share your viewpoint, but why do you think that this requirement so bad in principle?

Mr. BLILEY. Well, normally, when a crime is committed, you try it in the jurisdiction that it was committed in, unless compelling reason is brought forward for a change of venue, and I think it's easier for witnesses, and it's easier for people to testify locally about the problem, if it's done in the district that it's in. But that in the ranking of priority would certainly fall behind the other two.

Senator HATCH. Thank you, Congressman.

Senator East?

Senator EAST. Mr. Chairman, I know you're pressed for time, and having talked with the mayor—and I appreciate his very fine testimony—I think I'll forego any further questions.

But I deeply appreciate your summing up what you think are the critical weaknesses in your House bill; namely, the bailout provision, the intent problem, and then the forum problem. Do you think those are the three major weaknesses in the House bill?

Mr. BLILEY. I think so.

Senator EAST. Good. Thank you.

Senator HATCH. Thank you so much, Congressman. We appreciate your taking time from what we know is a busy schedule.

Mr. BLILEY. Thank you.

Senator HATCH. Our final witness today will be Dr. Edward Erler from the National Humanities Center in Raleigh, N.C.

Dr. Erler has written extensively on the subject of voting rights and representation.

We're very happy to welcome you to the committee, Dr. Erler.

Dr. ERLER. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

My remarks are directed against the revision of section 2. Some of what I'll say will be repetitious, but at least I can say I'll be the last one on the list today to repeat them.

STATEMENT OF DR. EDWARD J. ERLER, NATIONAL HUMANITIES CENTER, RALEIGH, N.C.

Dr. ERLER. The House amendment of section 2 of the Voting Rights Act is, in my opinion, wholly inconsistent not only with the principled dictates of the 14th and 15th amendments, but with the central purposes of the Voting Rights Act as well.

H.R. 3112 amends section 2 with the explicit purpose of overturning the Supreme Court's decision in Bolden. As the Committee on the Judiciary's report states, "the Supreme Court's interpretation of section 2 in City of Mobile v. Bolden has created confusion as to the proof necessary to establish a violation under that section."

The report continues that "Prior to Bolden, a violation of section 2 could be established by indirect evidence concerning the context, nature, and result of the practice at issue. In Bolden, Justice Stewart construed section 2 as merely restating the prohibitions of the 15 amendment. The Court held that a challenged practice would not be unlawful under that section unless motivated by discriminatory intent. The committee does not agree with this construction of section 2 and believes that the intent of the section should be clarified."

Now, the committee's interpretation of the pre-Bolden cases here is not, in my opinion, entirely accurate. No pre-Bolden case has ever interpreted section 2 as allowing intent to be established by indirect evidence concerning the context, nature and result of the practice at issue. Nor is the committee's reading of the Bolden case itself accurate. The Supreme Court in Bolden did not break with all pre-Bolden voting rights cases on the question of intent.

Based on a misunderstanding of both what the Bolden case attempted to accomplish and the import of the pre-Bolden cases, the proposed amendment therefore attempts to create a remedy for a problem that is nonexistent.

But the proposed amendment is not merely superfluous. It holds the potential for creating great harm. Everyone seems to admit that the establishment of a right to proportional representation based on race must be avoided. Yet the plurality decision in Bolden, more than any other recent decision of the Supreme Court, affirms that resolve to avoid proportional representation. By attempting to overrule Bolden, the proposed amendment will, I believe, create precisely the very thing that everyone wishes to avoid.

The language of the amendment and the committee report both seek to dispel that concern. As the amendment itself states, lack of racial proportionality "shall not, in and of itself, constitute a violation of this section."

The committee report confidently asserts that the proposed amendment does not create a right to proportional representation. Thus, the fact that members of a racial or language minority group have not been elected in numbers equal to the group's proportion of the population does not, in itself, constitute a violation of the section, although such proof, along with other objective factors, would be highly relevant.

The report further notes that the list of objective factors derives from White v. Regester.

Let me just repeat here the central statement from the White case. The court there remarked: "To sustain claims of voting discrimination, it is not enough that the racial group allegedly discriminated against has not had legislative seats in proportion to its voting potential. The plaintiff's burden is to produce evidence to support findings that the political processes leading to nomination and election were not equally open to participation by the group in question, that its members had less opportunity than did other residents in the district to participate in the political processes to elect legislators of their choice."

In other words, lack of proportionality, in and of itself, was not unconstitutional, but lack of proportionality, combined with other factors probative of the fact that the racial group in question has less opportunity to elect legislators of their choice could establish a result which amounts to a violation of the 14th amendment.

Among the factors the Court said could be adduced to establish that the political process was not equally open to minority groups was a history of official race discrimination in the fields of education, employment, economics, health, politics, and others, majoritarian electoral procedures which enhance the opportunity for racial discrimination by perpetuating the effects of past discrimination, and cultural and language barriers that make participation in community processes extremely difficult.

These factors were described by the Court as part of the totality of circumstances, indicating that the list was suggestive, rather than exhaustive.

Let me reiterate that these are the standards that the House committee report characterizes as an aggregate of objective factors which are to be used in determining Voting Rights Act violations under the revised section 2.

Using these criteria, it would be difficult to imagine a political entity containing a significant minority population that was not represented proportionately that would not be in violation of the revised section 2. The argument in its simplest form presumes that a political process equally open to minorities will produce proportional results. When faced with a lack of proportional results, it is merely assumed that the political process is not equally open. With such assumptions, it is not difficult to find a sociological cause for lack of proportionality.

The committee's reference to White and its progeny render unrealistic its assurances that the revised section 2 will not create a right to proportional representation. The courts will undoubtedly regard the amendment as an imprimatur for the decisions that have already, in effect, required proportional representation based on race. This was surely not the intention of the Judiciary Committee of the House, but the result will be the same whether intended or not.

The present language of section 2 is, in my opinion, clearly superior for the accomplishment of the objectives of the Voting Rights Act.

The Voting Rights Act of 1965 originally represented an extensive exercise of Congress enforcement power under the 15th amendment to proscribe the denial or abridgement of the right to vote on account of race or color. In more recent years, however, emphasis has shifted from the issue of equal access to the ballot for racial minorities to the issue of equal result. The issue is no longer typically conceived of in terms of the right to vote but in terms of the right to an effective vote, no longer in terms of disfranchisement, but in terms of dilution.

The old assumption that equal access to the ballot would ineluctably lead to political power for minorities has given way to the proposition that the political process must produce something more than equal access. The new demand is that the political process, regardless of equal access, must be made to yield equal results.

This is hardly a surprising development. It parallels other demands that have been pressed so assiduously upon the political system, especially in the area of affirmative action, which explicitly uses proportional results as the standard of nondiscrimination.

The plurality decision in Bolden was, I believe, a reasonable and timely attempt to forestall a dangerous drift toward an interpretation of the Constitution and the Voting Rights Act of allowing, indeed requiring proportional representation based on race.

Senator HATCH. Dr. Erler, I wonder if I could interrupt you?

Dr. ERLER. Yes.

Senator HATCH. If I could, I have to leave in just a few minutes, and I'd like to wrap this up.

Dr. ERLER. Surely.

Senator HATCH. I want to compliment you for your statement, which I've read, because I think it's one of the best efforts that has been made in writing a statement that has been made in this matter, either in the House or here.

If you would be kind enough to let me interrupt you to ask a couple of questions, and also, without objection, your full statement will be placed in the record at this point.

Dr. ERLER. Thank you.

Senator HATCH. And I hesitate to do so, except that my time is a real problem to me.

[The prepared statement of Dr. Edward J. Erler follows:]

Prepared Statement of Dr. Edward J. Erler

The House amendment of Section 2 of the Voting Rights Act is, in my opinion, wholly inconsistent not only with the principled dictates of the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments but with the central purposes of the Voting Rights Act as well. HR 3112 amends Section 2 of the Voting Rights Act with the explicit purpose of overturning the Supreme Court's decision in City of Mobile v. Bolden.[1] As the Committee on the Judiciary's Report states, "the Supreme Court's interpretation of Section 2 in City of Mobile v. Bolden has created confusion as to the proof necessary to establish a violation under that section. Prior to Bolden, a violation of Section 2 could be established by indirect evidence concerning the context, nature and result of the practice at issue. In Bolden, Justice Stewart, writing for the plurality, construed Section 2 of the Act as merely restating the prohibitions of the Fifteenth Amendment. The Court held that a challenged practice would not be unlawful under that section unless motivated by discriminatory intent. The Committee does not agree with this construction of Section 2 and believes that the intent of the section should be clarified."[2]

The Committee's interpretation of the pre-Bolden cases here is not, in my opinion, entirely accurate. No pre-Bolden case has ever interpreted Section 2 as allowing intent to be established "by indirect evidence concerning the context, nature and result of the practice at issue." Nor is the Committee's reading of the Bolden case itself accurate. The Supreme Court in Bolden did not break with all pre-Bolden voting rights cases on the question of intent. Based on a misunderstanding of both what the Bolden case attempted to accomplish and the import of the pre-Bolden cases, the proposed amendment therefore attempts to create a remedy for a problem that is non-existent.

But the proposed amendment is not merely superfluous; it holds the potential for creating great harm. Everyone seems to admit that the establishment of a right to proportional representation based on race must be avoided at all costs. Yet the plurality decision in Bolden, more than any other recent decision of the Supreme Court, affirms that resolve to avoid proportional representation. By attempting to overrule Bolden the proposed amendment will, I believe, create precisely the very thing that everyone seeks to avoid.

The language of the amendment and the Committee Report both seek to dispel that concern. As the amendment itself states, lack of racial proportionality "shall not, in and of itself, constitute a violation of this section." The Committee Report confidently asserts that "the proposed amendment does not create a right of proportional representation. Thus, the fact that members of a racial or language minority group have not been elected in numbers equal to the group's proportion of the population does not, in itself, constitute a violation of the section although such proof, along with other objective factors, would be highly relevant. Neither does it create a right to proportional representation as a remedy."[3]

The attentive reader will recognize that the language of both the amendment and the Report is derived from the language of a number of pre-Bolden court cases. The Committee Report notes that "By amending Section 2 of the Act Congress intends to restore the pre-Bolden understanding of the proper legal standard which focuses on the result and consequences of an allegedly discriminatory voting or electoral practice rather than the intent or motivation behind it."[4] The Report intimates that the plurality decision in Bolden, which demands proof of discriminatory purpose or intent, relies on wholly subjective and hence presumably arbitrary criteria. "The proposed amendment," the Report asserts, "avoids highly subjective factors," relying instead on "an aggregate of objective factors" derived from "the context of the challenged standard, practice or procedure."[5] The Report further notes that its list of "objective factors" derives from White v. Regester, a voting rights case decided in 1973.[6]

[6] 412 U.S. 755 (1973). The Report notes, however, that White "is not controlling since it established a constitutional violation" (at 30, n. 104). But reliance on White does indicate the extent to which the Committee on the Judiciary expects Fourteenth Amendment Equal Protection standards to prevail in the adjudication of the proposed amendment to Section 2. See infra, p. 15, n. 37.

White v. Regester examined, among other things, claims that multi-member districts in the state of Texas were being used "to cancel out or minimize the voting strength of racial groups."[7] The Court remarked that "[t]o sustain such claims, it is not enough that the racial group allegedly discriminated against has not had legislative seats in proportion to its voting potential. The plaintiff's burden is to produce evidence to support findings that the political processes leading to nomination and election were not equally open to participation by the group in question--that its members had less opportunity than did other residents in the district to participate in the political processes and to elect legislators of their choice."[8] In other words, lack of proportionality, "in and of itself" was not unconstitutional, but lack of proportionality combined with other factors probative of the fact that the racial group in question "has less opportunity to elect legislators of their choice" could establish a "result" which amounts to a violation of the Fourteenth Amendment.

Among the factors the Court said could be adduced to establish that the "political process" was not "equally open" to minority groups was a "history of official race discrimination . . . in the fields of education, employment, economics, health, politics and others," majoritarian electoral procedures which enhance "the opportunity for racial discrimination" by perpetuating the effects of past discrimination, and "cultural and language" barriers that make "participation in community processes extremely difficult."[9] These factors were described by the Court as part of the "totality of the circumstances,"[10] indicating that the list was suggestive rather than exhaustive.[11] Let me reiterate that these are the standards that the House Committee Report characterizes as "an aggregate of objective factors" which are to be used in determining Voting Rights Act violations under the revised Section 2.

[11] Zimmer v. McKeithen 485 F.2d 1297 (5th Cir. 1973), aff'd on other grounds, Sub. nom., East Carroll Parish School Bd. v. Marshall 424 U.S. 636 (1975), a decision which has loomed large in recent cases, provided a detailed elaboration of the criteria announced in White. Zimmer made it virtually impossible to prove "non-dilution" in an electoral district which lacked proportionality since, in addition to the White criteria, it noted that the fact that elected officials were responsive to minority interests "while . . . significant, . . . is not decisive," and disallowed evidence of "the success of black candidates at the polls" as foreclosing "the possibility of dilution of the black vote." "Such success," the Court continued, "might, on occasion, be attributable to the work of politicians, who, apprehending that the support of a black candidate would be politically expedient, campaign to insure his election. Or such success might be attributable to political support motivated by different considerations--namely that election of a black candidate will thwart successful challenges to electoral schemes on dilution grounds. In either situation, a candidate could be elected despite the relative political backwardness of black residents in the electoral district. Were we to hold that a minority candidate's success at the polls is proof of a minority group's access to the political process, we would merely be inviting attempts to circumvent the Constitution." Two of three candidates elected in the most recent contest under the system invalidated here by the Court were black.

Using these criteria, it would be difficult to imagine a political entity containing a significant minority population that was not represented proportionately that would not be in violation of the revised Section 2. The argument in its simplest form presumes that a political process "equally open" to minorities will produce proportional results. When faced with a lack of proportional results it is merely assumed that the political process is not "equally open." With such assumptions it is not difficult to find a sociological cause for lack of proportionality. Resort to such "gauzy sociological considerations"[12] can always produce the requisite evidence to support lack of racial proportionality.[13] Given this fact, who can fail to see that on its face the House revision of Section 2 requires racial proportionality. This, I believe, is the proper gloss on the Committee Report's statement that "By amending Section 2 of the Act Congress intends to restore the pre-Bolden understanding of the proper legal standard which focuses on the result and consequences of an allegedly discriminatory voting or electoral practice rather than the intent or motivation behind it."[14] The Committee's references to White and its "progeny" render unrealistic its assurances that the revised section 2 will not create a right to proportional representation. The Courts will undoubtedly regard the amendment as an imprimatur for the decisions that have already, in effect, required proportional representation based on race. This was surely not the intention of the Judiciary Committee of the House. But the result will be the same whether intended or not. The present language of Section 2 is, in my opinion, clearly superior for the accomplishment of the objectives of the Voting Rights Act.

[13] The extent to which proportionality has become the standard for "vote dilution" cases is indicated by the fact that the typical remedy in cases where "dilution" has been found is to reorder the electoral process to produce racial proportionality. See e.g., Bolden v. City of Mobile 423 F.Supp. 384 (S.D. Ala. 1976), at 402; Lodge v. Buxton 639 F.2d. 1358 (5th Cir. 1981), at 1361. Both of these cases relied on Zimmer.

The Voting Rights Act of 1965 originally represented an extensive exercise of Congress' enforcement power under the Fifteenth Amendment to proscribe the denial or abridgement of the right to vote "on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude."[15] The great concern of the framers of the Act was to provide racial minorities with equal access to the ballot. Even the most cursory examination of the debates accompanying passage of the Voting Rights Act reveals this to be its primary objective. And, in terms of this original purpose, there is little doubt that the Act has been remarkably successful. By and large no significant bars remain to registration, voting or to candidacy for office even in the most hostile and recalcitrant areas.

In more recent years, however, emphasis has shifted from the issue of equal access to the ballot for racial minorities to the issue of equal results. The issue is no longer typically conceived of in terms of "the right to vote," but in terms of "the right to an effective vote"; no longer in terms of "disfranchisement," but in terms of "dilution." The old assumption that equal access to the ballot would ineluctably lead to political power for minorities has given way to the proposition that the political process must produce something more than equal access. The new demand is that the political process, regardless of equal access, must be made to yield equal results. This is hardly a surprising development. It parallels other demands that have been pressed so assiduously upon the political system, especially in the area of affirmative action, which explicitly uses proportional results as the standard of non-discrimination. The demand for equal results--the so-called "new equality"[16]--is merely the direct reflection of society's ever-quickening concern for the implementation of numerical equality.[17] As Tocqueville reminded us almost one hundred and fifty years ago, "When inequality is the general rule in society, the greatest inequalities attract no attention. When everything is more or less level, the slightest variation is noticed. Hence the more equal men are, the more insatiable will be their longing for equality."[18] The great concern is that at this late date we not allow ourselves in our impatience for results to abandon those principles that have been productive of so much success.

The watershed Supreme Court case in the area of voting rights was Allen v. State Board of Elections,[19] a case involving the remedial scope of Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act. Chief Justice Warren, writing for the majority, came remarkably close to equating "disfranchisement" and vote "dilution." "The right to vote," Warren remarked, "can be affected by a dilution of voting power as well as by an absolute prohibition on casting a ballot. See Reynolds v. Sims. . . . Voters who are members of a racial minority might well be in the majority in one district, but in a decided minority in the county as a whole. This type of change [to at-large elections] could therefore nullify their ability to elect the candidate of their choice just as would prohibiting some of them from voting."[20] As the Chief Justice indicated by his citation to Reynolds, the language of "dilution" stems directly from the reapportionment cases. These cases, of course, did not involve racial questions, but the right of the individual to have an equal vote as a matter of constitutional entitlement. The constitutional standard created by the Court in Reynolds was "one person, one vote." When the question of vote dilution arises in a racial context, however, it no longer involves individual claims, but group claims. The question is whether a racial group has the right to be represented in proportion to its group strength. In the Allen case Warren assumed that the "candidate of [the minority's] choice" would, in the most favorable circumstances, be a member of their own race elected by racial bloc voting. Warren fell short of stating that there was a constitutional or statutory right to the optimum conditions for maximizing the effectiveness of racial bloc voting, but later cases would not be so reticent in this regard. The crucial question that must be resolved is whether vote "dilution" measured in terms of racial proportionality is the constitutional equivalent of disfranchisement.

The Supreme Court in Whitcomb v. Chavis (1971)[21] recognized the intractable problems that necessarily arise in the attempt to litigate group claims. In Whitcomb the Court disallowed a claim of vote dilution and noted that the assertion that "the voting power of ghetto residents may have been 'cancelled out' . . . seems a mere euphemism for political defeat at the polls."[22] The Court recognized that the argument from proportional representation would make every loser's claim cognizable under the equal protection clause because every loser could claim he was not represented by the candidate he voted against. The problem, the Court remarked, was not racial "vote dilution," but the fact that blacks voted "predominately Democratic" in a district typically dominated by the Republican Party. In this instance black Democrats suffered "along with all the other Democrats." As the Court laconically remarked, "As our system has it, one candidate wins, the others lose. Arguably the losing candidates' supporters are without representation since the men they voted for have been defeated; arguably they have been denied equal protection of the laws since they have no legislative voice of their own. But we have not yet deemed it a denial of equal protection to deny legislative seats to losing candidates. . . ."[23] To countenance such a claim would require "some voting arrangement such as proportional representation or cumulative voting aimed at providing representation for minority parties or interests."[24] It is clear that not every disadvantage to a political minority or interest is tantamount to disfranchisement. "Most political losers can imagine a context structured more to their benefit, yet few would argue that they possess either a statutory or a constitutional right to an optimal political environment. But when politics and race become thoroughly entwined--when political identity is inextricably linked with racial identity--then such a claim becomes enticing."[25] This is especially true, of course, when the "right to vote" has been transmogrified into "the right to an effective vote," and the effectiveness of that vote is measured in terms of "results."

But the Supreme Court has not always been so reluctant to use proportional representation as its standard of "the right to an effective vote." The most revealing case is United Jewish Organizations v. Carey (1977).[26] In this case, the Court disallowed the claim that reapportionment which was covered by the remedial scope of Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act had to be racially neutral, and, indeed, more than implied that the test of compliance derived from the standard of racial proportionality. Justice White, announcing the judgment of the Court, stated that "Section 5, and its authorization for racial redistricting where appropriate to avoid abridging the right to vote on account of race or color, are constitutional. . . . neither the Fourteenth nor the Fifteenth Amendment mandates any per se rule against using racial factors in districting and apportionment. Nor is . . . [t]he permissible use of racial criteria . . . confined to eliminating the effects of past discriminatory districting or apportionment.[27] Evidently it was not the elimination of discrimination, but ensuring "the opportunity for the election of black representatives"[28] that governed the Court's interpretation. Or as White stated it, "the inquiry under §5 focuses ultimately on 'the position of racial minorities with respect to their effective exercise of the electoral franchise'."[29] And, as Justice White makes abundantly clear, an "effective franchise" results from "a fair allocation of political power between white and non-white voters, . . ." and which "'provide[s] a rough sort of proportional representation in the legislative halls of the State'."[30]

The quoted portion of White's statement is from Gaffney v. Cummings (1973). Gaffney involved political party apportionment, but White insists that there is no difference between an apportionment that fairly reflects political party strengths and one that fairly represents racial strengths.[31] Justice Brennan in his concurring opinion expressed some reservations about White's analogy: "I have serious doubts that the Court's acceptance of political party apportionment in Gaffney . . . necessarily applies to apportionment by race. Political affiliation is the keystone of the political trade. Race, ideally, is not."[32] Brennan did agree however--albeit with some reservations--that "Even in the absence of the Voting Rights Act, this preferential policy plausibly could find expression in a state decision to overcome nonwhite disadvantages in voter registration or turnout through redefinition of electoral districts--perhaps, as here, through the application of a numerical rule--in order to achieve a proportional distribution of voting power."[33]

Chief Justice Burger in dissent remarked quite aptly that "the result reached by the Court today in the name of the Voting Rights Act is ironic. . . . Manipulating the racial composition of electoral districts to assure one minority or another its 'deserved' representation will not promote the goal of a racially neutral legislature.

On the contrary, such racial gerrymandering puts the imprimatur of the State on the concept that race is a proper consideration in the electoral process."[34] As Burger implies, once political power is conceived of in exclusively racial terms, the pressure to regard interests in those same terms will also become irresistible. One consequence will be the intensification of racial bloc voting. Legislatures, whether local, state, or national, will find it difficult, if not impossible, to find a common ground for the representative process that transcends immediate racial class considerations. The dangers to constitutional government should be manifest.

The plurality decision in City of Mobile v. Bolden was, I believe, a reasonable and timely attempt to forestall this dangerous drift toward an interpretation of the Constitution and the Voting Rights Act as allowing--indeed requiring--proportional representation based on race. The most reasonable and effective way to do this was, in the Court's opinion, to restore the authority of those cases requiring proof of discriminatory purpose as a necessary prerequisite to a claim of voting discrimination. In the absence of such a requirement it is clear that proportionality will inevitably become the standard. It is impossible to determine whether the right to participate equally in the electoral process has been abridged without some reference to the results of that process.

Whether it is described as "an aggregate of objective factors" derived from "the context of the challenged standard, practice or procedure."[35] or by some other ingenious sophism, the standard that will ineluctably result as the measure of dilution or participation is proportional representation. This, I believe, is an unassailable conclusion.

The thrust of Justice Stewart's opinion is summarized in this (slightly exaggerated) remark: "The fact is that the Court has sternly set its face against the claim, however phrased, that the Constitution somehow guarantees proportional representation."[36] At the outset, Stewart addressed the question of the reach of Section 2 of the Voting Rights Act, remarking that "it is apparent that the language of §2 no more than elaborates that of the Fifteenth Amendment, and the sparse legislative history of §2 makes clear that it was intended to have an effect no different from that of the Fifteenth Amendment itself."[37] And according to Stewart the Supreme Court has consistently "made clear that action

[37] id. at 60-1. It is true, as the Committee Report points out, that "Pursuant to its authority to enforce the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments, Congress has the power to enact legislation which goes beyond the specific prohibitions of the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments themselves so long as the legislation is appropriate to fulfill the purposes of those constitutional provisions. . . . This includes the power to prohibit voting and electoral practices and procedures which have racially discriminatory effect" (at 31). If the last quoted sentence is meant to characterize the intent of the proposed amendment of Section 2, then this statement must be taken to mean that the Committee expects by a state that is racially neutral on its face violates the Fifteenth Amendment only if motivated by a discriminatory purpose."[38]

The appellees in Bolden argued that the "effect of racially polarized voting in Mobile is the same as that of a racially exclusionary primary."[39] But as Stewart rejoined, the only offense against the Fifteenth Amendment is disfranchisement based on race or color. And since the freedom of blacks to vote in Mobile elections was asserted on all sides, no Constitutional violation could be alleged. "The Fifteenth Amendment does not entail the right to have Negro candidates elected," Stewart remarked, echoing the Court's opinion in Whitcomb, it "prohibits only purposefully discriminatory denial or abridgement by government of the freedom to vote. . . ."[40]

Stewart was able to draw upon a venerable line of Fifteenth Amendment cases to support this conclusion. The Court has always insisted that a violation of the Fifteenth Amendment rest upon a the proposed revision to be--not indeed a clarification--but a change in the standard of intent required by Section 2. As Stewart points out, legislative history makes it clear that not only Section 2 but the Voting Rights Act as a whole was intended to be co-extensive with the Fifteenth Amendment. The Committee's citation of Attorney General Katzenbach's testimony in the 1965 Hearings is particularly egregious. Katzenbach remarked that Section 2 would "reach any kind of practice . . . if its purpose or effect was to deny or abridge the right to vote on account of race or color." Katzenbach was speaking here of the right of equal access to the ballot and not, as the Report implies, "vote dilution." As we have seen, the equation of vote dilution and disfranchisement did not occur until some years after the passage of the Voting Rights Act.

showing of discriminatory purpose. But this has not meant, as some have argued, that it is necessary "to find a smoking gun," and that efforts "to establish racial discriminatory purpose or intent are not only futile but irrelevant. . . ."[41] The Court has routinely invalidated laws which were racially neutral on their face but which could clearly be traced to a discriminatory purpose. For example, it struck down the so-called "grandfather clauses" which were pretexts for racial discrimination,[42] racially exclusive political party primaries,[43] and municipal redistricting[44] among other practices, as violative of the Fifteenth Amendment. In none of these instances did the proof of discriminatory purpose entail "futile" motivation analysis of the intent of legislators. When the issue is properly restricted to the question of disfranchisement rather than dilution, "The [Fifteenth] Amendment nullifies sophisticated as well as simpleminded modes of discrimination,"[45] and resort neither to "motivation" analysis nor "gauzy sociological considerations"[46] is necessary to ferret out such instances of discrimination. It is only when the issue concerns the much vaguer question of

"dilution" that it is necessary to resort to "proportionality" or "disproportionate impact" as a substitute for "discriminatory purpose."[47]

Stewart found it somewhat more difficult to demonstrate that the Court has always required such stringent standards of discriminatory purpose under the Equal Protection Clause. The most difficult case to reconcile was White v. Regester, the case which was relied upon so heavily by the Committee Report. The best that Stewart was able to do was to interpret White as "strongly indicating that only a purposeful dilution of the plaintiffs' vote would offend the Equal Protection Clause."[48] But Stewart was able to draw upon a solid line of equal protection cases to buttress his argument that "official action will not be held unconstitutional solely because it results in a racially disproportionate impact."[49] These cases were much more demanding than White in the proof required for discriminatory intent, and it is the authority of these cases that Stewart wished to establish as the bulwark against "the claim, however phrased, that the Constitution somehow guarantees proportional representation."

In his concluding remarks, Stewart engaged in a sharp dialectical exchange with Justice Marshall, who dissented. Stewart noted that "Marshall's dissenting opinion . . . appears to be that every 'political group,' or at least every such group that is in the minority, has a federal constitutional right to elect candidates in proportion to its numbers."[50] This argument, Stewart implies, results from the conceptual confusion of equating disfranchisement and "dilution." Again echoing Whitcomb, Stewart states that the "right to equal participation in the electoral process does not protect any 'political group,' however defined, from electoral defeat."[51]

According to Marshall, the question before the Court could be decided independently of racial issues. He conceived of the matter exclusively in terms of determining whether the "fundamental right" to vote had been "diluted." When a "fundamental right" is in question, Marshall reasoned, the cause of the dilution is immaterial. "Discriminatory impact" is all that is necessary to prove the fact of "dilution." Thus in Marshall's view, Washington v. Davis and its progeny are irrelevant because they did not involve considerations of "fundamental rights."[52]

But, as Stewart points out, Marshall's attempt to distinguish Bolden from Washington v. Davis is misplaced. If there were no racial claims involved, it would be impossible to make a claim of "vote dilution." After all, at-large elections do not dilute the vote of individuals; the complaint is that they "dilute" the relative strength of one group as compared to--or in proportion to--another group. If there were no group claims there could be no allegations of a constitutional violation. The mere denomination of the right to vote as a "fundamental right" simply does not change this fact. I don't think Stewart's characterization of Marshall's dissent as a justification for proportional representation based on race can be gainsaid.

Overturning the plurality opinion in Bolden will thus be a clear signal to the Courts that Congress has put its imprimatur on the concept of racial proportionality. This, of course, will be a massive subversion of the original intention of the Voting Rights Act, which was to minimize the effects of race on voting rights. The new interpretation of the Voting Rights Act embodied in the proposed amendment to Section 2 would place a premium on racial class considerations.

Nothing could be more alien to the American political tradition than the idea of proportional representation. Proportional representation makes it impossible for the representative process to find a common ground that transcends factionalized interests. Every modern government based on the proportional system is highly fragmented and unstable. The genius of the American system is that it requires factions and interests to take an enlarged view of their own welfare, to see, as it were, their own interests through the filter of the common good. In the American system, because of its fluid electoral allignments, a representative must represent not only those interests that elect him, but those who vote against him as well. That is to say, he must represent the common interest rather than any particular or narrow interest. This is the genius of a diverse country whose very electoral institutions--particularly the political party structure--militate against the idea of proportional representation. Proportional representation brings narrow, particularized interests to the fore and undermines the necessity of compromise in the interest of the common good.

Majority rule is, of course, the defining characteristic of democratic government. In a diverse democracy, it is almost as difficult to create effective governing majorities as it is to insure that the governing majorities will exercise power in a manner consistent with the rights of minorities. American majorities are typically coalitions of various minorities who find it necessary to compromise their particular interests in order to form a majority. Under these circumstances, only moderate or middle ground political positions can hope to garner majority support, since no one interest will be able to dominate. As soon as a position becomes extreme, either to the right or left, the foundation of the majority coalition itself will be compromised. It is this continuing search for majority consensus that provides the foundation both for effective governing majorities and concern for the interests and rights of minorities. Majority elections thus force different groups to seek a common ground rather than emphasize their differences. The Courts have in recent years, however, almost routinely held that majority elections--as opposed to plurality elections--harm the interests of minorities because plurality elections make it less likely that minorities can elect candidates of their own choice. Plurality elections, of course, reduce the necessity to seek a common ground and put a premium upon emphasizing differences in interests, whether racial or otherwise.

Nor is it always clear that the interests of racial minorities will be best served by a proportional system. It may only allow the racial minority to become isolated. The interests of minorities are best served when narrow racial issues are subsumed within a larger political context where race does not define political interests. The overwhelming purpose of the Voting Rights Act was to create these conditions, and probably no finer example of legislation serving the common interest can be found. But transforming the Voting Rights Act into a vehicle of proportional representation based upon race will undermine the ground of the common good upon which it rests. Such a transformation will go far towards precluding the possibility of ever creating a common interest or common ground that transcends racial class considerations. Yet it seems to be agreed on all sides that this is a grave danger which should be avoided. In light of this fact, the burden of proof rests with those who wish to change the intent structure of Section 2 to prove beyond possible doubt that the proposed amendment will not--as I believe it will--lead to the establishment of proportional representation based on race.

Senator HATCH. Your statement came in last night, and it is a very fine description of what this matter is all about, but supporters of S. 1992 have argued that the amended version of section 2 contained in their bill claim that it would not lead us inevitably towards a system of proportional representation. Could you respond to that contention?

Dr. ERLER. I think that that belief is mistaken, because obviously the standard that will inevitably be created to test the right to an effective vote, or to test whether minorities have equal access to political processes, will be results, and results can be measured only by the standard of proportional representation.

I might say also that in many Federal court cases the typical remedy—where there has been found to be a violation of equal access to the political process—has required redistricting or some other modification of the electorial process that would produce proportional representation. So I think that, in a certain sense, the courts are already testing the right to an effective vote by the standard of proportional representation.

Senator HATCH. Well, in your opinion, would the legislative adoption of a system of proportional representation be consistent or inconsistent with the system of representation incorporated in the Constitution of the United States?

Dr. ERLER. There is no question that it would be inconsistent. It's the issue of what kinds of majorities are both effective governing majorities and majorities that can exercise power consistent with minority rights. The kinds of majorities that are typically produced in American politics are coalitions of different interests that find it necessary to compromise to form a majority. Every majority is a coalition of minorities. It is precisely this necessity for compromise that is built into the constitutional system of representation. It forces a representative to represent the common interest rather than any particular or narrow interest.

The institution of proportional representation will put a premium upon limited, narrow interests, and I believe it will also necessarily put a premium upon racial class considerations. That, in my opinion, would be antithetical to the system of representation embodied in the Constitution.

Senator HATCH. I think you're well aware that the amended version of section 2 in S. 1992 contains a disclaimer provision with respect to proportional representation. Would you give us your opinion with regard to this disclaimer language and its effect?

Dr. ERLER. Well, I think the disclaimer is unrealistic, in light of what the Court has already done in the area of voting rights. To say that this will not lead to a requirement of proportional representation—and I believe that those who put in that disclaimer may have believed that, but I think the result will inevitably be to erect proportionality as the standard.

For example, the Court no longer speaks of the right to vote but the right to participate equally in the political process. How do you know that someone's right to participate equally in the political process has been diluted without looking at the result? The standard that will be the test of dilution must inevitably be proportionality, expecially since the old argument that equal access to the ballot would necessarily lead to political power for minorities has been displaced by the proposition that the political process—regardless of equal access—must produce equal results. When the argument moves from equal access—the original purpose of the Voting Rights Act—to equal participation and dilution, it is necessary to resort to the criterion of proportionality. How else can you measure the comparative strengths of groups—or, that is, measure whether there is equal participation for groups—except in proportion to their numbers? The establishment of the standard of proportionality—particularly racial proportionality—will be a massive subversion of the original intention of the Voting Rights Act—which was to minimize the impact of race on voting rights. The amendment of section 2 would, in my opinion, not only legitimate racial claims, but make them necessary.

The language of dilution stems directly, as you know, from the reapportionment cases, which were premised upon the equal protection clause of the 14th amendment. These cases created the standard of one person, one vote. The attempt to use the notion of dilution as a test for group voting strength, I think, is completely misplaced; it's a mistake to speak of dilution in the way in which the House Report, for example, speaks of dilution and the way many people here today have spoken of dilution. There is no analogy between racial group voting strength and individual voting strength. To insist upon this analogy, as the proponents of the revision of section 2 do, is necessarily to insist upon the requirement of proportional representation.

Senator HATCH. OK, thank you.

Senator East? Senator, I wonder, could you ask your questions and then close out the committee hearing for me?

Senator EAST. Well, I'll tell you, all I wanted to do was to thank him and thank you, and I will ask no questions.

Senator HATCH. Well, I don't want to limit you, because you have a lot of good questions.

Senator EAST. No, I know you don't, and I appreciate your solicitude, but I'm fine, really.

Senator HATCH. OK.

Senator EAST. First, I'd like to thank you for coming, and I agree with Senator Hatch, the quality of the testimony and the written statement, which we've had a chance to see, is excellent. We both regret—I know toward the tail end of the hearings, things get a little crowded, but it's always a pleasure to have a very distinguished North Carolinian before our committee, so I'd like to thank you as a Senator from North Carolina, let alone as a member of the Judiciary Committee, for coming and for assisting us in this very important effort.

Second, I'd like to thank the chairman of this committee for, first of all, his distinguished leadership, which is always unfailing, and the quality of his hearings in terms of openness and candor and allowing us not only to have our word but maybe to have too much of our word, and I appreciate his allowing me to be here and those of us who are not members of the subcommittee to participate in it.

And I thank you for the invitation. I hope I haven't worn out my invitation.

Senator HATCH. Oh, no, you haven't, Senator East. Thank you.

I'd like to also compliment all witnesses. I've been really proud of the efforts made by every witness who has appeared before the committee during the last couple of days. I haven't always agreed with all witnesses, but I've been proud of the people who have come in, and I think the testimony has, for the most part, been very enlightening.

I want to particularly compliment Mr. McDonald. I have a lot of respect for you, listening to you this morning. I do disagree with you on a number of items, but I think you represented your position very well.

And, Mayor, it's been a real pleasure having you, and any and all other witnesses.

We are very grateful for this, and I think it is definitely helping us.

I hate to tell you this, but next week we're going to have hearings Monday, Wednesday, and Thursday, and we are trying to keep to our schedule. It's a difficult schedule, and it's very, very hard for me to keep to it, but we're going to try to do that, and hopefully finish this set of hearings before the end of February.

And I think in the next hearing—I just want to give everybody notice—that I am going to enforce this 10-minute rule. I've tried to be as reasonable as I can be about it, but I think the only way to do it is just to have a hard and fast rule, and I just hope nobody will think I'm trying to foreclose either side from giving their testimony.

Written testimony is therefore going to be particularly important in making the completed record, and I do want to leave time for questions; but I hope we will be able to shorten the total times for these hearings while we build, I think, the best record ever built on the Voting Rights Act.

So with that, we'll recess until next Monday.

[Whereupon, at 1:40 p.m., the hearing was recessed, to reconvene Monday, February 1, at 9 a.m.]

VOTING RIGHTS ACT

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 1, 1982

U.S. SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE ON THE CONSTITUTION,
COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
Washington, D.C.

The subcommittee met, pursuant to recess, at 9:04 a.m., in room 2228, Dirksen Senate Office Building, Senator Orrin Hatch (chairman of the subcommittee) presiding.

Present: Senators Kennedy and East.

Staff present: Stephen Markman, chief counsel; Claire Greif, clerk; Prof. Laurens Walker; and William Lucius, counsel.

OPENING STATEMENT OF HON. ORRIN G. HATCH, A U.S. SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF UTAH, AND CHAIRMAN, SUBCOMMITTEE ON THE CONSTITUTION

Senator HATCH. The subcommittee will be in order.

Ladies and gentlemen, this marks the third day of hearings by the Subcommittee on the Constitution on the Voting Rights Act. The main focus of the first 2 days has been the issue of changing the definition of "discrimination" in the context of section 2 of the act and the 15th amendment, from an intentional and purposeful act of bigotry into the fact alone of racial imbalance of an elected, representative body.

Today, we will focus more extensively upon the administration of the Voting Rights Act and the problems involved with such administration. Although we were originally scheduled to have with us the Assistant Attorney General of the United States for Civil Rights, Mr. Bradford Reynolds, we have had to put off his testimony for 1 or 2 weeks.

At the risk of being repetitive—and on an issue of this magnitude, I am not much concerned about that—I would like to summarize my own response to the testimony on section 2 for the first 2 days of the hearings. I would expect that some of my colleagues on this committee would disagree with my observations, but I am comfortable that my observations can withstand scrutiny.

First, I do not believe that the Mobile v. Bolden case represents a departure from the law existing prior to the case. I do not believe that there is any section 2 case or any 15th amendment case where the Supreme Court did not require a finding of purposeful discrimination. This law, indeed, predates the Voting Rights Act substantially. The White v. Regester case, about which we have heard a great deal in the past few days, does not contain any contrary holding. White was a 14th amendment case and, as the Supreme Court made clear in Mobile, there was a finding of intentional discrimination in that instance.

Second, even if the Mobile case did represent a change in the constitutional course, which I do not believe it did, it is the current law of the land. To attempt to overcome Mobile statutorily raises serious constitutional questions, many of them similar to those raised in the context of legislation that Congress is considering to overturn the Roe v. Wade decision statutorily.

Third, even if the Mobile case did represent a change in constitutional course, which again I do not believe it did, the Mobile policy is the right policy. There should be a requirement of an intent to discriminate before individuals or communities are considered to be civil rights violators or even branded racists. This is a matter of due process, a matter of fundamental fairness, and a matter of maintaining the traditional notion of what discrimination and civil rights are all about.

Fourth, the so-called results test in section 2 will inevitably move this country in the direction of proportional representation by race. There is no standard for identifying discrimination under the results test on any other basis than proportional representation. While proponents of the test may seek to obscure this fact with descriptions of the standard as one insuring, "equal opportunity to participate in the electoral process," or such, this inevitably boils down to nothing more than proportional representation.

Fifth, the supposed "disclaimer" provision in section 2 is, as the Supreme Court described it in Mobile, purely an illusory disclaimer. To say that lack of proportional representation, in and of itself, is not evidence of a violation is not to say very much. It is simply to say that an additional scintilla of evidence is necessary.

According to the House report, such requirement can be met by a countless number of "objective" factors of discrimination, including an at-large system of government, the existence of racially polarized voting, majority vote requirements, prohibitions on single-shot voting, some history of discrimination, or numbered posts.

Other factors mentioned by the civil rights community include racially disparate registration figures, staggered terms, a history of dual school systems, registration purging requirements, reregistration requirements, inconvenient registration locations and hours, impediments to third party and independent candidacies, low numbers of minority registration officials, disparity of public services in various neighborhoods, a history of English-only ballots, et cetera, et cetera.

Sixth, the intent test does not and never has required "smoking gun" evidence or confessions of discrimination. In case after case, the Supreme Court has stated explicitly that circumstantial and indirect evidence would be satisfactory evidence and that the totality of circumstances must be considered.

Seventh, this is not an impossible standard. It is the traditional standard for equal protection cases, and it is the traditional standard for school busing cases. It is a standard that has been satisfied before and after the Mobile case. In two recent cases, Escambia County and Lodge v. Buxton, it has been satisfied, and it has been satisfied without confessions of discrimination and without a "smoking gun."

Finally, given the existence of lack of proportional representation and some further scintilla of evidence, I am unsure that such evidence is even rebuttable by a defendant. In Mobile, for example, it was considered irrelevant by the plaintiffs and, by the lower courts, overruled in Mobile that there had been no intent to discriminate by Mobile and that there had been strong nonracial justifications for the at-large municipal structure.

So, as you can see, this is no simple matter. It is an important matter, and I think that it is very difficult to argue with the points that have been made, that I have reiterated here this morning.

So, ladies and gentleman, I welcome all of our witnesses to the subcommittee this morning, and I look forward to each of our witness' thoughts on the administering of the Voting Rights Act.

We are very pleased to begin with our first witness, Hon. M. Caldwell Butler, our U.S. Representative from the State of Virginia, who is, himself, in his own right, an excellent attorney. Congressman Butler.

STATEMENT OF HON. M. CALDWELL BUTLER, A REPRESENTATIVE IN CONGRESS FROM THE STATE OF VIRGINIA

Mr. BUTLER. Thank you for the opportunity to discuss the amendment of the Voting Rights Act. I also appreciate your summary of the testimony to date. I wish we had had the benefit of your wisdom when the deliberations were taking place in the House Judiciary Committee.

Senator HATCH. Thank you.

Mr. BUTLER. Maybe the problems would not be so difficult today.

On October 5, the House passed legislation to amend the Voting Rights Act. While many have praised this legislation as both reasonable and equitable, it is, in my judgment, an excessive response to the problem of securing voting rights and reflects cynicism substantiated by neither the record of progress which has been made under the act nor the good-faith efforts of the vast majority of public officials to comply with the spirit and the letter of the law.

I will address two major issues which have emerged as a consequence of this action by the House. First, what is a fair mechanism to permit political subdivisions to "bail out" from the act's special provisions? And, second, in actions under section 2 of the Voting Rights Act, what should be the burden of proof to establish that the right to vote has been denied or abridged?

THE PURPOSE OF BAILOUT

The Supreme Court recognized the importance of bailout in the Katzenbach case. "Acknowledging the possibility of overbreadth," the opinion states, "the act of 1965 provides for termination of special statutory coverge at the beheast of States and political subdivisions in which the danger of substantial voting discrimination has not materialized," acknowledging, then, the possibility of overbreadth.

So then, for openers, a bailout provision should permit political subdivisions which have complied with the letter and the spirit of the law to terminate their coverge under the special provisions. Second, a bailout provision should operate as an incentive for political subdivisions which have not been in full compliance with the law to advance the voting opportunities of minortiy group citizens.

A bailout provision based on stringent, yet achievable, requirements can create such an incentive. Enchancing the political participation of minority group citizens becomes a political subdivision's goal, and satisfying the requirements for bailout becomes the vehicle for attaining that goal.

THE IMPOSSIBLE BAILOUT

In my view, the legislation which passed the House neglects these purposes and makes a mockery of the idea of a reasonable bailout. The legislation would establish conditions for bailout which would be impossible to achieve and effectively extends forever the special provisions of the Voting Rights Act on the vast majority of States and political subdivisions currently covered by them.

A review of the bailout provision reveals over 10 jurisdictional requirements which must be satisfied in order for a political subdivision to bail out. The ability of the petitioning political subdivision to bail out, therefore, depends upon its ability to present many facts, garnered from a wide variety of sources, which document 10 years of exemplary conduct under the act.

In order to judge these facts properly, the court should have access to the people and the circumstances which shape the unique electoral affairs of the locality. Indeed, it would appear to be one of the bases of due process that there should be some reasonable relationship between the facts to be determined and the location of the forum to determine them. In fact, our Federal court system, partly through statute and partly through case law, has developed the doctrine of foram non conveniens, which provides for trail in the most convenient place.

Under both the proposed legislation and the existing law, the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia had sole jurisdiction to hear declaratory judgment actions seeking bailout. It seems incongruous to vest one court with this responsibility to hear the hundreds of cases which would ensue. The crowded docket of the district court for the District of Columbia simply does not have the flexibility to absorb such a large number of cases.

There are numerous other problems created by maintaining the venue of the district court. Consider the costs to the political subdivision seeking bailout. It must hire a Washington lawyer, and has the expense and inconvenience of bringing witnesses from the localities. For the small locality seeking bailout, these expenses could be prohibitive, and it would certainly not be the wisest use of their limited resources.

Consider also the interests of a minority group voter who wishes to challenge the petition for bailout. The opportunity for such an aggrieved person to assert these rights is obstructed if he can only do so in the district court for the District of Columbia.

Those who support retaining the jurisdiction of the district court for the District of Columbia over bailout suits contend that there is a need for uniform interpretation of the law relating to bailout, and that courts outside the District of Columbia cannot be trusted to make unprejudicial decisions about voting rights cases.

Although these arguments fail to persuade me, it was the view which prevailed in the House of Representatives, over my strenuous objection. So I would suggest, Mr. Chairman, that there is a middle ground you may wish to consider.

U.S. magistrates have become an integral part of the Federal judiciary. If you are unwilling to shift venue for bailout to the U.S. District Court in the geographical area in question, provision should be made to use local magistrates to hear the evidence.

This would involve amending the bill before you to require the chief judge of the district court for the District of Columbia to request the assistance of local courts by designating the local U.S. magistrate to hear the evidence on the motion to bail out. The final decision to grant bailout, as in the current law, would be with the district court for the District of Columbia.

There would be advantages to using local Federal magistrates: easy and inexpensive access to the courts by the political subdivision seeking bailout and any aggrieved person as well; reductions in the burden on the district court; and uniform application of the law. I hope you will keep this possibility in mind.

There are other technical flaws in this legislation which further diminish the usefulness of the bailout provision. Mr. Chairman, I will mention only a few of these, but I do request that my entire statement be included in the record.

Senator HATCH. Without objection, it will be included in its entirety at the conclusion of your oral presentation.

Mr. BUTLER. Thank you very much.

Objections interposed by the Attorney General under section 5, one of the criteria for bailout, are not an accurate index of discrimination. They do not indicate improper conduct, impure motives, or failure to comply with the Voting Rights Act.

There are essentially no Justice Department guidelines to assure that submissions are reviewed by consistent standards, thus giving upper level bureaucrats extensive jurisdiction and discretion in deciding the merits of each proposed change. As such, objections can be imposed for a variety of reasons, including the failure of the submitting political subdivision to provide sufficient information, as well as the determination by the Attorney General that the change would have an unfavorable impact upon the political interests of minority group citizens.

In addition, when an objection is interposed, frequently a political subdivision will accede immediately and submit a new plan which meets with the Attorney General's approval and therefore supersedes the initial objection. Nevertheless, a single objection would bar bailout for 10 years under the proposed bill, and if this legislation were enacted, that alone would preclude the States of Alabama, Arizona, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, South Carolina, Texas, and Virginia from bailing out before 1990 or later.

Similar problems exist with respect to the requirement that a political subdivision show that no Federal examiners have been assigned to it. Under section 6 of the act, the Attorney General may, nearly at his will, assign examiners to a political subdivision.

Where once examiners were used extensively to list eligible voters, more recently they have been used only periodically in conjunction with Federal observers to monitor the conduct of elections.

The examiners receive complaints of possible discrimination, and the observers watch for possible misconduct. In this regard, it should be noted that Federal examiners must be assigned before Federal observers may be used, and that, in itself, is an incentive for the use of examiners.

The designation of Federal examiners and observers to monitor elections is a precaution; it is not a determination that discrimination has occurred and in fact may be done because minority group citizens are turning out at the polls in large numbers.

While the findings of Federal Examiners may be relevant to a decision to grant bailout, the mere fact that they were assigned is circumstantial and by no means should be an absolute bar to bailout.

Among the additional conditions for bailout is the requirement that a political subdivision demonstrate that is has taken constructive efforts to promote the political participation of minority group citizens. Although the idea of constructive efforts is admirable, the provision as written is pretty poor. A political subdivision would be required to prove that it had, and I quote, "eliminated voting procedures and methods of election which inhibit or dilute equal access to the political process," as well as, "intimidation and harassment" of persons exercising their right to vote.

As stated, this legislation requires that the court determine that the political subdivision has eliminated something, the existence of which has not been established. While it is reasonable that public officials should be responsible for remedying misconduct which has been found to have occurred, it is ridiculous to require that they prove that they have eliminated what has not been established to have existed in the first place.

In light of the tremendous progress which has been made since the act's passage, it is inappropriate and unfair for the opportunity to bail out to be effectively precluded by Congress setting standards for bailout which are impossible to achieve. As the preceding discussion would tend to suggest and a careful review of the legislation makes clear, the proposed legislation was not formulated with a genuine interest in establishing a functional bailout provision.

The Supreme Court upheld the constitutionality of the Voting Rights Act because, among other things, it provided a "bearable" burden of proof for bailout. The proposed bailout provision clearly exceeds the burden which the Court deemed bearable. A meaningful bailout provision would strengthen the Voting Rights Act by being a constructive force, beyond 1982, for advancing the voting rights of minority group citizens. I am hopeful the committee will consider the purposes of bailout in a more thorough, deliberate, and rational manner than was done in the House so that we might pass legislation which accomplishes this objective.

SECTION 2: INTENT OR EFFECT

The most significant change approved by the House went through largely unnoticed. This amendment is addressed to section 2 of the act and would establish an "effects" test as the single standard to judge discrimination in voting rights litigation.

While the importance and potential impact of this basic change cannot be underestimated, the failure of the House to consider it carefully cannot be overstated. In my judgment, what has taken place is simply a knee-jerk response to the Supreme Court's decision in Mobile v. Bolden, which would lead dangerously toward establishing a precedent for proportional representation and should be stricken from the legislation.

From its inception, the Votings Rights Act has embodied two standards of judging discrimination: the "effect" test in section 5 and the "intent" test in section 2. Under the preclearance provisions of section 5, the Department of Justice reviews the proposed changes in voting procedures in order to determine that the change "does not have the purpose and will not have the effect of denying or abridging the right to vote."

Section 5 has been administered to prevent, at a minimum, a retrogression of the voting power of minority group citizens and admittedly has been a form of affirmative action for the political interests of minority group citizens. The use of the "effect" test has been fundamental to the success of this extraordinary remedy in section 5. In fact, 90 percent of the objections interposed by the Department of Justice under section 5 have been based on a determination of the effect rather than the purpose or intent.

Although the use of the "effect" test gives the Department of Justice broad discretion to determine what constitutes a fair or discriminatory voting practice, this discretion is checked by two factors: First, section 5 is limited in its application geographically; and, second, in those areas to which section 5 applies, its purview is limited to changes in voting procedures and is applied therefore only prospectively.

Section 2, on the other hand, is a permanent provision which applies nationwide and provides recourse against laws or actions that are beyond the scope of section 5. Section 2 has been interpreted to be restatement of the 15th amendment under which a private right of action exists to challenge existing laws.

In cases which have involved claims of denial of equal protection or of voting rights, such as Washington v. Davis and Mobile v. Bolden, the courts have consistently held that a government act which is racially neutral on its face is not unconstitutional solely because it has racially disproportionate effects, and they have required that intent to discriminate must be shown.

Although the intent or "smoking gun" test is a difficult standard to prove, it is not unbearable. In requiring that intent be shown, the courts have permitted as evidence of intent, effects which can be traced to a racially discriminatory purpose. As such, the courts have permitted something short of smoke to prove that the gun was fired. Intent is difficult, but not impossible, to prove.

The legislation passed by the House of Representatives amends section 2 to establish an "effect" test as the single standard to judge discrimination in voting rights litigation, thereby nullifying the body of law the courts have developed concerning 14th and 15th amendment claims regarding voting rights. Proponents of this legislation have expressed their view that effect, in and of itself, should suffice to prove a violation of the act. They presume that all effects which are adverse to the political interests of minority group citizens are rooted in some impure motive. I do not believe such a presumption to be valid.

One need only to review the discretion the "effect" test has given the Department of Justice in enforcing section 5 to appreciate the travesty it would make of politics throughout the Nation if adopted as the single standard for judging discrimination in voting rights litigation.

The "effect" test would make determining discrimination a numbers game. The "effect" test would shift the focus for determining discrimination from the votes of individuals being equal to the voting strength of groups being equivalent. Consequently, existing laws and political systems could be challenged ex post facto and required to be changed for failing to statistically maximize the voting impact of minority groups.

Specifically, every at-large electoral system in the country in which minority group candidates were not elected in proportion to their numbers would be suspected of being discriminatory. In this respect, it should be noted that the 1979 Municipal Year Book estimated that nearly two-thirds of all municipalities between 25,000 and 500,000 people conduct elections in this manner. The Mobile case is an example. The city's at-large electoral system, which had been used for nearly 70 years, was challenged as being discriminatory, although there was no evidence that it had been established or maintained in order to deny or abridge the right to vote.

The kind of affirmative manipulation of voting procedures which the "effect" test would require is far beyond the original intent of the act, and in my judgment, is a step toward mandating proportional representation.

Although the House bill states that the fact that minority group citizens have not been elected in proportion to their numbers does not, in and of itself, constitute a violation of the act, such a disclaimer has no real relevance to the laws or procedures which would be changed subsequent to the adoption of the "effect" test.

Consequently, State and local subdivisions and local officials would be required to study prospective voting procedures to determine their effect and adopt only those which statistically maxitime—I emphasize statistically maximize—the voting impact of each minority group within the electorate.

It is hard to imagine any State districting plan, whether presently existing or under consideration, short of proportional representation, which would not be vulnerable to challenge under this standard. In this regard, it suggests that other factors such as contiguity, compactness, and respect for natural boundaries would be of secondary importance in drawing district lines, doing violence to extensive precedents which have developed over the years.

CONCLUSION

Although I have been critical of the House-passed legislation, I remain an advocate of a strong Federal role to assure that no citizen is denied the voting guarantees of the 15th amendment. The changes I propose to make in the legislation, modifying the bailout provision and eliminating the amendment to section 2, would not gut the act or give a license to discriminate to those of impure motive. I would not tolerate nor stand still for that.

It is all to easy for this issue to be construed as black and white: if you supported the House-passed bill, you are an advocate of civil rights; if you oppose the House-passed bill, you are a racist. I am hopeful that before we complete consideration of this legislation, we can rid ourselves of these divisive distinctions. Only then can we have a meangingful dialog in which alternatives are considered on their merit so that we might fashion, in this year 1982, the most effective legislation to protest the right to vote.

Senator HATCH. Thank you, Congressman Butler, for a very lucid statement. We appreciate your being with us today and would like to thank you for coming.

[The prepared statement of Hon. M. Caldwell Butler follows:]

PREPARED STATEMENT OF HON. M. CALDWELL BUTLER

THANK YOU MR. CHAIRMAN AND MEMBERS OF THE COMMITTEE.

I AM PLEASED TO BE HERE TODAY TO DISCUSS LEGISLATION TO AMEND THE VOTING RIGHTS ACT.

I APPRECIATE THE OPPORTUNITY TO SHARE MY VIEWS WITH YOU AND HOPE THEY MIGHT BE USEFUL IN YOUR CONSIDERATION OF THIS HISTORIC LEGISLATION.

ON OCTOBER 5, THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES PASSED LEGISLATION TO AMEND THE VOTING RIGHTS ACT. WHILE MANY HAVE PRAISED THIS LEGISLATION AS BOTH REASONABLE AND EQUITABLE IT IS, IN MY JUDGMENT, AN EXCESSIVE RESPONSE TO THE PROBLEM OF SECURING VOTING RIGHTS AND REFLECTS CYNICISM SUBSTANTIATED BY NEITHER THE RECORD OF PROGRESS WHICH HAS BEEN MADE UNDER THE ACT NOR THE GOOD FAITH EFFORTS OF THE VAST MAJORITY OF PUBLIC OFFICIALS TO COMPLY WITH THE SPIRIT AND THE LETTER OF THE LAW.

I WILL ADDRESS TWO MAJOR ISSUES WHICH HAVE EMERGED AS A CONSEQUENCE OF THIS ACTION BY THE HOUSE: FIRST, WHAT IS A FAIR MECHANISM TO PERMIT POLITICAL SUBDIVISIONS TO "BAILOUT" FROM THE ACT'S SPECIAL PROVISIONS?; AND SECOND, IN ACTIONS UNDER SECTION 2 OF THE VOTING RIGHTS ACT, WHAT SHOULD BE THE BURDEN OF PROOF TO ESTABLISH THE THE RIGHT TO VOTE HAS BEEN DENIED OR ABRIDGED?

THE SUPREME COURT RECOGNIZED THE IMPORTANCE OF BAILOUT IN SOUTH CAROLINA V. KATZENBACH BY STATING: " . . . ACKNOWLEDGING THE POSSIBILITY OF OVERBREADTH, THE ACT OF 1965 PROVIDES FOR TERMINATION OF SPECIAL STATUTORY COVERAGE AT THE BEHEST OF STATES AND POLITICAL SUBDIVISIONS IN WHICH THE DANGER OF SUBSTANTIAL VOTING DISCRIMINATION HAS NOT MATERIALIZED . . ."

FOR OPENERS THEN, A BAILOUT PROVISION SHOULD PERMIT POLITICAL SUBDIVISIONS WHICH HAVE COMPLIED WITH THE LETTER AND THE SPIRIT OF THE LAW TO TERMINATE THEIR COVERAGE UNDER THE SPECIAL PROVISIONS. SECOND, A BAILOUT PROVISION SHOULD OPERATE AS AN INCENTIVE FOR POLITICAL SUBDIVISIONS, WHICH HAVE NOT BEEN IN FULL CONFORMANCE WITH THE LAW, TO ADVANCE THE VOTING OPPORTUNITIES OF MINORITY GROUP CITIZENS. A BAILOUT PROVISION, BASED ON STRINGENT, YET ACHIEVABLE, REQUIREMENTS CAN CREATE SUCH AN INCENTIVE. ENHANCING THE POLITICAL PARTICIPATION OF MINORITY GROUP CITIZENS BECOMES A POLITICAL SUBDIVISION'S GOAL, AND SATISFYING THE REQUIREMENTS FOR BAILOUT BECOMES THE VEHICLE FOR ATTAINING THAT GOAL.

IN MY VIEW, THE LEGISLATION WHICH PASSED THE HOUSE NEGLECTS THESE PURPOSES AND MAKES A MOCKERY OF THE IDEA OF A REASONABLE BAILOUT. THE LEGISLATION WOULD ESTABLISH CONDITIONS FOR BAILOUT WHICH WOULD BE IMPOSSIBLE TO ACHIEVE, AND EFFECTIVELY EXTEND FOREVER, THE SPECIAL PROVISIONS OF THE VOTING RIGHTS ACT ON THE VAST MAJORITY OF STATES AND POLITICAL SUBDIVISIONS CURRENTLY COVERED BY THEM.

A CAREFUL REVIEW OF THE BAILOUT PROVISION REVEALS OVER TEN JURISDICTIONAL REQUIREMENTS WHICH MUST BE SATISFIED IN ORDER FOR A POLITICAL SUBDIVISION TO BAILOUT. THE ABILITY OF THE PETITIONING POLITICAL SUBDIVISION TO BAILOUT, THEREFORE, DEPENDS UPON ITS ABILITY TO PRESENT MANY FACTS, GARNERED FROM A WIDE VARIETY OF SOURCES, WHICH DOCUMENT TEN YEARS OF EXEMPLARY CONDUCT UNDER THE ACT. IN ORDER TO JUDGE THESE FACTS PROPERLY, THE COURT SHOULD HAVE ACCESS TO THE PEOPLE AND THE CIRCUMSTANCES WHICH SHAPE THE UNIQUE ELECTORAL AFFAIRS OF THE LOCALITY. INDEED, IT WOULD APPEAR TO BE ONE OF THE BASES OF DUE PROCESS THAT THERE SHOULD BE SOME REASONABLE RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN THE FACTS TO BE DETERMINED AND THE LOCATION OF THE FORUM TO DETERMINE THEM. IN FACT, OUR FEDERAL COURT SYSTEM, PARTLY THROUGH STATUTE, AND PARTLY THROUGH CASE LAW, HAS DEVELOPED THE DOCTRINE OF FORAM NON CONVENIENS WHICH PROVIDES ALMOST FOR TRIAL IN THE MOST CONVENIENT PLACE.

UNDER BOTH THE PROPOSED LEGISLATION, AND THE EXISTING LAW, THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA HAS SOLE JURISDICTION TO HEAR DECLARATORY JUDGMENT ACTIONS SEEKING BAILOUT. IF, AS THE PROPONENTS OF THIS LEGISLATION CONTEND, 25 PERCENT OF ALL POLITICAL SUBDIVISIONS CURRENTLY COVERED BY THE SPECIAL PROVISIONS WOULD BE ELIGIBLE TO BAILOUT IF THE LEGISLATION IS ENACTED, IT SEEMS INCONGRUOUS TO VEST ONE COURT WITH THIS RESPONSIBILITY TO HEAR THE HUNDREDS OF CASES WHICH WOULD ENSUE. THE CROWDED DOCKET OF THE DISTRICT COURT FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA SIMPLY DOES NOT HAVE THE FLEXIBILITY TO ABSORB SUCH A LARGE NUMBER OF CASES. TO ARGUE THAT DECLARATORY JUDGMENT SUITS BE HEARD ONLY IN WASHINGTON IS TO ARGUE FOR DELAYED JUSTICE.

THERE ARE NUMEROUS OTHER PROBLEMS CREATED BY MAINTAINING THE VENUE OF THE DISTRICT COURT FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA OVER BAILOUT. CONSIDER THE COSTS TO THE POLITICAL SUBDIVISION SEEKING BAILOUT. THERE WOULD BE LEGAL FEES FOR AN ATTORNEY APPRISED OF THE LOCAL SITUATION AS WELL AS FOR A WASHINGTON LAWYER LICENSED TO LITIGATE IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA. THERE WOULD BE THE COST FOR REPRESENTATIVES OF THE POLITICAL SUBDIVISION TO TRAVEL AND STAY IN WASHINGTON, IN ADDITION TO THE EXPENSE AND INCONVENIENCE OF BRINGING WITNESSES FROM THE LOCALITY. MOREOVER, THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT BRINGS TO THESE CASES A TREMENDOUS RESOURCE ADVANTAGE WHICH COULD BE OVERCOME ONLY BY FURTHER EXPENSE TO THE POLITICAL SUBDIVISION. FOR THE SMALL LOCALITY SEEKING TO BAILOUT, THESE EXPENSES COULD BE PROHIBITIVE, CERTAINLY NOT THE WISEST USE OF LIMITED RESOURCES.

CONSIDER ALSO THE INTERESTS OF A MINORITY GROUP VOTER WHO WISHES TO CHALLENGE THE PETITION FOR BAILOUT. BEAR IN MIND THAT THIS LEGISLATION WOULD PERMIT ANY AGGRIEVED PERSON TO INTERVENE IN THE BAILOUT SUIT AT ANY TIME, AND THAT ANY AGGRIEVED PERSON MAY PETITION TO REOPEN THE CASE WITHIN TEN YEARS AFTER BAILOUT HAS BEEN GRANTED. THE OPPORTUNITY FOR SUCH AN AGGRIEVED PERSON TO ASSERT THESE RIGHTS IS OBSTRUCTED IF HE CAN ONLY DO SO IN THE DISTRICT COURT FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

IN MY JUDGMENT, THE PROMISE OF BAILOUT IS MADE HOLLOW BY PREVENTING REASONABLE ACCESS TO THE COURTS. THOSE WHO SUPPORT RETAINING THE JURISDICTION OF THE DISTRICT COURT FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA OVER BAILOUT SUITS CONTEND THERE IS A NEED FOR UNIFORM INTERPRETATION OF THE LAW RELATING TO BAILOUT AND THAT COURTS OUTSIDE OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA CANNOT BE TRUSTED TO MAKE UNPREJUDICIAL DECISIONS ABOUT VOTING RIGHTS CASES. ALTHOUGH THESE ARGUMENTS FAIL TO PERSUADE ME, IT IS THE VIEW WHICH PREVAILED IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OVER MY STRENUOUS OBJECTION.

THERE IS A MIDDLE GROUND WHICH YOU MAY WISH TO CONSIDER.

THE FEDERAL MAGISTRATE ACT OF 1968, AMENDED IN 1976 AND 1979, ESTABLISHED THE UNITED STATES MAGISTRATE SYSTEM. AMONG THE PRINCIPLE OBJECTIVES OF THE MAGISTRATE SYSTEM IS TO INCREASE THE EFFICIENCY OF THE FEDERAL JUDICIARY BY RELIEVING DISTRICT COURTS OF SOME OF THEIR BURDENS, WHILE AT THE SAME TIME, PROVIDING A HIGH STANDARD OF JUSTICE AT THE POINT OF FIRST CONTACT, FOR MANY INDIVIDUALS, WITH THE COURTS. THE JURISDICTION OF MAGISTRATES IS THAT OF THE DISTRICT COURT ITSELF, DELEGATED TO THE MAGISTRATE BY JUDGES OF THE COURT.

UNITED STATES MAGISTRATES HAVE BECOME AN INTEGRAL PART OF THE FEDERAL JUDICIARY. IF YOU ARE UNWILLING TO SHIFT VENUE FOR BAILOUT TO U.S. DISTRICT COURTS IN THE GEOGRAPHICAL AREA IN QUESTION, PROVISION SHOULD BE MADE TO USE LOCAL MAGISTRATES TO HEAR THE EVIDENCE.

THIS WOULD INVOLVE AMENDING H.R. 3112, AS IT PASSED THE HOUSE, TO REQUIRE THE CHIEF JUDGE OF THE DISTRICT COURT FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA TO REQUEST THE ASSISTANCE OF THE LOCAL DISTRICT COURT BY DESIGNATING THE LOCAL UNITED STATES MAGISTRATE TO HEAR THE EVIDENCE ON THE MOTION TO BAILOUT. THE MAGISTRATE WOULD REPORT THE FINDINGS TOGETHER WITH RECOMMENDATIONS TO THE DISTRICT COURT FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA. THE COURT COULD ACCEPT, REJECT, OR MODIFY THE

MAGISTRATE'S FINDINGS OR COULD RECOMMIT THE MATTER TO THE MAGISTRATE WITH INSTRUCTIONS. THE FINAL DECISION TO GRANT BAILOUT, AS IN THE CURRENT LAW, WOULD BE WITH THE DISTRICT COURT FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

THERE WOULD BE ADVANTAGES TO UTILIZING FEDERAL MAGISTRATES IN THIS MANNER: EASY AND INEXPENSIVE ACCESS TO THE COURTS BY THE POLITICAL SUBDIVISION SEEKING BAILOUT AND ANY AGGRIEVED PERSON AS WELL; REDUCTIONS IN THE BURDEN ON THE DISTRICT COURT FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA; AND UNIFORM APPLICATION OF THE LAW. I HOPE YOU WILL KEEP THIS POSSIBILITY IN MIND AS A POSSIBLE COMPROMISE.

OTHER CONCEPTUAL AND TECHNICAL FLAWS IN THIS LEGISLATION FURTHER DIMINISH THE USEFULNESS OF THE BAILOUT PROVISION. FOR EXAMPLE, THE PROPOSED LEGISLATION WOULD ESTABLISH THREE CRITERIA FOR BAILOUT BASED ON COMPLIANCE WITH SECTION 5. THESE REQUIREMENTS INCLUDE: PRECLEARING ALL CHANGES IN VOTING PROCEDURES BEFORE THEY ARE ENFORCED; REPEALING ALL CHANGES TO WHICH THE ATTORNEY GENERAL HAS OBJECTED; AND DEMONSTRATING THAT THE ATTORNEY GENERAL HAS ENTERED NO OBJECTION TO A PROPOSED CHANGE IN VOTING PROCEDURES.

FROM THE OUTSET, IT SHOULD BE NOTED THAT 100 PERCENT COMPLIANCE WITH SECTION 5 IS NOT A REALISTIC EXPECTATION. A VETERAN OF THE VOTING SECTION OF THE DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,

SPEAKING BEFORE THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE ASSOCIATION, STATED, AND I QUOTE: "FIRST, NO MATTER ~~HOW MANY CHANGES~~ AN OFFICIAL SUBMITS TO THE ATTORNEY GENERAL, A STUDENT OF SECTION 5 CAN ALWAYS FIND ANOTHER CHANGE THAT HAS NOT BEEN SUBMITTED . . . SECOND, NO MATTER HOW WELL AN ELECTION ADMINISTRATOR PLANS IN ADVANCE OF AN ELECTION, THERE WILL BE CHANGES THAT MUST BE IMPLEMENTED BEFORE THEY CAN BE PRECLEARED."

OBJECTIONS INTERPOSED BY THE ATTORNEY GENERAL UNDER SECTION 5 ARE NOT AN ACCURATE INDEX OF DISCRIMINATION; THEY DO NOT INDICATE IMPROPER CONDUCT, IMPURE MOTIVES, OR FAILURE TO COMPLY WITH THE VOTING RIGHTS ACT. THERE ARE ESSENTIALLY NO GUIDELINES TO ASSURE THAT SUBMISSIONS ARE REVIEWED BY CONSISTENT STANDARDS WHICH GIVES UPPER LEVEL BUREAUCRATS EXTENSIVE DISCRETION IN DECIDING THE MERITS OF EACH PROPOSED CHANGE. AS SUCH, OBJECTIONS CAN BE INTERPOSED FOR A VARIETY OF REASONS, INCLUDING: THE FAILURE OF THE SUBMITTING POLITICAL SUBDIVISION TO PROVIDE SUFFICIENT INFORMATION ABOUT THE PROPOSED CHANGE; AS WELL AS, THE DETERMINATION BY THE ATTORNEY GENERAL THAT THE CHANGE WOULD HAVE AN UNFAVORABLE IMPACT UPON THE POLITICAL INTERESTS OF MINORITY GROUP CITIZENS. IN ADDITION, WHEN AN OBJECTION IS INTERPOSED, FREQUENTLY A POLITICAL SUBDIVISION WILL ACCEDE IMMEDIATELY AND SUBMIT A NEW PLAN WHICH MEETS WITH THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S APPROVAL

AND THEREFORE SUPERCEDES THE INITIAL OBJECTION. NONETHELESS, A SINGLE OBJECTION WOULD BAR BAILOUT FOR TEN YEARS, AND IF THIS LEGISLATION WERE ENACTED, THAT ALONE, WOULD PRECLUDE THE STATES OF ALABAMA, ARIZONA, GEORGIA, LOUISIANA, MISSISSIPPI, SOUTH CAROLINA, TEXAS, AND VIRGINIA FROM BAILING OUT BEFORE 1990.

OTHER REQUIREMENTS OF THE BAILOUT PROVISIONS ARE ALSO POORLY CONCEIVED. FOR EXAMPLE, BAILOUT WOULD BE DENIED TO A POLITICAL SUBDIVISION WHICH ENTERED INTO A CONSENT DECREE, TO RESOLVE A DISPUTED VOTING PRACTICE. A CONSENT DECREE, UNLIKE AN ADJUDICATED DECISION, DOES NOT DETERMINE RESPONSIBILITY FOR WRONG DOING, AND IS FREQUENTLY ENTERED INTO VOLUNTARILY TO AVOID COSTLY LITIGATION. THE CONSEQUENCES OF IMPOSING SUCH A REQUIREMENT, WOULD BE TO DISCOURAGE PUBLIC OFFICIALS FROM RESOLVING DISPUTED VOTING PRACTICES THROUGH VOLUNTARY AND INFORMAL CONCILIATION. THERE WOULD BE NO ADVANTAGE FOR THEM TO DO SO IF IN THE FUTURE IT PREVENTED THE BAILOUT OF THE POLITICAL SUBDIVISION THEY SERVE. AS SUCH, THIS REQUIREMENT WOULD INCREASE THE LIKELIHOOD THAT LITIGATION WOULD BE USED TO RECONCILE DISPUTES OVER VOTING PRACTICES AND PROCEDURES WHICH WOULD OTHERWISE BE RESOLVED OUT OF COURT.

SIMILAR PROBLEMS EXIST WITH RESPECT TO THE REQUIREMENT THAT A POLITICAL SUBDIVISION SHOW THAT NO FEDERAL EXAMINERS

HAVE BEEN ASSIGNED TO IT. UNDER SECTION 6 OF THE ACT, THE ATTORNEY GENERAL MAY, NEARLY AT HIS WILL, ASSIGN EXAMINERS TO A POLITICAL SUBDIVISION. WHERE ONCE EXAMINERS WERE USED EXTENSIVELY TO LIST ELIGIBLE VOTERS, MORE RECENTLY THEY HAVE BEEN USED ONLY PERIODICALLY IN CONJUNCTION WITH FEDERAL OBSERVERS TO MONITOR THE CONDUCT OF ELECTIONS; THE EXAMINERS RECEIVE COMPLAINTS OF POSSIBLE DISCRIMINATION AND THE OBSERVERS WATCH FOR POSSIBLE MISCONDUCT AT THE POLLING PLACE. IN THIS REGARD, IT SHOULD BE NOTED THAT FEDERAL EXAMINERS MUST BE ASSIGNED BEFORE FEDERAL OBSERVERS MAY BE USED, AND THAT IN ITSELF IS AN INCENTIVE FOR THEIR USE.

THE DESIGNATION OF FEDERAL EXAMINERS AND OBSERVERS TO MONITOR ELECTIONS IS A PRECAUTION; IT IS NOT A DETERMINATION THAT DISCRIMINATION HAS OCCURRED, AND IN FACT MAY BE DONE BECAUSE MINORITY GROUP CITIZENS ARE TURNING OUT AT THE POLLS IN LARGE NUMBERS. WHILE THE FINDINGS OF FEDERAL EXAMINERS MAY BE RELEVANT TO A DECISION TO GRANT BAILOUT, THE MERE FACT THAT THEY WERE ASSIGNED IS CIRCUMSTANTIAL AND BY NO MEANS SHOULD BE AN ABSOLUTE BAR TO BAILOUT.

AMONG THE ADDITIONAL CONDITIONS FOR BAILOUT IS THE REQUIREMENT THAT A POLITICAL SUBDIVISION DEMONSTRATE THAT IT HAS TAKEN CONSTRUCTIVE EFFORTS TO PROMOTE THE POLITICAL PARTICIPATION OF MINORITY GROUP CITIZENS. ALTHOUGH THE IDEA

IS ADMIRABLE, THE PROVISION, AS WRITTEN, IS SPECIOUS. A POLITICAL SUBDIVISION WOULD BE REQUIRED TO PROVE THAT IT HAD "ELIMINATED VOTING PROCEDURES AND METHODS OF ELECTION WHICH INHIBIT OF DILUTE EQUAL ACCESS TO THE POLITICAL PROCESS," AS WELL AS, "INTIMIDATION AND HARASSMENT" OF PERSONS EXERCISING THEIR RIGHT TO VOTE. AS STATED, THIS LEGISLATION REQUIRES THAT THE COURT DETERMINE THAT THE POLITICAL SUBDIVISION HAS ELIMINATED SOMETHING, THE EXISTANCE OF WHICH HAS NOT BEEN ESTABLISHED. WHILE IT IS REASONABLE THAT PUBLIC OFFICIALS SHOULD BE RESPONSIBLE FOR REMEDYING MISCONDUCT WHICH HAS BEEN FOUND TO HAVE OCCURRED, IT IS RIDICULOUS TO REQUIRE THAT THEY PROVE THEY HAVE ELIMINATED WHAT IS NOT ESTABLISHED TO HAVE EXISTED.

FINALLY, THE POLITICAL SUBDIVISION MUST PRESENT "EVIDENCE OF MINORITY PARTICIPATION" TO ASSIST THE COURT IN MAKING ITS DETERMINATION TO GRANT BAILOUT. THE LEGISLATION FAILS TO DEFINE THE AMOUNT OF EVIDENCE WHICH IS REQUIRED, THE BOUNDS BY WHICH STATISTICAL MEASURES OF "PARTICIPATION" ARE DETERMINED TO BE "GOOD" OR "BAD," OR THE MANNER IN WHICH THE COURT SHOULD USE THE INFORMATION TO "ASSIST" IN ITS DISPOSITION OF THE CASE. LIKE THE CONDITIONS FOR BAILOUT WHICH PRECEDED IT, THE STANDARDS FOR SATISFYING THIS REQUIREMENT COULD BE INTERPRETED IN NUMEROUS WAYS AND THEREFORE WOULD NOT PROVIDE RELIABLE GUIDELINES TO ASSIST PUBLIC OFFICIALS TO FORMULATE POLICIES WHICH COMPLY WITH THE ACT AND CONTRIBUTE TO PROMOTING THE POLITICAL INTERESTS OF MINORITY GROUP CITIZENS.

IN LIGHT OF THE TREMENDOUS PROGRESS WHICH HAS BEEN MADE SINCE THE ACT'S PASSAGE, IT IS INAPPROPRIATE AND UNFAIR FOR THE OPPORTUNITY TO BAILOUT TO BE EFFECTIVELY PRECLUDED BY CONGRESS SETTING STANDARDS FOR BAILOUT WHICH ARE IMPOSSIBLE TO ACHEIVE. AS THE PRECEDING DISCUSSION WOULD SUGGEST, AND A CAREFUL REVIEW OF THE LEGISLATION MAKES CLEAR, THE PROPOSED LEGISLATION WAS NOT FORMULATED WITH A GENUINE INTEREST IN ESTABLISHING A FUNCTIONAL BAILOUT PROVISION. THE SUPREME COURT UPHELD THE CONSTITUTIONALITY OF THE VOTING RIGHTS ACT BECAUSE, AMONG OTHER THINGS, IT PROVIDED A "BEARABLE" BURDEN OF PROOF TO BAILOUT; THE PROPOSED BAILOUT PROVISION CLEARLY EXCEEDS THE BURDEN WHICH THE COURT DEEMED "BEARABLE." A MEANINGFUL BAILOUT PROVISION WOULD STRENGTHEN THE VOTING RIGHTS ACT BY BEING A CONSTRUCTIVE FORCE, BEYOND 1982, FOR ADVANCING THE VOTING RIGHTS OF MINORITY GROUP CITIZENS. I AM HOPEFUL THIS COMMITTEE WILL CONSIDER THE PURPOSES OF BAILOUT IN A MORE THOROUGH, DELIBERATE, AND RATIONAL MANNER THAN WAS DONE IN THE HOUSE SO THAT WE MIGHT PASS LEGISLATION WHICH ACCOMPLISHES THIS OBJECTIVE.

THE MOST SIGNIFICANT CHANGE APPROVED BY THE HOUSE WENT LARGELY UNNOTICED. THIS AMENDMENT IS ADDRESSED TO SECTION 2 OF THE ACT AND WOULD ESTABLISH AN "EFFECT" TEST AS THE SINGLE STANDARD TO JUDGE DISCRIMINATION IN VOTING RIGHTS LITIGATION. WHILE THE IMPORTANCE AND POTENTIAL IMPACT OF THIS CHANGE CANNOT BE UNDERESTIMATED, THE FAILURE OF THE HOUSE TO CONSIDER IT CAREFULLY CANNOT BE OVERSTATED. ALTHOUGH OVER ONE-HUNDRED WITNESSES PARTICIPATED IN THE HOUSE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE HEARINGS, ONLY THREE PERSONS TESTIFIED ABOUT THIS CHANGE IN EXISTING LAW; EACH, I MIGHT ADD, ADVOCATED THE "EFFECTS" TEST. ON THE FLOOR, AFTER MINIMAL DISCUSSION, THE AMENDMENT WAS PASSED BY A VOICE VOTE. HAD THE MEMBERS OF THE HOUSE BEEN BETTER INFORMED OF THE IMPORTANCE OF THIS AMENDMENT, I DO NOT BELIEVE THAT IT WOULD HAVE PASSED WITHOUT CONTROVERSY. IN MY JUDGMENT, THIS IS A KNEE-JERK RESPONSE TO THE SUPREME COURT'S DECISION IN CITY OF MOBILE V. BOLDEN (1980), WOULD LEAD DANGEROUSLY TOWARD ESTABLISHING A PRECEDENT FOR PROPORTIONAL REPRESENTATION, AND SHOULD BE STRICKEN FROM THE LEGISLATION.

FROM ITS INCEPTION, THE VOTING RIGHTS ACT HAS EMBODIED TWO STANDARDS FOR JUDGING DISCRIMINATION: THE "EFFECT" TEST IN SECTION 5 AND THE "INTENT" TEST IN SECTION 2. UNDER THE PRECLEARANCE PROVISIONS OF SECTION 5 THE DEPARTMENT OF

JUSTICE REVIEWS PROPOSED CHANGES IN VOTING PROCEDURES IN ORDER TO DETERMINE THAT THE CHANGE "DOES NOT HAVE THE PURPOSE AND WILL NOT HAVE THE EFFECT OF DENYING OR ABRIDGING THE RIGHT TO VOTE." SECTION 5 HAS BEEN ADMINISTERED TO PREVENT, AT A MINIMUM, A RETROGRESSION OF THE VOTING POWER OF MINORITY GROUP CITIZENS AND ADMITTEDLY HAS BEEN A FORM OF AFFIRMATIVE ACTION FOR THE POLITICAL INTERESTS OF MINORITY GROUP CITIZENS; THE USE OF THE "EFFECT" TEST HAS BEEN FUNDMENTAL TO THE SUCCESS OF THIS EXTRAORDINARY REMEDY. IN FACT, 90 PERCENT OF THE OBJECTIONS INTERPOSED BY THE DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE UNDER SECTION 5 HAVE BEEN BASED ON A DETERMINATION OF "EFFECT" RATHER THAN "PURPOSE" OR "INTENT."

ALTHOUGH THE USE OF THE "EFFECT" TEST GIVES THE DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BROAD DISCRETION TO DETERMINE WHAT CONSTITUTES A FAIR OR A DISCRIMINATORY VOTING PRACTICE, THIS DISCRETION IS CHECKED BY TWO FACTORS: FIRST, SECTION 5 IS LIMITED IN ITS APPLICATION GEOGRAPHICALLY; AND SECOND, IN THOSE AREAS TO WHICH SECTION 5 APPLIES, ITS PURVIEW IS LIMITED TO CHANGES IN VOTING PROCEDURES AND THEREFORE IS APPLIED ONLY PROSPECTIVELY.

AS MEMBERS ARE AWARE, SECTION 2 IS A PERMANENT PROVISION WHICH APPLIES NATIONWIDE AND PROVIDES RECOURSE AGAINST LAWS OR ACTIONS THAT ARE BEYOND THE SCOPE OF SECTION 5. SECTION 2 HAS BEEN INTERPRETED TO BE A RESTATEMENT OF THE FIFTEENTH AMENDMENT UNDER WHICH A PRIVATE RIGHT OF ACTION EXISTS TO CHALLENGE EXISTING LAWS. IN CASES WHICH HAVE INVOLVED CLAIMS OF DENIAL OF EQUAL PROTECTION OR OF VOTING RIGHTS, SUCH AS WASHINGTON V. DAVIS OR MOBILE V. BOLDEN, THE COURTS HAVE CONSISTENTLY HELD THAT A GOVERNMENT ACT, WHICH IS RACIALLY NEUTRAL ON ITS FACE, IS NOT UNCONSTITUTIONAL SOLELY BECAUSE IT HAS RACIALLY DISPROPORTIONATE EFFECTS, AND HAVE REQUIRED THAT "INTENT" TO DISCRIMINATE BE SHOWN. ALTHOUGH THE "INTENT" OR "SMOKING GUN" TEST IS A DIFFICULT STANDARD OF PROOF, IT IS NOT UNBEARABLE. IN REQUIRING THAT "INTENT" BE SHOWN, THE COURTS HAVE PERMITTED AS EVIDENCE OF "INTENT," "EFFECTS" WHICH CAN BE TRACED TO A RACIALLY DISCRIMINATORY PURPOSE. AS SUCH, THE COURTS HAVE PERMITTED SOMETHING SHORT OF SMOKE TO PROVE THE GUN WAS FIRED, THEREFORE, INTENT IS DIFFICULT BUT NOT IMPOSSIBLE TO PROVE.

THE LEGISLATION PASSED BY THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES AMENDS SECTION 2 TO ESTABLISH AN "EFFECT" TEST AS THE SINGLE STANDARD TO JUDGE DISCRIMINATION IN VOTING RIGHTS LITIGATION, THEREBY NULLIFYING THE BODY OF LAW THE COURTS HAVE DEVELOPED CONCERNING FOURTEENTH AND FIFTEENTH AMENDMENT CLAIMS REGARDING VOTING RIGHTS. PROPONENTS OF THIS LEGISLATION HAVE EXPRESSED THEIR VIEW THAT EFFECT, IN AND OF ITSELF, SHOULD SUFFICE TO PROVE A VIOLATION OF THE ACT. THEY PRESUME THAT ALL AFFECTS

WHICH ARE ADVERSE TO THE POLITICAL INTERESTS OF MINORITY GROUP CITIZENS, ARE ROOTED IN SOME IMPURE MOTIVE. I DO NOT BELIEVE SUCH A PRESUMPTION TO BE VALID.

ONE NEED ONLY REVIEW THE DISCRETION THE "EFFECT" TEST HAS GIVEN THE DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE IN ENFORCING SECTION 5, TO APPRECIATE THE TRAVESTY IT WOULD MAKE OF POLITICS THROUGHOUT THE NATION IF ADOPTED AS THE SINGLE STANDARD FOR JUDGING DISCRIMINATION IN VOTING RIGHTS LITIGATION.

THE "EFFECT" TEST WOULD MAKE DETERMINING DISCRIMINATION A NUMBERS GAME. THE "EFFECT" TEST WOULD SHIFT THE FOCUS FOR DETERMINING DISCRIMINATION FROM THE VOTES OF INDIVIDUALS BEING EQUAL TO THE VOTING STRENGTH OF GROUPS BEING EQUIVALENT. CONSEQUENTLY, EXISTING LAWS AND POLITICAL SYSTEMS COULD BE CHALLENGED EX POST FACTO AND REQUIRED TO BE CHANGED FOR FAILING TO STATISTICALLY MAXIMIZE THE VOTING IMPACT OF MINORITY GROUPS. SPECIFICALLY, EVERY AT-LARGE ELECTORAL SYSTEM IN THE COUNTRY IN WHICH MINORITY GROUP CANDIDATES WERE NOT ELECTED IN PROPORTION TO THEIR NUMBERS WOULD BE SUSPECT OF BEING DISCRIMINATORY. IN THIS RESPECT, IT SHOULD BE NOTED THAT THE 1979 MUNICIPAL YEAR BOOK ESTIMATED THAT NEARLY TWO-THIRDS OF ALL MUNICIPALITIES BETWEEN 25,000 AND 500,000 PEOPLE CONDUCT ELECTIONS IN THIS MANNER. THE MOBILE CASE IS AN EXAMPLE: THE CITY'S AT-LARGE ELECTORAL SYSTEM,

WHICH HAD BEEN USED FOR NEARLY 70 YEARS, WAS CHALLENGED AS BEING DISCRIMINATORY ALTHOUGH THERE WAS NO EVIDENCE THAT IT HAD BEEN ESTABLISHED OR MAINTAINED IN ORDER TO DENY OR ABRIDGE THE RIGHT TO VOTE.

THE KIND OF AFFIRMATIVE MANIPULATION OF VOTING PROCEDURES WHICH THE "EFFECT" TEST WOULD REQUIRE IS FAR BEYOND THE ORIGINAL INTENT OF THE ACT, AND IN MY JUDGMENT, IS A STEP TOWARDS MANDATING PROPORTIONAL REPRESENTATION.

IN THE AMENDED FORM SECTION 2 WOULD STATE: "NO VOTING QUALIFICATION OR PREREQUISITE TO VOTING, OR STANDARD, PRACTICE OR PROCEDURE SHALL BE IMPOSED OR APPLIED BY ANY STATE OR POLITICAL SUBDIVISION IN A MANNER WHICH RESULTS IN A DENIAL OR ABRIDGEMENT OF THE RIGHT OF ANY CITIZEN OF THE UNITED STATES TO VOTE ON ACCOUNT OF RACE OR COLOR, OR IN CONTRAVENTION OF THE GUARANTEE SET FORTH IN SECTION 4(F)(2) OF THIS ACT. THE FACT THAT MEMBERS OF A MINORITY GROUP HAVE NOT BEEN ELECTED IN NUMBERS EQUAL TO THE GROUP'S PROPORTION OF THE POPULATION SHALL NOT, IN AND OF ITSELF, CONSTITUTE A VIOLATION OF THIS SECTION."

ALTHOUGH THE LEGISLATION STATES THAT THE FACT THAT MINORITY GROUP CITIZENS HAVE NOT BEEN ELECTED IN PROPORTION TO THEIR NUMBERS DOES NOT IN AND OF ITSELF CONSTITUTE A VIOLATION OF THE ACT, SUCH A DISCLAIMER HAS NO RELEVANCE TO

LAWS OR PROCEDURES WHICH WOULD BE CHANGED SUBSEQUENT TO THE ADOPTION OF THE "EFFECT" TEST. CONSEQUENTLY, STATE AND LOCAL OFFICIALS WOULD BE REQUIRED TO STUDY PROSPECTIVE VOTING PROCEDURES TO DETERMINE THEIR "EFFECT" AND ADOPT ONLY ~~THOSE~~ WHICH STATISTICALLY MAXIMIZE THE VOTING IMPACT OF EACH MINORITY GROUP WITHIN THE ELECTORATE. IT IS HARD TO IMAGINE ANY STATE DISTRICTING PLAN, WHETHER PRESENTLY EXISTING OR UNDER CONSIDERATION, SHORT OF PROPORTIONAL REPRESENTATION, WHICH WOULD NOT BE VULNERABLE TO CHALLENGE UNDER THIS STANDARD. IN THIS REGARD, IT SUGGESTS THAT OTHER FACTORS SUCH AS CONTIGUITY, COMPACTNESS, AND RESPECT FOR NATURAL BOUNDARIES WOULD BE OF SECONDARY IMPORTANCE IN DRAWING DISTRICT LINES, DOING VIOLENCE TO EXTENSIVE PRECEDENTS WHICH HAVE DEVELOPED OVER THE YEARS.

ALTHOUGH I HAVE BEEN CRITICAL OF THE HOUSE-PASSED LEGISLATION, I REMAIN AN ADVOCATE OF A STRONG FEDERAL ROLE TO ASSURE NO CITIZEN IS DENIED THE VOTING GUARANTEES OF THE FIFTEENTH AMENDMENT. THE CHANGES I PROPOSE MAKING IN THE LEGISLATION, MODIFYING THE BAILOUT PROVISION AND ELMINATING THE AMENDMENT TO SECTION 2, WOULD NOT GUT THE ACT, OR GIVE A LICENSE TO DISCRIMINATE TO THOSE OF IMPURE MOTIVE; I WOULD NOT TOLERATE THAT. IT IS ALL TOO EASY FOR THIS ISSUE TO BE CONSTRUED AS BLACK AND WHITE: IF YOU SUPPORT THE HOUSE-

PASSED BILL, YOU ARE AN ADVOCATE OF CIVIL RIGHTS; AND IF YOU OPPOSE THE HOUSE-PASSED BILL, YOU ARE A RACIST. I AM HOPEFUL THAT BEFORE WE COMPLETE CONSIDERATION OF LEGISLATION TO AMEND THE VOTING RIGHTS ACT, WE CAN RID OURSELVES OF THESE DIVISIVE DISTINCTIONS. ONLY THEN, CAN WE HAVE MEANINGFUL DIALOGUE IN WHICH ALTERNATIVES ARE CONSIDERED ON THEIR MERITS SO THAT WE MIGHT FASHION THE MOST EFFECTIVE LEGISLATION TO PROTECT THE RIGHT TO VOTE FOR 1982 AND BEYOND.

THANK YOU FOR YOUR TIME.

Senator HATCH. Our second witness today will be Prof. Susan MacManus of the Department of Political Science at the University of Houston. Professor MacManus has written extensively on the subject of State and local government, including a number of studies on the implications for minorities of various structures of municipal government. We are very happy to have you here, Professor MacManus.

Now, if I can, other than Members of Congress, we are going to limit you to 10 minutes. The green light means you have 10 minutes; the yellow means you have one left. Red means I am going to interrupt you and we will stop. But we will put all full statements in the record so that your complete statement will be placed in it. We would particularly appreciate summaries if you could provide them.

Thank you, Professor. Go ahead.

STATEMENT OF PROF. SUSAN A. MacMANUS, UNIVERSITY OF HOUSTON

Ms. MACMANUS. Thank you very much for the opportunity to share my views and to speak on behalf of the many local governments that have to meet the letter of this law.

The Voting Rights Act is one of the most important pieces of legislation ever passed by Congress. Certainly all of the statistics show a dramatic increase in the participation of blacks and Hispanics in the electoral system. For this reason, I would like to advocate that an extension be made nationwide.

One thing that is important for you as policymakers to be aware of is that many governments covered by the act now that are fully in compliance with the spirit of the law cannot demonstrate their compliance because the Justice Department's application of it has been many times arbitrary and conflicting.

I have, as an academician, studied the impact of various electoral systems on the participation and representation of various minority groups—blacks, Hispanics, and women. I have also studied the taxing, spending, and service delivery patterns of State and local governments, particularly as they impact on minority citizens. As a consultant, I have advised six governments in the State of Texas how to prepare their document for the Justice Department and the courts to demonstrate compliance with the Voting Rights Act.

On the basis of these experiences, I would like to point out what I consider to be some of the more difficult things confronting local governments in improving compliance. In my prepared testimony, I start out with some of the data collection difficulties, but I would like to go immediately to the real heart of the matter, and that is the difficulty in proving that electoral changes do not dilute minority vote. I think this is the single most important and difficult task confronting local governments.

One reason is that the concepts used by the Justice Department have never been defined in any sort of clear and concise manner, particularly concepts such as racial polarization and bloc voting. It is almost impossible for a local government to figure out what exactly these terms mean, even though they are expected to come up with statistics of this manner in their efforts to prove compliance with the act.

WHAT IS RACIAL POLARIZATION?

One test that is often used to determine whether the minority vote has been or will be diluted is racial polarization. This, technically, occurs when citizens of one racial group uniformly vote for one candidate and citizens of another racial group uniformly vote for another. While this sounds simple enough, it really is very difficult to measure.

For example, in calculating racial polarization, a government selects only those precincts that are 100 percent black or 100 percent white; that is, racially homogeneous precincts. But in reality almost no such precincts exist, and where they do, they probably do not represent either of the populations. For example, an exclusively white precinct is very likely to be a highly affluent suburban neighborhood which is unrepresentative of the white population of the local government as a whole.

Once you select these racially homogeneous precincts, you than look at the percentage of votes cast for each candidate, and if the same candidate receives a high percentage of votes in precincts of one racial group and a low percentage in precincts of another racial group, this in effect may be called racial polarization.

Of course, the basic purpose of the test is to determine whether race is the primary and exclusive determinant of individual voting decisions across time in any given community. Now, this measure has severe shortcomings.

First, what do you do, and this is particularly relevant to my State, when you have communities where there are several signfi-cant minority groups within the same population and one of those groups is geographically dispersed? In our case, in Texas, this typically is the Hispanic population.

Second, the racial polarization measure is almost impossible to apply meaningfully when you have several candidates running for the same office.

Third, nobody has ever said exactly what constitutes severe racial polarization. So we have, then, several questions that have never been answered about how to calculate racial polarization scores which, as we have already pointed out, is a very basic piece of data that local governments have been expected to supply to the Justice Department.

IS RACIAL BLOC VOTING THE DESIRED EFFECT?

Another even more basic issue is whether racial bloc voting is the desired effect. Is it the intent of the Voting Rights Act to produce electoral systems that reward racially segregated residential patterns? That, of course, is a question that the Congress must answer.

As the act has been applied thus far, the Justice Department has generally regarded as dilutive any system that produces a legislative body whose members do not reflect the general makeup of the population. In other words, proportional representation has been the basic test of effect, rather than the responsiveness of elected officials, regardless of their race or ethnicity.

If proportional representation is what Congress intends to be the ultimate test of effect, then it ought to be spelled out in the legislation and not left to the discretion of the Justice Department. But before you make that determination, I think it is important to point out again the difficulties that governments have had in this regard.

For example, what happens when proportional representation is the effects test? What happens is that many governments that have been under this act, in order to pass preclearance, have had to do one of three things, or even all three of them.

First, they have had to change their electoral system to single-member districts which, as I will show later in the testimony, severely handicaps Hispanics in the Southwest.

Second, they have been asked to increase the size of their legislative body. I know a number of governments have had to increase the size of their city councils.

Or, third, they have been asked to "pack" certain districts so that minorities can be elected in proportion to the population.

Now, these remedies, especially in areas where there are several minorities and one is more geographically dispersed than the other, are very simplistic and shortsighted.

WHAT HAPPENED IN HOUSTON

I think the best way to demonstrate what I am talking about is to give you a recent experience in Harris County, Tex. The county's population of 2.4 million is 20 percent black, 15 percent Hispanic, and the remainder white. During redistricting discussion, prominent blacks in the community were tremendously divided on whether a largely minority precinct, defined in terms of blacks, should be created or whether blacks would have more influence if their votes were divided among several precincts.

One faction of blacks, led by several State representatives, the three black Houston City Council members, a U.S. marshal and others, argued for spreading influence among three commissioners rather than having a single black "figurehead" commissioner.

State Representative Craig Washington, spokesperson for the group, pointed out that three votes are needed to accomplish anything substantive. As he said, "As long as we have 25 percent of the vote in any one district, we are going to be the balance of power. For that reason, it is better for the black community to have voting impact on three commissioners than to be lumped together in one precinct and elect a black to sit at the table and watch the papers fly up and down." Washington argued that packing all blacks in one district was "not in the best long-term interests of the community."

The other faction of the black community disagreed vehemently. It was led by James Phillips, president of the Harris County Council of Organizations, considered to be the most politically potent black group in Houston. Phillips argued that since blacks make up 20 percent of the county's population, at least one of the five commissioners should be black; i.e., the proportional representation argument.

At a meeting of the commissioners court, the two factions clashed. Phillips accused Representative Washington's group of having "engaged in the worst form of backroom politics to determine the future of blacks in Harris County government."

Washington responded by calling Phillips "a racist" and told the commissioners' court that Phillips "doesn't believe that you as white people have served black people."

Meanwhile, the deputy director of the Texas League of United Latin American Citizens, Johnny Mata, told the commissioners' court that "there was a 'feeling' among Mexican-Americans that they were being neglected." He went on record as opposing the formation of a black district.

The commissioner's court finally adopted the plan creating one black district, presumably to meet the Justice Department's test or predisposition toward proportional representation, even though Representative Washington's group urged the Justice Department to disapprove this plan as being out of compliance with the Voting Rights Act.

Now, this account, unfortunately, in my experiences of working with local governments, is not an isolated example. It is typical of the problems of implementing the act as currently written.

TYPICAL PROBLEMS IN IMPLEMENTATION

What it demonstrates is that: One, single-member district systems may be more effective in providing proportional representation to minorities, specifically black minorities, than they are in providing programmatic representation. As we know, programmatic or policy representation is dependent upon building majority voting coalitions among members of a legislative body, and the mere election of a single minority or several minority representatives does not always guarantee that member's effectiveness in achieving policy results.

Second, this example shows that often a specific minority community disagrees on what constitutes effective representation, whether it is race or ethnicity of the representative or whether it is voting behavior of the representative.

Third, it shows that single-member district systems with their predisposition toward proportional representation, benefit blacks but rarely benefit Hispanics, who are more geographically dispersed. To work for Mexican-Americans, the size of the legislative body has often been enlarged. Of couse, the question here is whether such a remedy should be made by the Federal Government.

Finally, this example shows that the remedy decided upon by the Justice Department is often a political decision based upon its predisposition to certain governmental structures or redistricting schemes.

Now, what does this mean for the extension of the Voting Rights Act and the effects test and bailout and all of those things? Well, what it means is that local governments will continue to have a difficult time showing that they meet the letter of the law. The bailout provisions as proposed by the House are written in such a way that the Justice Department will have a great deal of latitude in interpreting congressional intent.

For example, the Justice Department will decide whether a government has made a constructive effort to increase minority representation. But the key question that remains is, what is the ultimate measure of increased minority participation going to be?

Bailout provisions that can be realistically met by local governments with histories of compliance are very important for this Congress to establish because, without them, many local governments will continue to avoid making changes that could greatly benefit their minority populations, both in economic and programmatic terms.

Changes such as annexation or consolidation which would expand the tax base of the jurisdiction and bring about savings from economies of scale and service provision are not now viable alternatives for many governments in high growth areas of the country covered by the act. Many local governments do not even consider these because of the Justice Department's past use of proportional representation as the ultimate test of effect. They fear that any change in population, no matter how small, will prevent clearance by the Justice Department and result in major alterations and aberrations of their governmental structures.

But even if proportional representation remains the ultimate test, many local governments feel they would benefit from a redefinition of preclearance because, right now, under the current application, a government's legislative body has to enact a change and then submit it.

Many local officials feel it would be helpful if they could simply go ahead and submit proposed changes for approval prior to adoption.

These are just some of the difficulties that local governments have had in proving compliance with the act. Also, I urge you to more clearly lay out the evidentiary standards that are required of local governments to prove compliance.

QUESTIONS

Senator HATCH. Thank you. We are grateful that you stayed within the 10-minute rule also. It allows us a little bit of time for questions.

Could you elaborate upon your notion that the standard used by the Justice Department under section 5 places a premium upon racial isolation and racial segregation?

Ms. MACMANUS. Yes; in every one of the six governments that I have been involved with, which are listed here—Austin, Houston, Lubbock, Port Arthur, Abilene, and Texas City—this has always been one of the statistics that we have been asked to furnish, and I as a social scientist have tried to help local governments demonstrate this. As I pointed out in constructing racial polarization scores, the premium is put on identifying racially homogenous precincts and using that as the test. The bottom-line inference is that racial polarization, or having people in racially segregated precincts, is the optimal solution or the ideal, which I find very hard to accept as a citizen.

Senator HATCH. Basically, what you seem to be saying is that we are insuring what may in reality be comfortable racial political ghettos.

Ms. MACMANUS. Exactly. When you put such a premium on a test such as bloc voting scores and racial polarization scores, one can infer nothing else but that that is desired.

Senator HATCH. So those who are proposing this change in section 2 actually may be doing a lot of harm to minority voters in this country.

Ms. MACMANUS. I think you are absolutely correct. As a person who has worked with Texas governments, I think the one distressing thing about discussions that have gone on in the Congress about this act so far is the seeming unwillingess to include Hispanics, because they have totally different kinds of residential patterns. So far, in the applications of the act, they have been greatly diluted in their effects, because the major concentration has been on blacks and not Hispanics.

Senator HATCH. Well, there is a lot of complaint about that from an examination of the OFCCP or the EEOC, that any time you use a system of racial quotas—they may not call it that, but that is what they effectively become—one racial group becomes pitted against another. In the end, somebody has got to lose, and in this case it has been, according to some analysts, Hispanics.

Ms. MACMANUS. Let me make one other comment about that. It seems that the Justice Department has used as one of their common strategies to "produce a minority district" to lump blacks and Hispanics together. Those of us who have studied the voting patterns of both groups observe that many times Hispanics are much better served by being placed in a district with liberal whites than they are being placed in a district with blacks, because the two groups tend not to vote alike, at least in local government elections.

Senator HATCH. I think that is probably true. What does it mean when you say that, under section 5, a vote is diluted? If I may clarify this question: Can this happen to an individual or can it happen only to a racial group? In fact, what is an undiluted vote?

Ms. MACMANUS. That is very difficult to show, and that is the point I am trying to make. Local governments, which bear the brunt of having to prove compliance, and they may be very much in agreement in the spirit of the act, just cannot prove it the way the law is stated now.

Senator HATCH. That seems to be a continual theme in these hearings. The effects standard is a nebulous and undefined philosophical concept that has become even more obscured by the approach taken by the House of Representatives. Would you agree with that?

Ms. MACMANUS. I think that the way it is written now, it needs to be clarified. No government, the way it is written now, will be able to get out from under the act.

Senator HATCH. In your experience, have you found that covered jurisdictions are generally trying to comply with the law?

Ms. MACMANUS. Yes; I have.

Senator HATCH. How well can the officials of these jurisdictions fully understand that law? In fact, how does someone like yourself fully understand it?

Ms. MACMANUS. Well, as a social scientist, when a city or a government will call up and ask me for assistance, I generally will work for a government that I consider to be highly discriminatory and apparently so. I will not personally serve as a consultant.

Consequently, the cities that I have worked for I felt very confident about. The procedure I use is to go in and look at the voting patterns, talk with members of the community, look at the distribution of city services and funds, and so on, and the voting behavior of local officials on that legislative body giving out the money. In most of those cases, I have found, upon taking them on, that one of their high priorities was to serve the people of their community.

Senator HATCH. Can you elaborate upon the reasons for your uncertainties about what racial bloc voting really is? For instance, what is racially polarized voting? How do we identify it? What should its legal and constitutional significance be?

Ms. MACMANUS. Well, as I mentioned in my testimony, it is very difficult to decide or to determine, as a social scientist helping governments prepare statistics, exactly what is meant by racial voting and bloc voting and what is severe.

For example, sometimes in the cases that I have been involved with, I have tried to use a more stringent standard of, for instance, 90 percent or 10 percent; and other times, because I could not get any of the "racially homogeneous" precincts, I had to drop it down to a 70-30 kind of a standard.

But is it very difficult to come up with a consistent definition of what racial polarization is and how you measure it. Again, I say that the hardest part is calculating the scores for areas where you have both groups and you cannot identify homogeneous precincts, particularly for Hispanics.

Senator HATCH. In your opinion, are at-large electoral systems per se unfair or generally unfair to racial minorities? Do they automatically minimize minority representation?

Ms. MACMANUS. I think that you cannot say that any system uniformly produces equitable representation and that there are different situations.

In the case of Texas governments, I have found generally that because of the geographically disperse nature of Hispanics, the mixed systems tend to benefit them, and other scholars have also found that.

In other parts of the country, it may be that the at-large systems produce a different result. You cannot unilaterially say, in every case, that one particular electoral scheme is going to produce equitable representation for every minority group. Of course, the only thing that would really do that is something that people have talked about for years, a true proportional representation system, which I do not think will ever be a viable alternative in this country.

Senator HATCH. How can an ethnic community, say, such as the Hispanic community in San Antonio, which is a population majority, ever be discriminated against by an at-large system?

Ms. MACMANUS. Well, I do not thing that you can find that this will be the case, in fact. If you look at certain cities such as Atlanta that changed to a single-member district system at one time, when the blacks became the majority population, suddenly there was discussion of changing back to the at-large system.

It has always been a problem citing the proper balance in these kinds of things. The bottom line again is that electorial system do not operate uniformly in all jurisidictions.

Senator HATCH. What is a minority district, in your opinion? On what evidence does the Justice Department made a determination to categorize a district as a minority district?

Ms. MACMANUS. Again, I have not been able to get any clear standard. This is the frustration that governments go through. In one sense, you are asked to "pack" a district. I mean, in one particular case, a minority district is said to be 75 percent. Then, in another case, they turned around and said no, a minority district is 60 percent. There is no clear standard about what a minority district is, what the racial composition is to be.

Senator HATCH. Does this bill help us to define a standard for the determination of "minority district" status, or does it cloud the issue even further?

Ms. MACMANUS. I think it clouds the issue even more.

Senator HATCH. And, in the end, who suffers?

Ms. MACMANUS. In the end, it is the responsible local governments, which I found the majority are. They are the ones who have difficulty in making decisions that would really benefit their community as a whole.

Senator HATCH. In terms of effective political power, which approach is more beneficial for minorities, the proportional representation scheme which insures one minority candidate election, or the leveraging strategy which gives the minority a balance of power in, say, two districts or more?

Ms. MACMANUS. Well, being a public policy person, I tend to agree with the responsiveness measure. To me, what counts is what is delivered. As a citizen, I expect that my tax dollars result in services back, regardless of the color of the individual who is making the decision.

Senator HATCH. So you would recommend the leveraging strategy?

Ms. MACMANUS. Yes. I personnally advocate more of an emphasis on the responsiveness measure, the end product.

Senator HATCH. Let us take a black community. Wouldn't they be disserved by restricting themselves to a system where only blacks were permitted to represent blacks in America?

Ms. MACMANUS. I think that is a very dangerous thing that is happening. We have seen in the commentary surrounding the discussion of this act the inference that the only person that can represent you is a person of your own color. I mean, I certainly know a lot of whites who do not represent my personal viewpoints, and I am sure you do, too.

Senator HATCH. I know quite a few.

What about, in the case of black people, if they are segregated into special voting districts, would't they be even more isolated, even more estranged, and even less a part of their communities in this country; wouldn't they have even more difficulties as a result of this type of legislation?

Ms. MACMANUS. Exactly, particularly if they only make up in the range of the 20 percent, if they are only going to get one representative or so by packing a district.

Senator HATCH. I read the editorials by some of the newspapers here in the East, and they seem to say, that, this legislation is a wonderful idea; let's just pass it. It passed by a 300-and-some-odd vote in the House; why give any consideration to the section 2 problems? These journalists simply seem to ignore the problems posed by passage of section 2.

I have not seen much responsible reporting on what we have actually been holding these hearings about. There has been some, but there has not been a lot which focussed on the arguments of people, like yourself, who are concerned about civil rights and who are concerned about these issues. Few mention what you really are saying here in front of this committee.

Ms. MACMANUS. It is particularly true again. I keep going back to the same topic of where you have governments in the country such as those in the Southwest, where you have two minority groups side by side. The voting patterns are different; the residential patterns are different; and yet the discussion seems to be only related to the act as it applies to one or the other. But what happens when you have the act apply to both simultaneously in the same jurisdiction?

Senator HATCH. Well, it seems important to me, and I am not meaning to criticize anybody in the media, but I think that the thrust of this committee's hearings has been to suggest that if it were up to us, we would simply extend that act.

The most important point in this section 2 issue is that, oddly enough, even Members of the House who have voted for this bill are coming in saying yes, it really is a significant issue, even though they only had 1 day of hearings in the House on the section 2 matter. Would you agree that the section 2 issues are extremely important in this matter?

Ms. MACMANUS. Yes, and they are very complex. They are very important and very complex.

Senator HATCH. What bothers me is that so many people who are writing about this issue do not seem to address its complexities. Nor do they mention how the proposed bill could, to borrow a term, turn around to bite those whom we are really all trying to help. This bothers me.

On page 11 of your statement, you state that the decision of whether or not we should pursue the theory of proportional representation should be made by elected officials and not by lawyers in the Department of Justice. While I agree with you that this is too important an issue to be decided by bureaucrats, isn't it a fact that in many cases the decisions on preclearance are made by persons who have absolutely no legal training or legal expertise at all?

Ms. MACMANUS. I am not really familiar with that particular side of it.

Senator HATCH. All right.

Well, thank you so much. We have appreciated your coming in and sharing your testimony with us.

Ms. MACMANUS. Thank you for the opportunity.

PREPARED STATEMENT OF PROFESSOR SUSAN A. MACMANUS

Meeting Requirements of the Voting Rights Act: A Look at the Practical Difficulties Faced by Local Governments

The Voting Rights Act is one of the most important pieces of legislation ever passed by Congress. It has brought about a dramatic increase in the participation of blacks and Hispanics in the electoral system. Without question, it should be extended nationwide. But in the legislation extending the Act, Congress should be more explicit in what constitutes non-compliance with the Act. For those political subdivisions now covered by the Act, compliance is difficult to prove. Many governments, fully in compliance with the spirit of the law, cannot demonstrate compliance with the letter of the law. The provisions are not detailed enough, and governments which are genuinely supportive of the law, find it extremely frustrating.

I have been invited to give testimony because of my experiences as an academician and a consultant to numerous cities in Texas. As an academician, I have studied the impact of electoral systems on the participation and representation of various minority groups (blacks, Hispanics, women).[1] I have also studied the taxing, spending, and service delivery patterns of state and local governments, particularly their impact on minority citizens.[2] As a consultant, I have advised and assisted cities in preparing documents for the Justice Department and the courts to demonstrate compliance with the Voting Rights Act.[3]

In this testimony, I shall point out some shortcomings of the Justice Department's implementation of the Voting Rights Act. I will also comment on the impacts these shortcomings will have on the effects standard and the bail-out provisions of the House version of the extension if they are not clarified. My purpose is not to argue for or against those provisions but to urge Congress--should it adopt the provisions--to give them clearer definitions.

Data Collection Difficulties

One of the first problems local governments face in demonstrating compliance with the Act is in collecting population information. Specifically, local governments have difficulty determining voting age population by race and language minority. This data is important in calculating voter registration rates (percent of eligible voters registering). It is also used in meeting the preclearance requirement that changes involving redistricting, annexation, change of electoral system, etc. must be accompanied by documents showing minority distribution before and after the change.

Voting age population may seem easy enough to calculate, but it really is not. First, for smaller areas, block level statistics are not available from the Census Bureau. Second, the population data on Hispanics include illegal immigrants, which makes the data less accurate for districting purposes. Third, the data get old quickly, especially for rapidly growing areas such as the Sunbelt. The further removed in time from the Census, the more open to challenge the voting age population figures are. To obtain more recent population counts, local governments often hire demographic consultants to, in effect, conduct a census. But then the courts, or the Justice Department, may challenge these new population figures as not being "objective."

Difficulties in Proving That Electoral Changes Do Not Dilute the Minority Vote

The single most difficult task confronting local governments covered under the Act is proving that electoral-related changes do not dilute the minority vote. There are two reasons. One is that concepts such as "racial polarization" and "bloc voting" are not clearly defined. Another reason is the inconsistency in standards used to measure voting effectiveness. Is effectiveness measured in terms of a group's vote (bloc vote) or an individual's vote? Is effectiveness measured by an elected official's race or ethnicity, or by that official's responsiveness to the needs of an individual or group? The courts have leaned toward the responsiveness measure whereas the Justice Department has leaned toward the proportional representation measure. As we shall see, even minorities within the same community cannot always agree on how to measure effectiveness.

[3] Austin, Houston, Lubbock, Port Arthur, Abilene, Texas City.

What is Racial Polarization? One test to determine whether the minority vote has been or will be diluted is racial polarization. Racial polarization occurs when citizens of one racial group uniformly vote for one candidate and citizens of another racial group uniformly vote for another candidate. Although this sounds simple enough, problems arise in calculating this measure.

Technically, in calculating racial polarization, one selects only those precincts that are 100 percent black (in terms of registered voters) and 100-percent white--i.e., racially-homogeneous precincts. But, in reality, almost no such precincts exist. Where they do, they probably do not represent either the white or black population in the jurisdiction. (For example, an exclusively white precinct is likely to be a highly affluent, suburban neighborhood.) Once racially homogeneous precincts are selected, one looks at percentage of votes cast for each candidate in each precinct. If the same candidate receives a high percentage of votes in precincts of one racial group and a low percentage in precincts of another racial group, and this disparity persists in several electoral contests, one may conclude that racial polarization is occurring. The purpose of the test is to determine whether race is the primary and exclusive determinant of individual voting decisions across time in a given community.

This measure has severe shortcomings. First, it does not apply to areas where there are several significant minority groups within the population (e.g., the Sunbelt with its substantial black and Hispanic populations). Second, the measure is almost impossible to apply meaningfully where several candidates are running for the same office. Third, no one has agreed upon a definition of "severe polarization."

In summary, many critical questions remain unanswered about the calculation and use of the racial polarization measure:

(1) How does one measure racial polarization in multi-candidate races?

(2) How does one measure racial polarization if one cannot isolate minorities in racially homogeneous precincts? Specifically, how does one measure the voting patterns of Mexican-Americans scattered throughout the population?

(3) How does one measure racial polarization where the population has several significant minority groups and they don't vote the same way in a large number of electoral contests?

(4) What level of racial polarization is "highly significant"?

Is Racial Bloc Voting the Desired Effect? An even more basic issue is whether racial bloc voting is the desired effect. Is the intent of the Voting Rights Act to produce electoral systems that reward racially segregated residential patterns? That is a question that you, the Congress, must answer.

As the Act has been applied thus far, the Justice Department has generally regarded as dilutive any system that produces a legislative body whose members don't reflect the general make-up of the population. In other words, proportional representation has been the basic test of effect rather than the responsiveness of elected officials, regardless of their race or ethnicity. If proportional representation is what Congress intends to be the ultimate test of effect, then it ought to be spelled out in the legislation--not left to the discretion of the Justice Department. But before you make that determination, it is important to consider what the ramifications of proportional representation have been thus far.

What Happens When Proportional Representation is the Effects Test?

In implementing the Voting Rights Act, the Justice Department has generally regarded as non-dilutive electoral systems in which minorities are elected to public office in proportion to their numbers. Consequently, in order to pass preclearance for any type of electoral change (from precinct boundaries to annexation), many local governments have been required to: (a) change their electoral system to single member districts; (b) increase the size of their legislative body; or (c) "pack" certain districts so that minorities are elected in proportion to the population. These "remedies"--especially in areas where there are several minorities and one is more geographically dispersed than another--are too simplistic and shortsighted.

Perhaps the best way to demonstrate what I am talking about is to give you a recent example. It involved the redrawing of districts from which the four Harris County, Texas commissioners are elected. (Harris County has a population of 2.4 million, of which 20 percent is black, 15 percent Hispanic, and the remainder white.) During the redistricting discussions, prominent blacks in the community were greatly divided on whether a largely minority precinct (defined in terms of blacks) should be created or whether blacks would have more influence if their votes were divided among several precincts (a leveraging strategy).

One faction of blacks, led by several state representatives, the three black Houston City Council members, a U.S. Marshall and others, argued for spreading influence among three commissioners rather than having a single black "figurehead" commissioner. State Representative Craig Washington, spokesperson for the group, pointed out that three votes are needed to accomplish anything substantive. "As long as we have 25 percent of the vote in any one district we are going to be the balance of power. For that reason it is better for the black community to have voting impact on three commissioners than to be lumped together in one precinct and elect a black to sit at the table and watch the papers fly up and down," he said.[4] Washington argued that packing all the blacks in one district was "not in the best long-term interests of the community."[5]

The other faction of the black community disagreed vehemently. It was led by James Phillips, president of the Harris County Council of Organizations, which is recognized as the most politically potent black group in Houston. Phillips argued that since blacks make up 20 percent of the county's population, at least one of the five commissioners should be black (the proportional representation argument).

At a meeting of the Commissioners' Court, the two factions clashed. Phillips accused Representative Washington's group of having "engaged in the worst form of back-room politics to determine the future of blacks in Harris County government."[6] Washington responded by calling Phillips "a racist" and told the Commissioners' Court that Phillips "doesn't believe that you as white people have served black people."[7]

Meanwhile, the deputy director of the Texas League of United Latin American Citizens, Johnny Mata, told the Commissioners' Court that "there was a 'feeling' among Mexican-Americans that they were being neglected."[8] He went on record as opposing the formation of a black district.

The Court finally adopted the plan creating one black district (presumably to meet the Justice Department's predisposition toward proportional representation) but Representive Washington's group urged the Justice Department to disapprove the plan as being out of compliance with the Voting Rights Act.[9]

This account, unfortunately, is not an isolated example. And it is typical of the problems of implementing the Act as currently written. What it demonstrates is that:

(1) Single-member district systems are more effective in providing proportional representation to minorities than they are in providing programmatic representation. Programmatic representation is dependent upon the building of majority voting coalitions among members of a legislative body. The mere election of a minority representative does not always guarantee that member's effectiveness in achieving policy results.[10]

(2) Often a specific minority community disagrees on what constitutes effective representation (race or ethnicity of a representative or voting behavior of a representative).

(3) Single-member district systems (with their predisposition toward proportional representation) benefit blacks but rarely benefit Hispanics who are more often geographically dispersed.[11] To work for Mexican-Americans, the size of the legislative body generally has to be enlarged.[12] And the question then is whether such a remedy should be made by the federal government.

(4) The remedy decided upon by the Justice Department is often a political decision based upon its predisposition to certain governmental structures or redistricting schemes.

Proving Eligibility for Bail Out. Local governments will have difficulty proving they are eligible to bail out from under the preclearance requirements of the Act. The bail-out provisions, as proposed by the House, are written in such a way that the Justice Department will have a great deal of latitude in interpreting Congressional intent. For example, the Justice Department will decide whether a government has made a constructive effort to increase minority participation. But the key question, which Congress should answer, is what will be the ultimate measure of "increased minority participation"?

Bail-out provisions that can realistically be met by local governments with histories of compliance are very important to establish. Without them, many local governments will continue to avoid making changes that could greatly benefit their minority populations--economically and programmatically. Changes such as annexation or consolidation which would expand the tax base of the jurisdiction and bring about savings from economies of scale in service provision are not, now, viable alternatives in many high growth areas covered by the Act. Many local governments do not even consider these changes because of the Justice Department's past use of proportional representation as the ultimate test of effect. They fear any change in the population, no matter how small, will prevent clearance by the Justice Department and result in major alterations of their governmental structure.

But even if proportional representation remains the ultimate test, many local governments feel they would benefit from a redefinition of preclearance. Under the current definition, a government's legislative body has to enact the change and then submit it to the Justice Department for approval. Many local officials are of the opinion that it would be more logical, and helpful, to submit proposed changes to the Justice Department for approval prior to formal adoption. They feel that this would reduce the incidences and costs of litigation for them as well as for the federal government.

These are just some of the difficulties local governments have experienced in recent years in trying to demonstrate that their electoral systems do not dilute the votes of their minority citizens and that they are in compliance with the Voting Rights Act. These problems will intensify if the effects test and the bail-out provisions are not more clearly delineated by Congress. As the House version to extend the Act now reads, the difficulties of demonstrating compliance will be greater than ever.

A Plea for Clarification

In closing, I urge you to more clearly lay out the evidentiary standards required of local governments to prove compliance with the Act. Most critical is a clarification of what will trigger the effects standard when an existing electoral structure or procedure is challenged. Will it be proportional representation? Or will it be responsiveness as measured by the distribution of goods and services and the openness of the system to minority participation (measured by registration rates, voter turnout, access to legislative hearings, appointments to boards and commissions, etc.)? This is a decision for elected representatives of the people, not lawyers in the Justice Department.

Likewise, the language of the bail-out provisions should be tightened to make it easier for those with a history of compliance to get out from under coverage of the Act. As it now stands, the Act unfairly costs the taxpayers of these conscientious governments (and the nation's taxpayers as a whole) a great deal of time and money which could more equitably and efficiently be spent in bringing governments with traditions of discrimination into compliance.

Clearer standards would also nullify the argument that to extend the Act nationwide would dilute its enforcement. Voting discrimination is voting discrimination regardless of where it is found. Regional distinctions in the application of the Act parallel the old de facto/de jure distinctions once used to "justify" housing and educational discrimination among non-southern governments. These regional distinctions in the voting rights area are equally arbitrary, offensive, and inappropriate.

In sum, local governments have great difficulty demonstrating compliance with the Act. They need Congress to clarify its intent, rather than leaving interpretation to the Justice Department.

Senator HATCH. Our next witness will be Mr. Joaquin Avila of the Mexican-American Legal Defense Fund. He joins Ms. Vilma Martinez, who testified before this subcommittee last week as a representative of the same organization.

Mr. Avila, we are happy to have you with us here today.

STATEMENT OF JOAQUIN G. AVILA, ASSOCIATE COUNSEL, MEXICAN-AMERICAN LEGAL DEFENSE AND EDUCATIONAL FUND

Mr. AVILA. Thank you very much, Senator Hatch. My name is Joaquin Avila, and I am with the Mexican-American Legal Defense and Educational Fund.

I want to thank the subcommittee for giving our organization this additional opportunity to come forward and express our concerns about the extension of the reauthorization of the Voting Rights Act.

It was very interesting to hear the previous witness discuss some of the political realities and racial realities in the State of Texas. For a moment, I did not recognize that she was in fact describing the State of Texas.

What I would like to do, as part of my testimony, is to focus on two issues. One is to discuss the administrative track record with respect to enforcing section 5 and the Voting Rights Act and then, second, to focus on an issue which this subcommittee has found to be significantly important and which is considered to be significantly important, and that is the issue of section 2 of the Voting Rights Act.

With respect to the present administration's efforts to enforce the Voting Rights Act, we can only find one word to describe that, and that is "dismal." We as an organization, along with other private civil rights organizations, have had to take the lead not only to enforce administratively the Department of Justice section 5 preclearance provisions but also to take the lead, the affirmative lead, to challenge election structures that discriminate against Hispanics in Texas.

The Department of Justice has not joined a single lawsuit. The Department of Justice, under this present administration, has not even begun to investigate all of the redistrictings which have occurred after the 1980 census; did not initiate any litigation to require all of these political subdivisions to submit their redistricting plans in a timely fashion so that they could get the appropriate preclearance.

In addition to that, our organization, along with several other organizations, has had to take the lead to require political subdivisions to submit election changes for section 5 preclearance. This is a task that is exclusively relegated to the Department of Justice to enforce, and we have found that the Department of Justice is simply not doing its task.

Perhaps the most egregious thing that we have found in terms of the Department of Justice's insensitivity to the protection of Hispanics' civil rights and voting rights, very specifically, has been the recent reversal of position in the Lockhart v. U.S. case, where the city of Lockhart, in 1973, adopted a home-rule charter that adopted a numbered place system, staggered terms, which discriminated against Hispanic voting strength.

The Department of Justice issued a letter of objection objecting to those particular election changes. The city of Lockhart, pursuant to section 5 of the Voting Rights Act, filed a section 5 declaratory judgment action seeking preclearance. At the trial stage, the Department of Justice agreed with the positions that were being advanced by the minority intervenors represented by MALDEF. Basically, that position was that these proposed changes had a discriminatory effect. The Department of Justice agreed with that.

The city of Lockhart subsequently appealed. We opposed that appeal. Just about a couple of weeks ago, we found that the Department of Justice is in fact agreeing that the changes no longer have a discriminatory effect.

I submit to this committee that there has been no material change with respect to the plight of Hispanics in the city of Lockhart. We feel that this is the height of insensitivity from the Department of Justice with respect to the only lawsuit that the Department of Justice has participated in to protect Hispanic voting rights. They have changed their position.

The second part of this administrative track record deals with trying to get input into the administrative process before the Department of Justice. We have tried on many occasions to set up appointments to meet Mr. Bradford Reynolds to try to discuss important redistricting changes, changes that we felt needed our input.

Senator HATCH. He is not meeting with you?

Mr. AVILA. No, he is not.

There were changes that we wanted to make and input that we wanted to give with respect to Bexar County, with respect to some of the congressional redistrictings. We tried to set up appointments in January.

So what has happened is that, several years ago, our slogan, our catchword, was trying to get minorities access to the political process. Now, as a result of this present administration's insensitivity, we have changed that slogan to trying to get access to Mr. Reynolds' office.

Senator HATCH. You have not had any access to his office?

Mr. AVILA. We have not had an appointment. We have tried to set up appointments to discuss redistricting plans for Bexar County. We have tried to set up appointments to discuss redistricting for congressional districts. In fact, just last week, the Department of Justice issued a letter of objection concerning some congressional districts in south Texas. It did not cover the areas that we were specifically concerned with, and it is too late now for us to have input into that process.

Senator HATCH. It is not too late for us to do something about that, so let's see if we can help you in the future. Let me offer the help that my staff or I can give to you in these areas. I would like to hear from you. Of course, we are going to bring this up, but I would like to hear from you with regard to any future unresponsiveness with regards to their meeting with you on reasonably requested occasions. Please keep in touch with us on that point, will you?

Mr. AVILA. Thank you.

What I would like to shift my attention to now is the discussion concerning section 2 and to discuss the devastating blow that the City of Mobile case has had in our dilution cases. It is a setback. The decision clearly requires a discriminatory intent.

Now, I understand that the chairman and the administration have certain views about whether section 2 should be amended or not, but we are here to present our views on why the results test should be incorporated.

Basically, we are not trying to reverse the Supreme Court decision. The Mobile decision would still be in effect. It would be a constitutional standard. All we are requesting is that there be an additional supplemental statutory remedy available so that we can effectively try to dismantle many of the discriminatory election structures that we have very well documented in our testimony before the House and the testimony that we have presented before this subcommittee.

Let us make no bones about it. The Mobile decision does require discriminatory intent, and that discriminatory intent has been described by Justice Stevens as an investigation into the subjective motivation into the decisionmaking process. Not only that; Congressman Butler described the intent standard as a very rigorous standard, as requiring a "smoking gun," and in fact that "smoking gun" analogy becomes even more compelling when one realizes or examines that the Supreme Court adopted the evidentiary standards in the Personnel Administrators v. Fini case which specifically held that persons or minorities challenging discriminatory election structures would have to show that the decisionmakers adopted a particular change because of its adverse effects on minority voting strength, not in spite of it. So we have to examine the subjective motivations of the various decisionmakers.

The reason we support the results standard is that, first of all, a subjective intent for the intent standard as defined by Mobile would be very stringent. It has discouraged litigation already. It has prevented us from becoming involved in cases where we feel that there is a clear discriminatory impact.

When the previous witness discussed that, really, there were no concentrations of Hispanics across the State of Texas, I take issue with that position. I also take issue with the fact that it is very difficult to identify or define racially polarized voting. You talk to the minority communities in Texas. They know what racially polarized voting is. They know what it is when a person goes out to vote, a Hispanic goes out to vote and tries to get access into the city council, and yet the city council is not responsive to the particularized needs of the Mexican-American community and has not paved any streets or provided any kind of municipal services to certain areas.

They know what racially polarized voting is when the political opposition, such as in the city of Lockhart, takes our newspaper ads a couple of weeks before the elections and paints the minority candidates seeking election as being radicals in order to bring out the white Anglo vote.

They know that racially polarized voting is, so I suggest that if there is any doubt in the professor's mind as to where in fact racially polarized voting exists and whether in fact Hispanics are geographically dispersed throughout the State of Texas, I invite the professor to examine her census statistics.

Now, what are are asking for in terms of incorporating a section 2 results test? We are asking merely a return to the White v. Regester standards. A return to the White v. Regester standards will not result in proportional representation.

In our extensive litigation in the Southwest, we have not had occasion or a single instance where a Federal court there required proportional representation as a remedy. A return to the White v. Regester standard will not in fact result in proportional representation.

In fact, the focus of our litigation has always been in preserving or avoiding any fragmentation or any dilution of Hispanic minority voting strength. It has not been to guarantee the election of a particular minority candidate. In fact, in Texas, as I am sure the professor will certainly verify, you have legislative districts in south Texas that contain 60 to 70 to 80 percent Hispanic population, and at least three of those districts are represented by Anglo candidates.

So we are not talking about guaranteeing the election of a particular minority or Hispanic candidate. We are talking about avoiding any fragmentation of a cohesive minority voting community.

I understand that the subcommittee has some concerns about racially polarized voting and how that, by itself, coupled with disproportionate impact, would somehow trigger an immediate violation of section 2.

Well, if we return to the White v. Regester standards, we have to examine more than that. I cannot think of a single instance, and perhaps the professor might be able to enlighten me on this, but I cannot think of a single instance where a court has invalidated a redistricting or an at-large election scheme merely because there was a disproportionate impact and you had racially polarized voting.

No, the standard under White v. Regester was more complex than that. It dealt with a variety of issues, issues that are very specifically mentioned in the committee report. So we do not feel that a return to the White v. Regester standards will result in some of the problems that are being articulated by the witnesses and by the subcommittee.

Another point I would like to make with respect to section 2 is that it will certainly not open up the doors to an extensive amount of litigation. It we return to the White v. Regester standard, you will see that the previous track record in that particular legal standard with respect to the number of lawsuits that have been filed is really very low. In Texas alone, we are talking about maybe five or six lawsuits that were filed from 1973 to about 1980 dealing with dilution issues.

So, in summary, I think it is very important to point out that the Hispanic community suffers, and continues to suffer, from extensive voting discrimination in Texas and parts of the Southwest. Hispanic organizations such as MALDEF need a remedy. We cannot rely on the Department of Justice to enforce the Voting Rights Act. We cannot rely on the Civil Rights Division to go in and prevent political subdivisions from enforcing election changes that had not been precleared.

We need a remedy. We need something to eliminate this voting discrimination. It has been too long. We can wait no longer. We need to go forward. We want the Senate to pass S. 1992 without any amendments.

Thank you.

Senator HATCH. Thank you, Mr. Avila.

In the Mobile case, the Court's statement that section 2 represented a codification of the 15th amendment went uncontradicted, even by the dissent of Mr. Justice Marshall. Indeed, I believe that even the administration's brief in support of Justice Marshall's position stated that, section 2 represents Congress articulation of the 15th amendment. Now, would you agree with this?

Mr. AVILA. That it represents Congress articulation?

Senator HATCH. No, that it represents the 15th amendment.

Mr. AVILA. Whether it does or not is beside the point. The point is that Congress, through the necessary and proper clause to section 2 or through the enabling clause of the 14th and 15th amendments, can in fact pass legislation which would require something more than what the 15th amendment requires.

There are arguments both pro and con as to whether section 2, at that particular point, represented an exact codification of the standards of the 15th amendment as they are now being interpreted by the Mobile decision.

Senator HATCH. I do not know of any commentator or authority, however, who would state otherwise than that it represents a codification of the 15th amendment.

Mr. AVILA. Well, at that particular time, it tracked the language of the 15th amendment and, subsequent to that, the Supreme Court very seriously circumscribed the substantive scope of the 15th amendment. To say at this point that section 2 is only to be applied as far as the substantive scope of the 15th amendment now, as it is being interpreted by the Supreme Court, would be to impose an interpretation which did not exist at the time of enacting section 2.

Senator HATCH. You would agree, though, that it is at least based on section 2 of the 15th amendment?

Mr. AVILA. Yes, I would.

Senator HATCH. OK. Are you aware that there was considerable discussion preceding the addition of the language coverage provisions prior to the 1975 proceeding, as to whether or not Hispanics or Puerto Ricans were a race or a color pursuant to the 15th amendment. There was considerable opposition by many Hispanics to the "race" or "color" description. That is why the 14th amendment, not the 15th amendment, was established as the constitutional foundation of the bilingual coverage provisions. Are you familiar with that debate?

Mr. AVILA. Yes.

Senator HATCH. All right. What, then, is the relevance of the change from intent to results in section 2 for the Hispanic community. They have never been covered by the 15th amendment, according to the arguments that have already been made, from the standpoint of race or color.

Mr. AVILA. Well, section 2 was amended in 1975, based on the 14th amendment, to incorporate Hispanics and the language minorities, and what that basically means is that, at this particular point, we are seeking an expansion of rights that have been given to us by Congress.

Senator HATCH. But section 2 was never amended.

Mr. AVILA. I am sorry?

Senator HATCH. Section 2 was not amended at that time.

Mr. AVILA. In 1975? Yes, it was, sir. It was amended to incorporate the language minority communities in the Southwest.

Senator HATCH. Yes, but not to change the definition of race or color to apply to Hispanics.

Mr. AVILA. No, not with respect to the change from race to color, but section 2 was substantively amended to include Hispanic and other language minorities, and it was based on the 14th amendment.

Really, Senator, it does not matter to us whether you are going to base a results test—when you are talking about local minority communities in Texas trying to change an obviously discriminatory election, really, they do not have an understanding of whether it should be under the 15th amendment or the 14th amendment or what. They want a remedy. They need a remedy, a remedy that we are seeking that is clearly not unconstitutional; in fact, a remedy under section 2 that would proscribe the kinds of discriminatory actions and effects that we are seeking to correct.

Senator HATCH. That may be a minor difference to you, but it is a pretty important difference to a lot of other people.

Mr. AVILA. Under the enabling clause under the 14th amendment, you could clearly pass the statute to amend section 2 to incorporate a results test for Hispanics.

Senator HATCH. I do not want to disagree with you, but I must.

Mr. AVILA. All right.

Senator HATCH. I do not think it is quite that clear, and that is one of the real problems of this particular issue here. As I say, it is a difficult issue for everybody. I think sometimes we tend to try to make the issue appear simplistic, when it really is not.

Let me continue. You complain in your statement that Hispanic strength in Texas' 23d District has declined by 1.5 percent. Now, do you really think that that is an example of dilution? Let me give you an illustration. Is it really possible to insure that minority voting strength does not decline in any district? If the State had adopted your proposal, for instance, your proposed plan for a 61-percent Hispanic 23d District, wouldn't that have caused minority retrogression elsewhere?

Mr. AVILA. Not under the standards that have been defined by the Department of Justice. The reason I mentioned that in my written testimony is that the Department of Justice has certain standards which they have articulated over the past in terms of administering section 5. One of those standards is that minority districts, or districts that have a substantial minority population, will not result in a retrogression of minority or Hispanic voting strength.

What has happened in that particular 23d Congressional District is that there is a retrogression of 1.5 percent, and it is violating their own standard. Not only that; they have an additional standard, the standard under Wilkes v. U.S., a Federal district court case in Washington, D.C., a section 5 declaratory judgment case. That section 5 case specifically held that when you are comparing retrogression, when you are trying to determine the discriminatory impact of a previously enacted plan and a proposed plan, you cannot look at the old plan, if it is severely malapportioned, to determine whether there is retrogression or not. Rather, the requirement is that you examine fairly apportioned single-member district plans in order to measure retrogression.

The Department of Justice violated the Wilkes standard with respect to that 23d Congressional District as well as the retrogression standard. In addition to that, it did not allow us an opportunity to speak to Mr. Bradford Reynolds.

Senator HATCH. Where are those standards? Where is retrogression defined?

Mr. AVILA. Retrogression is defined by Beer v. U.S., a Supreme Court case that specifically held that you cannot have a retrogression of minority population or minority voting strength.

Senator HATCH. But you have argued that the Justice Department should apply the rules set up by the District Court in Wilkes County instead of the Supreme Court in Beer Wilkes requires comparison against a "fairly drawn redistricting plan." Doesn't the Beer decision just beg that question?

Mr. AVILA. No, it does not. The two cases are not in opposition.

Senator HATCH. What is a fairly drawn redistricting plan?

Mr. AVILA. A fairly drawn redistricting plan, at least as it was interpreted in the Wilkes case in Washington, D.C., a section 5 declaratory judgment action, specifically held that a fairly drawn redistricting plan shall be used to formulate an opinion concerning a retrogression analysis. You cannot use a severely malapportioned previous plan.

Beer v. U.S. did not address itself to a previously existing severely malapportioned redistricting plan. In fact, Wilkes County adopted the Beer standard in trying to formulate whether a retrogression in fact exists when you have a severely malapportioned redistricting plan. You cannot do that. You have to base it on a fairly drawn redistricting plan, and that forms the basis for determining whether, there is retrogression or not. These are not our standards. These are standards that have been formulated by the Department of Justice.

Senator HATCH. Of course, then, you still need to address the question: Which is a fairly drawn redistricting plan? You know, that is an important question.

Mr. AVILA. A fairly drawn redistricting plan means a plan that will not dilute the minority voting strength. What the Department of Justice has often used in the past, and again, you will find this in the record, is a percentage point of population figure of 65 percent in formulating districts from which to determine whether there is any retrogression or not. It is not our standard. We did not go up to the Department of Justice to suggest this standard.

Senator HATCH. But it does look as if you are making a circular set of reasoning that really goes right back to how do you define dilution. Is it 1.5-percent dilution? When you draft a redistricting plan that allows just a single-member district and you form a 61-percent minority population in that district and you take some of this number away from other districts, does that dilute the other districts? There are so many questions remaining here, that it is unbelievable.

Mr. AVILA. We are talking about different standards, Senator.

Senator HATCH. I see.

Mr. AVILA. Under one standard, we are talking about the constitutional standard of dilution. That is an entirely different standard. I cited, and my written testimony will bear this out, the 23d Congressional District as an instance of insensitivity by the present administration and their inconsistent applications of section 5 standards—not constitutional standards, section 5 standards—and these are standards that they have developed over the years in administering section 5.

So we are talking about apples and oranges. We are talking about, on the one hand, you cannot equate a retrogression, a slight retrogression, as constituting a constitutional violation. On the other hand, you can do so when there is an unlawful retrogression as defined by Beer and as defined by Wilkes.

Senator HATCH. You say the amended section 2 will supplement the protections of the 14th and 15th amendments. In the absence of the extraordinary circumstances found in South Carolina v. Katzenbach, where does Congress get the constitutional power to supplement these amendments, in your opinion?

Mr. AVILA. Well, the documentation for racial and Hispanic voting discrimination is there. Some of that documentation has been very extensively documented by U.S. Commission on Civil Rights reports that have been presented to Congress over the years and have been presented in the House hearings to document that voting discrimination is not just located in Texas or the Southwest. You find it in other places.

In fact, one of the cases that I cite in my written testimony deals with a legislative redistricting challenge to the Illinois redistricting plan which discriminated against Hispanics in Cook County. So the evidence is there. In terms of trying to tell whether there is sufficient evidence, there is. I mean, you look at all these U.S. Commission on Civil Rights reports, you look at all the testimony that was presented.

In addition to that, this is no different from 1970 when there was a nationwide ban on literacy tests. Congress did not know, for every little political subdivision, whether their literacy tests discriminated against Hispanics or against blacks. They did not have that evidence for every political subdivision across the United States.

Similarly, section 2 should warrant the same kind of consideration as was warranted for the abandonment of the literacy tests in 1970. We are asking that these consideration be similarly applied to section 2.

So, first of all, the evidence is there. Second, we are asking that the same treatment be accorded as was accorded to the literacy test ban, the national ban, in 1970.

Senator HATCH. My 10 minutes are up. We will turn to Senator Kennedy. Let's use this light so we all know where we are.

Senator KENNEDY. I want to welcome you here before the committee and thank you for your extremely cogent analysis of the legislation and also its practical application to voting patterns, particularly in Texas and on other areas of significant Hispanic population. It is a real service to this committee, and it is going to be enormously valuable as the Members of the Senate review these hearings and begin the debate on the issue.

I was interested in our assessment of the Department of Justice's position in reversing its position in the preclearance case of Lockhart, Tex. You referred to it in your testimony and also in the other publications which you have released today.

As I understand it, your position, and not only your position but that of those who have been following that particular case, is that you are saying that at the same time the Attorney General was getting the headlines for objecting to one Texas reapportionment plan, he was reversing the position that the Department had taken in this case in its objection and during the trial. Is that correct?

Mr. AVILA. Yes; that is correct, Sentor. The immediate effect of this reversal of position, the political effect and the reality of it, will be to send a message to Hispanic communities in Texas that a even if you get the Department of Justice to file a lawsuit to protect your rights, even if that happens, which has not happened, they may, on appeal, subsequently abandon you, and that is why the Hispanic organizations are no longer trustful of the Department of Justice in this area.

Senator KENNEDY. Has that happened before over your review of the history where the Justice Department has abandoned these cases after these preliminary findings have been held? I mean, what has been the pattern of the history?

Mr. AVILA. The pattern in the past has been one of maintaining a consistent position.

Senator KENNEDY. Has that been under Republican as well as Democratic regimes?

Mr. AVILA. That has been our experience, except with this present administration.

Senator KENNEDY. So that is quite a significant departure?

Mr. AVILA. It is a significant departure, not only——

Senator KENNEDY. These cases are complicated and you can, I am sure, spend a lot of time arguing sort of factual aspects of the particular cases, but what I am trying to do is at least gain an insight as to the value that we ought to place on the assurances given to this committee by the Attorney General and the Justice Department about its strong commitment on voting rights. I think we are entitled to look not only at their words but to their actions.

These observations and these reflections which you make here, as somebody who is spending the better part of his life on these kinds of cases and analyzing these cases, are extremely important, as is your assessment, in helping us to make some judgment about the value of the Justice Department's commitment on voting rights.

Now, what remedy do you have if the Attorney General, any Attorney General, this Attorney General, starts withdrawing objections entered by previous Attorneys General even where there has been no substantial change in the circumstances? Supposing this Attorney General starts withdrawing objections on a wholesale basis? Do we need more protection in section 5 so that you cannot reduce the discretion?

Mr. AVILA. What would happen is that, under the present law, we would have no recourse other than to challenge under the Constitution. As Mobile has interpreted the Constitution, we would have to show a subjective motivation, a subjective intent, in the decisionmaking process in order to invalidate many of these discriminatory election structures that were previously objected to.

To put it quite simply, it would be impossible to do that for all of the 84 letters of objection that have been issued in Texas.

Senator KENNEDY. So what conclusion should one of the leading attorneys, again, in the voting rights cases affecting significant numbers of American citizens who are Hispanic in tradition draw? How are you characterizing the performance of this Department on these issues involving the most basic and fundamental rights of all? I think you had used the words "insensitive" and dismal"? Am I reading those words correctly?

Mr. AVILA. Yes, sir, you are. Right now, as an organization representing Hispanic voting interests in the Southwest, we have difficulty even just getting physical access to the Civil Rights Division, much less trying to get access for minorities to the political process.

Senator KENNEDY. What do you mean by that?

Mr. AVILA. I mean that, as in my previous testimony, we have requested appointments to meet with Mr. Bradford Reynolds to voice our concerns concerning redistricting plans in very important parts of Texas as well as the present congressional redistricting plan that was objected to.

The Department of Justice did not object to the districts that we were primarily concerned with that in fact are in litigation at this moment. We are asking, at a minimum, if anything, that we can tell the minority communities in southwest Texas that we have access, access to Mr. Bradford Reynolds' office. I cannot do that.

Senator KENNEDY. What do you mean, you cannot? He will not see you?

Mr. AVILA. We have been unsuccessful in getting appointments with Mr. Bradford Reynolds.

Senator KENNEDY. And how long have you tried?

Mr. AVILA. We have tried since the end of December to get an appointment with Mr. Reynolds.

Senator KENNEDY. What does he say, anyway? What is his excuse?

Mr. AVILA. Well, we have not spoken to him directly. The word that we get from his staff is that he is too busy.

Senator KENNEDY. That is an intolerable situation. If you do not mind, I think there would be a number of us in the Senate, on this committee as well as some of our other colleagues, that will——

Senator HATCH. I have already offered, Senator Kennedy. So we will follow up on that, you and I together, perhaps.

Mr. AVILA. I would welcome that.

Senator HATCH. All right.

Senator KENNEDY. But I think it must send a signal. I think that they are talking about an administration that is supposedly caring about this, that comes in and talks about their strong commitment on voting rights, talks about the extension of it and commitment to it, and then we find, when we look beyond the rhetoric, both your assessment of its performance and the intolerable situation of refusing to listen to your arguments and your intercession.

Now, you have reviewed, or have you reviewed, in the earlier part of your testimony, what would be the effect on the Hispanic community if we were to change what has been the longstanding and historic pattern of the effects test in this legislation. It is a matter of some difference in the committee, but my own assessment is that there was really a dual test during the period when the great numbers of cases were being tried and the greatest progress was being made. And now there is an attempt to narrow that definition in ways which I think would have an extremely adverse effect on the real ability for citizens in this Nation to participate in the voting process of this Nation.

I am interested in your addressing that issue—it is going to be a major matter of debate—from the constituency you represent. Why is an effects test needed, and what is your own assessment of the past both legislative history and holdings?

Mr. AVILA. Basically, Senator, we have presented an extensive documentation of voting discrimination in Texas and the Southwest. The only remedy that we had available to us to challenge changes that are not covered under section 5 of the Voting Rights Act in covered jurisdictions and at-large redistricting plans in noncovered jurisdictions, was to challenge it under the White v. Regester standard, and that standard provided for an examination of the totality of the circumstances to determine whether in fact minorities were being effectively excluded from the political process.

Under that standard, there was expensive litigation. There was an extensive amount of preparation that was involved in those cases. In some of those cases, we were able to win and to dismantle discriminatory election structures.

As a result of the City of Mobile decision and as a result of trying to incorporate a subjective intent standard into voting rights litigation, our only message to the Hispanic community that we have in the Southwest is that we can no longer bring these lawsuits.

We have to tell that to our people; our constituents in Beeville, Tex., for instance. In Bee County and the city of Beeville, you have close to 50 percent Hispanic population. The reason you do not have significant minority representation in the city council of Beeville is because of racially polarized voting. In addition to that, when you have racially polarizing voting, you have a lower eligible voter population, lower registration rates for Hispanics, and there is discrimination in that instance, when the city council and the elected officials continue to ignore the needs of Hispanics.

So what do we tell people that come from Beeville saying, "Can you please represent us?" We have to tell them no, we cannot, because unless we get some very direct evidence of discriminatory intent, we cannot help you. And that is what the message is going to be if we do not have a proposed amendment to section 2.

Senator KENNEDY. Are you really saying that if they accept the effects test, you are going to say to every one of those communities, because there is not a certain percentage of minority on that council, that you are going to open up every election and at-large election in evey community through the Southwest and in some of the major urban areas?

Mr. AVILA. That just simply is not going to be the case.

Senator KENNEDY. Well, it is alleged by a lot of those who are opposing the Voting Rights Act. They are raising this as a strawman, quite frankly, and I have listened to it day in and day out in this committee. I have heard from the practicing attorneys that that will not be the case, but I want you to nail it one more time. It seems that it keeps popping up again.

Mr. AVILA. It is not the case. For example, under White v. Regester, we only had anywhere from 6 to 10 lawsuits that involved dilution issues prior to Mobile. A return to the White v. Regester totality-of-the-circumstances standard will not mean that every time you have a disproportionate impact and racially polarized voting it will invalidate the entire process.

You have to show, in addition to those factors, other factors where White v. Regester was found very significant, such as the history of voting discrimination, other features of the electoral system that operate to discriminate against Hispanics. In fact, White v. Regester did not delve into the subjective intent of the decisionmakers when they decided to adopt at-large election structures for their multimember districts. So Mobile represents a substantive and radical departure from preexisting law.

Senator HATCH. Your time has expired, Senator Kennedy.

Senator East?

Senator EAST. Thank you, Senator Hatch.

I will try to make this as brief as I can, just to probe a little bit on some of the theoretical points here that I find intriguing in this whole discussion of minority voting position in the American electoral process.

Sometimes I think it helps to back up a little bit and look at the theoretical foundations of the documents that are the basis for our discussion.

Now, concerning the 1965 Voting Rights Act, on which we are currently debating the possibility of its extension and new dimensions to it, what do you understand the 15th amendment to mean? The 15th amendment says, "The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude." The right to vote, access to the vote, the ballot box.

What it does not say is the right to hold office which, interestingly, is the idea that in the debate over the 15th amendment was rejected. Now, we are told in section 2 that Congress shall have the power to enforce this article by appropriation legislation. That is the basis of our power to do what the Cognress did in 1965 and for us to continue this process in what we are doing now.

I do not think there is any dispute about the 15th amendment regarding the right of individuals to vote irrespective of race, color, or previous condition of servitude; no question about that. We have the power to guarantee that.

But it looks to me—again, I just want to get your reaction to this brief analysis—like a mauling of the 15th amendment in terms of the theoretical premise it embraces, to begin to say now that it guarantees the right to hold office; that it guarantees effects, results. It seems to, as we proceed down this treacherous new theoretical path guarantee the rights of not only minorities, be they Mexican American or black or whatever, but perhaps different kinds of racial and ethnic groups, the right to hold office, the right to have a proportional base.

I think it is a tortured reading of the 15th amendment to suggest that it would only guarantee a "minority" proportion, because it says all citizens. I presume that would mean white, black, anyone, shall not be denied. If we so read the 15th amendment to make it basically applicable as an affirmative action program to certain racial or ethnic groups, I think that is a perversion of it. It does a great disservice to it. And it is not racist to arrive at this conclusion.

To get back to my point, is not the intent of the 15th amendment to guarantee the right of each and every American to have access to the polls, to register and to vote, and to see his vote cast and made to count? But you cannot leap from that very sound premise of the 15th amendment into the current water, constitutional water, troubled water, where you are guaranteeing results and the right to hold office.

I would just appreciate your response to that. What do you read the 15th amendment to be guaranteeing? If we mean it to do more than I have at least suggested that it means, ought we not to amend the Constitution whereby we guarantee effects; we guarantee right to hold office; we guarantee, where there is a certain proportion of a racial or ethnic minority in a particular area, that they have the right to hold office?

And that is an intriguing proposition because then, I think, it flies in the face of one of the most fundamental tenets of democratic political theory, the need to build consensus, to build consensus among racial and ethnic and religious groupings, the healing process, the harmony.

I was noting the other day to a witness here, and I have been reading more about it, that Mayor Bradley in California is beginning the quest for governorship, and it looks like he has an excellent chance, and I noted he is reaching out beyond, of course, what one would expect in terms of blacks or Mexican-American support and into the white community and, indeed, the white business community, what may be considered one of the most traditional strongholds of conservative strength, so to speak, and this shows his appreciation of the need to build coalitions in politics.

I think this proportional representation, this effects test, this guarantee, is going to fragment and polarize and eliminate harmony in American politics. All of it goes back to what I think again is a misreading of the 15th amendment, which is the right of each and every one of us to register and vote. But we certainly ought not to read it to guarantee the right of particular ethnic, religious, or racial groupings to hold office. What do you think of it?

Mr. AVILA. Well, I do not think our position has ever been to have a guaranteed minority seat in any elected body. Our organization interprets the 15th amendment—we used to, anyway, prior to Mobile—as not only touching upon physical access to the polls but also to incumbent situations where you have an election structure that dilutes or minimizes the impact of minority voting strength when the minimization or dilution of that vote is based on racially polarized voting and is based on a history of voting discrimination and discrimination within a political subdivision.

Now. what we are attempting to do with the amendment to section 2 is not to incorporate a proportional representation standard. It is merely designed to incorporate an effects standard, and that effects standard was what the law was prior to Mobile. White v. Regester did not incorporate a proportional representation standard. None of the cases that were involved in Texas or other jurisdictions with which I am familar even had incorporated within their remedy the notion of a proportional representation scheme. Rather, the focus was on avoiding the fragmentation of a cohesive minority voting community in the context of racially polarized voting.

So the amendment to section 2 would not raise the notion that we are seeking to guarantee minority seats. In fact, all of our litigation in the Southwest has never used that as a basic premise. The premise has always been to try to preserve or protect the integrity of a cohesive minority voting community in the context of racially polarized voting.

In fact, when you examine some of the legislative districts in Texas, in south Texas, where you have Hispanic populations approaching 60, 70, 80 percent in a given legislative district, you have three Anglo legislators there who are representating the needs of the Hispanic community. Otherwise, they would not get elected.

So we are not talking about guaranteeing the right of minorities to be elected; we are talking about minorities having an impact into the political process and to make sure that impact is not being diminished because of racist concerns.

For that reason, our interpretation of the 15th amendment does not incorporate a notion that there is a right to proportional representation. The 15th amendment, in our opinion, prior to the Mobile decision, applied not only to those denying the physical access to the political process but also avoiding unconstitutional dilution of the minority vote.

The Supreme Court in Mobile restricted that reading of the 15th amendment. However, under section 2 of the 15th amendment, clearly you can amend section 2 of the Voting Rights Act to include an effects standard which would merely reimpose, which is all it would do, the standards, the evidentiary standards that were in effect in Mobile.

We have it in White v. Regester. We have a track record that we can look at. There is a substantial body of precedent that courts can look at. Those courts did not talk about a right to proportional representation. They focused their attention on minority voting strength.

Senator EAST. A couple of thoughts in response to that. There have been some witnesses here on Friday, I believe it was, or Thursday, that I thought were convincing that, as a practical matter, with an effects test, unless one can come up with a really hard set of criteria, it is going to be proportional representation.

You, yourself, are saying it will guarantee, quote, an impact of minority voting strength, a very vague notion that, as a practical matter, would cloak, to me, a proportional representation.

Getting back to the 15th amendment, are we saying, conversely, that you will guarantee the impact of majority voting strength? Why not? You certainly could not read the 15th amendment to ensure only undiluted minority voting strength. I presume that if, in a given area, you had 60 percent white population and 40 percent minority, any change of any way, shape, or from in the election process that diluted the 60 to 58, 57, would be a violation. It would have to be because you are violating the 15th amendment, because you would be then discriminating on the basis of your own effects test.

To put it otherwise, if you move away from an intent test, the intent to discriminate based upon race and to deny the individual the right to vote, you have violated the 15th amendment. That is what I think we are saying. That is what I would say and what I think the drafters were saying. I think that is what the 1965 Voting Rights Act was supposedly saying.

Now we have, through the evolution of this over a period of some years, found ourselves in this room today talking about getting rid of intent, effects test, guaranteeing minority impact. I find it, in terms of my understanding of the 15th amendment, in any fair, equitable reading of it, an Alice-in-Wonderland world of constitutional law, spun out, not surprisingly, by lawyers involved in these cases who, like any good lawyer, be he defense or prosecution, always like to skew the law to make it easier for him to win, even though it might, frankly, cut constitutional corners.

I think we are cutting constitutional corners here. All of a sudden, intent is a bad thing. Most of the tort law and criminal law in the Anglo-American tradition is based upon intent—intent to do harm, intent to discriminate on the race, color, or previous condition of servitude. All of a sudden we are told intent is hard to prove. Intent is always hard to prove. Prosecution attorneys would love to hear it said, "In any situation of criminal law, intent is too hard to prove. Let's do away with it."

I will cease and desist. I greatly appreciate your coming, and I think you have given some very compelling and articulate testimony, but obviously I am deeply troubled over what I think is a very radical departure from a very sound premise of the 15th amendment, namely guaranteeing the right of each and every American to have access to the polls and to vote without respect to race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

But when we get into this troubled water of guaranteeing result and effect, we not only have to apply it to minorities; we have to apply it to majorities. We are into the whole world of proportional representation; maybe religious, ethnic, racial, I do not know. It flies in the face of the whole Madisonian concept of building concensus politics in America.

All of it is done in the name of improving racial harmony and ethnic harmony and religious harmony. I submit it will fragment it and put us, in certain urban scenes, at each other's throats because we will have districts, no more at-large elections, strictly districts based upon, yes, you guessed it, race, be it white or black or Mexican-American. What do you do? You run in those districts and, frankly, you demagog a little bit in those districts. Why? There is no obligation to go out to the whole electorate of that city or that constituency and appeal to a broad base and to pull together that concensus.

That is the whole Madisonian model of the United States Constitution, and I think it is the spirit of the 15th amendment. So I think we have a fundamental theoretical problem here, and I just wanted to back off a little bit and get your reflections on it if you think I am tracking along some erroneous constitutional lines. We have to get back to some first principles now and then in discussion of legislation, and that is what I would like to focus upon.

Senator HATCH. Senator, your time has expired.

Senator Kennedy, do you have any further questions?

Senator KENNEDY. If the Senator wants to finish that thought, I would be glad to have him do so.

Senator EAST. No, that is fine, thank you. Go right ahead.

Senator KENNEDY. Do you ever find a court in any of the cases that you have reviewed that has required quotas or proportional representation, in your research?

Mr. AVILA. No, I have not.

Senator KENNEDY. Even in using the standard prior to the Mobile case?

Mr. AVILA. No, I have not.

Senator KENNEDY. Do you know any of the other attorneys that you have worked with over a period of years that have ever been able to find that? As far as I am concerned, we are propping up a lot of straw men around, straw men and straw women, and knocking them all down.

We have seen that it may serve some useful purpose, but in terms of trying to find out what the position of your organization is and what your analysis of the case is, what is the case law and what have been the holdings by distinguished jurists who have been wrestling with these issues over periods of years and are intimately aware both of the 14th and 15th amendments and their significance, Judge Wisdom and others who are profound scholars in this area, it just does not stand up, and we just have not seen the patterns which allegedly would take place if we saw a return to the test prior to the Bolden case.

I am just trying to find out whether you are really advocating something different from what the standard was prior to the Bolden case. Are you?

Mr. AVILA. No, we are not.

Senator KENNEDY. You are not. And under that standard, prior to the Bolden case, we did not have these cases of required quotas or proportional representation, did we?

Mr. AVILA. No, we did not.

Senator KENNEDY. Quite to the contrary, as I understand the case which you have been referring to in your earlier testimony, which was the White v. Regester case, and in that case, by a unanimous court, I understand, it says, "To sustain such claims, it is not enough that a racial group allegedly discriminated against has not had legislative seats in proportion to its voting potential. The plaintiff's burden is to produce evidence to support findings that the political processes leading to nomination and elections were not equally open to participation by the group in question, that its members had less opportunity than did other residents in the district to participate in the political process and to elect legislators of their choice."

Now, the House of Representatives has very clearly stated that the White holding is the standard for the bill. Now, is there anything in the White holding that would require proportional representation, according to your understanding of it?

Mr. AVILA. My understanding of White v. Regester—and we were involved in that litigation—is that it does not require proportional representation either at the liability phase of the lawsuit or at the remedy phase of the lawsuit.

Senator KENNEDY. And is it your understanding that if the plaintiffs are just able to show that there is not proportional representation, that is sufficient to win?

Mr. AVILA. No, it is not, not even under the proposed amendment to section 2. It would not be. We would have to show a totality of the circumstances in order to prevail.

Senator KENNEDY. Well, that is my understanding both of the White holding, and it is my understanding of the principal supporters of the House bill, and it is the understanding of Senator Mathias and myself in terms of the prime supporters of this legislation.

No matter how those who try to misrepresent and distort both the language and the purpose, if they would agree that that is a fair and just result, we would welcome their intervention to help us to achieve that fair and just result; but all they do is, rather than state that that is both the willingness and purpose of those that support it, try to, I find, distort the position.

Last week Representative Hyde testified that it was unreasonable to require a State legislature's enactment to remain under section 5 until every county in the State was eligible to get out under bailout. Would you comment on this in terms of the relationship between the State government of Texas and the counties within Texas?

Mr. AVILA. Yes. Under the proposed bailout provision, the State of Texas would not be able to bail out unless all of its counties in fact met all of the bailout criteria. It is not an unfair requirement.

The State of Texas regulates the election process, the State of Texas has the authority to correct these abuses, and the State of Texas would have an additional incentive to make sure that all of its political subdivisions complied with the bailout provisions in order to effectively, itself, bail out from the Voting Rights Act.

So it is not an unnecessary or a very stringent requirement. It is something where you have the State responsible for the actions of its individual political subdivisions. The State has delegated a lot of this authority to the cities and counties, but it still has the primary authority for regulating the election process, and that is what we are talking about.

Senator KENNEDY. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator HATCH. Thank you, Senator Kennedy.

Mr. East, do you have any other questions.

Senator EAST. No.

Senator HATCH. Well, thank you, Mr. Avila. We appreciate your taking the time to be here, and we will certainly notify the Justice Department that we would like responsiveness shown you and your organization.

Senator KENNEDY. Could I just ask, could you give us a brief note on that, your understanding of the legislative history of the test, the effects tests, and file a memorandum?

Senator HATCH. Yes, I would like to have that, too.

Senator KENNEDY. Could you file an additional memorandum with your testimony?

Mr. AVILA. Yes.

Senator KENNEDY. I do not want to burden you, but I think it would be very helpful if you could file a memorandum on both your understanding and the understanding of your organization on the test of title 2 and how it changes with Bolden and what its implications would be for the Hispanic community, and perhaps some examples. I think that would be very helpful.

Mr. AVILA. Yes.

Senator HATCH. Thank you, Mr. Avila. We appreciate your testimony.

Mr. AVILA. I want to thank the committee for given me this opportunity, and there is still time, however, with respect to the redistricting of the Bexar County Commissioner precincts, to talk to Mr. Brad Reynolds, and we want to have that input into that process.

Senator HATCH. All right. We will see what we can do for you.

[The prepared statement of Joaquin G. Avila follows:]

PREPARED STATEMENT OF JOAQUIN G. AVILA

Mr. Chairman, Members of the Subcommittee, my name is Joaquin G. Avila. I am Associate Counsel for the San Antonio, Texas, office of the Mexican American Legal Defense and Educational Fund. In addition, I am the Director of Political Access Litigation for MALDEF. As related in previous testimony by our President and General Counsel, Vilma S. Martinez, MALDEF has been at the forefront of protecting the voting rights of Hispanics in the South and Midwest. MALDEF has been involved in extensive voting rights litigation since 1969. MALDEF has substantial experience in lawsuits challenging discriminatory at-large election schemes, gerrymandered redistricting plans, unconstitutional malapportioned districts, and actions to enforce the Section 5 preclearance provisions of the Voting Rights Act.[1]

In this testimony I would like to focus on issues which are in serious dispute before the Subcommittee as it deliberates the re-authorization of the Voting Rights Act. According to Senator Hatch's opening statement, he is committed to an intent standard in Section 2. As one who has been litigating voting dilution cases since 1974, I must take issue with the Chairman's position and reiterate that under the intent standard, Hispanic citizens are categorically denied meaningful access to the courts that they are promised under the Voting Rights Act.[2]

MALDEF supports the incorporation of a results evidentiary test for establishing a violation of Section 2 of the Voting Rights Act, as well as supporting the bailout provisions of S. 1992. In addition to presenting MALDEF's reasons for support of S.1992, this testimony will also discuss the track record of President Ronald Reagan's Administration in the area of protecting the voting rights of Hispanics in the South and Midwest. This track record will place in proper perspective why MALDEF supports the amended Section 2 in S.1992.

THE ADMINISTRATION'S RECORD

There is only one word which can describe this record: dismal. Under the Reagan Administration, there has not been a single case filed by the Civil Rights Division to enforce the Voting Rights Act or to eliminate discriminatory election structures affecting Hispanic voting strength. Instead civil rights organizations have had to take the lead. Even in these instances, the Civil Rights Division has not seen fit to intervene or even participate as amicus curiae.

The following is a description of cases which have been initiated on behalf of the Hispanic community where there was no involvement by the Department of Justice:

1. Rybicki v. State Bd. of Elections, Civ. Act. Nos. 81 C 6030,6052,6093 (E.D. Ill. 1981). This case involved a challenge to the Senate and House Districts for Illinois. The Hispanic community represented by MALDEF intervened. As a result of the intervention, the case was settled with respect to Cook County. This settlement created a 71 percent Hispanic District for Commission House District 20, a 63 percent Hispanic District for Commission House District No. 9, a 50 percent Hispanic District for Commission House District No. 10, as well as 56 percent Hispanic District for Commission Senate District No. 5.
2. Garcia v. Upham, Civ. Act. No. P-81-49-CA CE.D. Tex. 1981). This is a challenge filed by MALDEF against the 23rd Congressional District in Texas. This District could have contained a 62 percent Hispanic population. Instead, the Legislature excluded predominantly Hispanic areas and included Anglo areas, thereby limiting the Hispanic population concentration to only 53 percent. Presently this case is under advisement.
3. Rodriquez v. Clements, Civ. Act. No. 3-81-1946-R (N.D. Tex. 1982). This is a challenge filed by the Republican Party against the Texas Senate and House Districts. MALDEF intervened challenging House Districts in West Texas, El Paso County, Lubbock County, and Dallas County, as well as Senate Districts in Harris County, Bexar County, and South-central Texas. As a result of letters of objection issued by the United States Attorney General, new districts will have to be formulated. The Department of Justice was ordered by the Court to enter an appearance as amicus curiae.

4. Serna v. Keyes, Civ. Act. No. 6810089 (N.D. Tex. 1981). This challenge filed by minority organizations alleges that the redistricting plan for county commissioner precincts was adopted pursuant to a discriminatory intent.[3]

5. Garza v. Havel, Civ. Act. No. SA 81-CA-671 (W. D. Tex. 1981). Legal Aid filed this action against the Gonzales Independent School District because of the maintenance of an at-large election system. This system has resulted in no minority representation on the school board in a district which contains a 60 percent minority population.

6. Alonzo v. Jones, Civ. Act. No. C-81-227 (S.D. Tex. 1981). Legal Aid filed this action against the Corpus Christi City Council. The electoral scheme consists of four residency districts and three numbered places. All of these positions are elected pursuant to an at-large election scheme. According to the 1980 Census, there is a 46 percent Mexican American population; yet there is no Hispanic representation on the city council. Recent studies indicate that severe patterns of racially polarized voting exist in councilmanic elections.[4]

7. Rendon v. Bowman, Civ. Act. No. 5-81-157 (N.D. Tex 1981). This one person one vote lawsuit was filed

[3] In Texas, counties are governed by a County Commissioners Court. The Court consists of a County Judge elected at-large and four county commissioners each elected from a commissioner precinct. Art. 5, Section 18, Texas Constitution.

[4] Dr. Fred Cervantes, Political Science Department, Corpus Christi University. Dr. Cervantes' study evaluated the correlations between the percent of Spanish-surname persons within a voting precinct and the margin of votes in the precinct received by a given candidate. These correlations are a valid statistical method known as Pierson correlations and are expressed as a numerical R factor. High positive R factors indicate strong support in the Hispanic community while low or negative factors indicate little support in the Hispanic community and strong support in the Anglo community. A value of 1.0 indicates a perfect correlation. For the city council run-off in 1981, for Place 1, Luna received a +.950 R value, and the Anglo candidate recived a -.950 R value. For place 6, the Anglo candidate received a -.940 R value, while Cavazos received a +940 R value. In both instances, the Anglo candidate won.

by the Southwest Voter Registration Education Project because the malapportioned commissioner precincts worked to the disadvantage of the Hispanic community in Hockley County, Texas.

These cases clearly demonstrate that voting rights issues are of major concern to the Hispanic community. Yet the Civil Rights Division has not even filed a single suit in the Southwest or the Midwest to protect Hispanic voting rights.

In the area of enforcing Section 5 of the Act, the Civil Rights Division also has a dismal record. Private lawsuits had to be filed in Gaines County, Texas, Villalva v. Townsend, Civ. Act. No. CA-5-81-158 (N.D. Tex. 1982), and Lamb County, Texas, Posada v. Lamb County, Civ. Act. No. CA-5-82-7 (N.D. Tex. 1981) to enjoin the implementation of redistricting plans for commissioner precincts enacted in the early 1970's.

The Department of Justice under this Administration has issued only five letters of objection under Section 5 in Texas. The first was issued in June, 1981 and objected to the reduction of polling places in the Burleson County Hospital District. The second, issued on January 22, 1982, involved a redistricting plan for the Uvalde County Commissioner Precincts. The third and fourth letters invalidated two congressional districts in South Texas.

While the Department was doing its job in issuing these objections, it was failing to do its job when it approved other discriminatory election changes. For example, the Department of Justice did not object to the 23rd Congressional district. Currently, the 23rd Congressional district ranges from Webb County to Bexar County. This area encompasses South-central Texas, which contains a significant Hispanic population.

The 23rd Congressional District in Bexar County circumvents the predominantly Hispanic areas of San Antonio. The effect of this circumvention is to limit the impact of Hispanic voting strength. The District contains a 53 percent Hispanic population and a 40.1 percent Hispanic voter registration rate. Extensive evidence concerning the existence of racially polarized voting was provided to the Department of Justice. Moreover the figures provided by the State of Texas demonstrated that there was a 1.5 percent retrogression of Hispanic voting strength between the newly enacted 23rd Congressional District and the pre-existing district. Such a retrogression is in clear violation of Beer v. U.S., 425 U.S. 130 (1976) which held that a new election change should not diminish the impact of the minority voting strength contained in the previous election system.[5] In view of this clear violation of the retrogression principle, there is simply no justification for not objecting to this Congressional District, especially when other alternatives were presented to the Legislature which would have created a 61 percent Hispanic District thereby satisfying the retrogression principle.

The failures of the Department of Justice to object to the 23rd Congressional District also violated the standard established by the United States District Court for the District of Columbia in Wilkes County, Ga. v. U.S., 450 F. Supp. 1171 (D.C. 1978), aff'd, 439 U.S. 999. In Wilkes, the Court held that severely malapportioned redistricting plans could not be used as a basis for determining the retrogressive effect of a newly enacted redistricting plan. Instead, the new redistricting plan must be compared with options consisting of fairly drawn redistricting plans.[6] In the case of Texas, the pre-existing congressional districts were severely malapportioned. According to Wilkes, the basis for determining the retrogressive effect of the new plan would be a fairly drawn redistricting plan. Such a plan was presented to the Legislature. The plan provided for 61 percent Hispanic population for the 23rd Congressional District. Yet the Department of Justice ignored this standard in evaluating the discriminatory effect of the 23rd Congressional District.

[5] Beer v. U.S., 425 U.S. at 141 ("In other words, the purpose of Section 5 has always been to insure that no voting-procedure changes would be made that would lead to a retrogression in the position of racial minorities with respect to their effective exercise of the electoral franchise.").

[6] The Department of Justice has relied upon Wilkes in evaluating the discriminatory effect of redistricting plans. See Letter of Objection, Barbour County Commission, Alabama, July 21, 1981.

The Department's insensitivity to Hispanic and minority voting strength is not limited only to congressional districts. For example in the City of Edna, Jackson County, Texas, the Department of Justice approved a districting scheme which packed minorities into one district while reducing their impact in the other districts. Minorities in Edna constitute about 44 percent of the city's population. To minimize the impact of the minority voting community, the City Council created a 98.2 percent minority district. Over the strenuous objections of the Hispanic community, the Department of Justice approved the plan.[7]

The Department of Justice also approved the consolidation of voting precincts for the San Antonio River Authority and the Edwards Underground Water District for the January 17, 1981 elections. Evidence was presented to the Department of Justice that these consolidations would have a discriminatory impact on Hispanic voting strength. This evidence consisted of demonstrating a lower Hispanic voter turnout. Also, the Department was aware that public transporation was inconvenient for Hispanics in the consolidated voting precincts. Since there was no public transportation serving these Hispanic areas, elderly citizens would have to walk several miles in the middle of winter. Despite this evidence, the Department approved the consolidation over the objections of the Hispanic community.[8]

Presently, there are two redistricting plans which MALDEF has objected to in comments to the Department. In Bexar County, MALDEF is challenging the commissioner precinct plan because of the failure of the Commissioners' Court to create two districts which have a 65 percent Hispanic population. The proposed plan has only one district with a 65 percent Hispanic population. The second district only has a 59 percent Hispanic population and a 48 percent Hispanic voter registration rate. Since there are strong patterns of racially polarized voting in Bexar County, Hispanic voting strength is clearly diluted. If the Department of Justice follows the Wilkes standard, a letter of objection should be issued.

The other redistricting plan involves the Calhoun County, Texas, Commissioner Precincts. The County contains a 33.9 percent Hispanic population. Yet the Commissioners Court created a district consisting only of a 53.6 percent Hispanic population. The Hispanic voter registration rate in this district is well below 50 percent. Since racially polarized voting exists, the impact of the Hispanic voting strength will always be diluted. As with Bexar County, if the Department applies Wilkes, a letter of objection should issue. However, we are not optimistic since the Department did not apply the Wilkes standard in evaluating the 23rd Congressional District. Both of these redistricting plans have been opposed by members of the Hispanic community.[9]

With respect to eliminating discriminatory election structures the present Administration has not developed any track record in the South and Midwest. As noted in recent surveys, Hispanics continue to be underrepresented on Texas school boards and city councils. In 1980, Hispanics accounted for 6.7 percent or 496 of the 7428 Texas school board members and 5.7 percent or 278 of the 4902 council members.[10] Moreover, there are a substantial number of counties in Texas with significant Hispanic populations which have no Hispanic representation:

[9] See MALDEF comments dated January 27, 1982, and October 13, 1982. In addition with respect to Bexar County, MALDEF had to file suit to prevent the county from implementing an election change which had not received the necessary Section 5 preclearance. Ramirez v. Bustamente, Civ. Act. No. SA-81-CA-695 (W.D. Tex.). The Department of Justice is not participating in this lawsuit either.

County	Hispanic Population
Goliad	35.6 %
McMullen	34.5 %
Calhoun	34.0 %
Terry	34.9 %
Floyd	33.9 %
Parmer	32.7 %
Live Oak	32.0 %
Reagan	31.5 %
Gaines	30.6 %
Glasscock	28.8 %
Gonzales	28.8 %

This paucity of minority elected officials should have at least triggered an investigation concerning the causes of this complete lack of representation. The Administration has not investigated the matter.

Another area where the Administration has not adequately enforced the Section 5 preclearance provisions is in requiring covered jurisdictions to submit their election changes for approval. As previously noted, lawsuits had to be filed in Gaines and Lamb counties to require changes affecting Commissioner Precinct boundaries which had been enacted in the early 1970's. The Department of Justice relies on voluntary compliance and private enforcement to assure that all election changes are submitted for Section 5 review. Yet this process is inadequate. A simple change in the regulations could accomplish a greater degree of compliance with the Act.

For example the regulations could require the chief election officer to certify under oath that all applicable election changes have been submitted for approval. Failure to comply with this regulation would result in further action by the Department of Justice. In this manner, at least the problem jurisdictions could be identified. Once these covered jurisdictions are identified, private parties could also initiate action to secure compliance with the Section 5 preclearance provisions.

The Reagan Administration has also failed to correct the delays in the reporting of election changes in their periodic notice of submissions. For example, in their notice dated January 16, 1982, there were election changes reported for the first time which were submitted as early as December 22, 1981. Thus citizens are not aware of the submission of election changes until well into the 60 day time period. Such a shortening of the time period for commenting on a proposed election change does not afford the public an adequate opportunity to submit their views to the Department of Justice.

Perhaps the most egregious instance of the Administration's insensitivity to protecting Hispanic voting strength from any discriminatory election structures is the reversal of position in a Section 5 declaratory judgment action involving the City of Lockhart, Texas. Under Section 5, a covered jurisdiction may elect to file a declaratory judgment action seeking preclearance of election changes objected to by the Attorney General. 42 U.S.C Sec. 1973c.

Lockhart contains a 55 percent minority population. Despite this overwhelming percentage, minorities have historically been excluded from the City Council. No minority candidate had ever won election to the Board of Commissioners before 1973 and the only minority elected to the Council since a 1973 City Charter change owed his success to an unusual fragmentation of the vote for Anglo candidates. Since minorities could not elect candidates of any race who would serve their minority interests, the members of the City Council ignored the particularized needs of the minority community. Racially polarized voting patterns characterized city council elections.

The City of Lockhart in 1973 adopted a House Rule Charter providing for at-large elections with a numbered post provision and staggered terms for councilmanic candidates. The Attorney General on September 14, 1979, interposed an objection to the Charter provisions. Shortly thereafter the City of Lockhart filed its declaratory judgement action. During the trial court proceedings, the Department of Justice agreed with the minority intervenors that the proposed changes in the election system had a discriminatory effect. This position was consistent with the letter of objection issued on September 14, 1979.

The District Court held that the proposed election changes had a discriminatory effect on minority voting strength. The dissent concluded otherwise. On appeal to the United States Supreme Court, the Department of Justice supports the views expressed by the dissent. Such a reversal of position in view of the Department's evidentiary presentation during trial and the issuance of a letter of objection clearly demonstrates this Administration's inconsistency and insensitivity to protecting the voting rights of Hispanics.

In summary, this Administration's record in the voting rights area is discouraging at best. The Hispanic community cannot rely on the Department of Justice to enforce their rights under the Voting Rights Act. For this reason, the Hispanic community needs an amended Section 2 to correct the abuses which the present Administration to date has not seen fit to challenge.

SECTION 2

The proposed amendment to Section 2 in S.1992 would incorporate a discriminatory results test to establish a violation of the statute. Such an incorporation is necessary to effectuate the broad purpose of the Act to dismantle election devices which discriminate against minority voting strength. The requirement of proving a discriminatory intent as mandated by Mobile v. Bolden, 100 S. Ct. 1490(1980) would categorically prevent successful challenges to these discriminatory election devices.[11] As noted in previous testimony, there will simply be no smoking gun. Lodge v. Buxton, 639 F.2d 1358, 1663 n.8 (5th Cir. 1980). For these reasons a return to the discriminatory effects standards of pre-Mobile cases is necessary. This section of the written testimony will address the concerns raised by the Chairman in his opening remarks.

Contrary to the assertions made by the Chairman, the proposed amendment to Section 2 will not assure the incorporation of a racial quota. The amendment specifically states: "The fact that members of a minority group have not been elected in numbers equal the the group's proportion of the population shall not, in and of itself, constitute a violation of this section." Moreover the House Committee report also states that the amendment does not require proportional representation at the remedy phase of a re-districting lawsuit. House Report at 30. The absence of minorities on an elected board in proportion to their representation in the population is merely a starting point for determining whether a statutory violation exists. Such a factor is no different from the use of racial impact in the constitutional analysis required under Village of Arlington Heights v. Metropolitan Housing Authority, 97 S. Ct. 555 (1977).

According to Arlington Heights, racially discriminatory impact or the absence of racially proportional representation alone will not be sufficient to establish a discriminatory intent under the Fourteenth Amendment. 97 S. Ct. at 563. Discriminatory impact, however, is relevant. As noted by the Court, in some instances, ". . .a clear pattern, unexplainable on grounds other than race, emerges from the effect of the State action even when the governing legislation appears neutral on its face." 97 S. Ct. at 564, citing Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 6 S. Ct. 1004 (1886). Similarly in the statutory framework, the absence of racially proportional representation is merely a starting point to assist the decisionmaker in ascertaining the presence of a discriminatory effect. Thus there is no radical departure from existing constitutional standards.

The proposed amendment to Section 2 will not guarantee elective posts for minorities. As noted in the House Committee Report, this amendment relies upon the evidentiary standards of White v. Regester, 93 S. Ct. 2332 (1973). The only modification incorporated in the proposed amendment to Section 2 is the abandonment of the requirement of demonstrating non-responsiveness by elected officials in order to establish a violation of Section 2. House Report at p. 30.

None of the litigation undertaken under White ever adopted proportional racial representation as a requirement for remedying a constitutionally defective election structure. On the contrary, there is ample authority prior to Mobile rejecting such a standard. See Marshall v. Edwards, 582 F.2d 927, 936 n. 11 (5th Cir. 1978), cert. denied sub nom, East Carroll Parish Jury v. Marshall, 99 S. Ct. 2820 (1978) (As a goal "[p]roportional racial representation, though attractive, is an abuse of the district court's equitable discretion."); U.S. v. Bd. of Supervisors of Forrest County, 571 F.2d 951, 955 (5th Cir. 1978). Consequently a return to the evidentiary standards of White and its progeny will not mandate a remedy which is designed to guarantee the election of minorities.

A review of voting rights decisions prior to Mobile will reveal that the Courts focused on the impact of a given electoral scheme on minority voting strength, not on the electability of minority candidates. For example in Kirksey v. Bd. of Supervisors of Hind County, 554 F.2d 139, 152 (5th Circ. 1977) (en banc), cert. den. 434 U.S. 877, the Court held that a plan adopted by a Court should not divide a cohesive minority voting area in a community where racially polarized voting exists. In Marshall, supra, 582 F.2d at 938, n. 11, the Court noted that overconcentration of minorities is disfavored because ". . .it. . . reduces the influence of the group in the remainder of the. . .[district]." The proposed admendment to Section 2 would merely follow this precedent with respect to emphasizing the impact of a given electoral scheme on minority voting strength rather than focusing on the electability of a given minority candidate. The fear that a results test in Section 2 will "mandate" racial quotas is not supported by precedent in the law and only serves to distort the issue and deflect attention away from the voting problems Section 2 was enacted to address.

In his statement, Senator Hatch characterized evidentiary test of Mobile as not requiring a "smoking gun" or a confession of discrimination. According to the Chairman, both direct and indirect evidence can be utilized to establish a discriminatory intent. The Chairman's characterization ignores the difficulties of trying to establish a discriminatory motive. Circumstantial evidence is often the only relevant evidence available to ascertain a discriminatory intent. To establish a discriminatory intent from circumstantial evidence requires adherence to the traditional tort standard. This standard establishes an inference of intent by examining the natural and foreseeable consequences of adopting a given election structure. Yet the Court in Mobile rejected the exlusive use of the tort standard by citing to Personnel Administrator of Mass v. Feeney, 99 S. Ct. 2282 (1979):

> " 'Discriminatory purpose'...implies more than intent as volition or intent as awareness of consequences. ...It implies that the decision-maker...selected or reaffirmed a particular course of action at least, in part 'because of,' not merely 'in spite of,' its adverse affects upon an indentifiable group." 100 S. Ct. at 1502. n.17.

To establish that a decision to enact or maintain a given electoral structure was reached because of its adverse effects upon an identifiable group would require a "smoking gun." It is not sufficient under Mobile merely to demonstrate that a given decision was taken in spite of its adverse effects upon minority voting strength. Given this evidentiary restriction, establishing a discriminatory intent on the basis of indirect or circumstantial evidence would be virtually impossible.

Additional support for characterizing the Mobile decision as requiring a "smoking gun" is found in Justice Stevens concurring opinion:

> "Today, the plurality rejects the Zimmer analysis, holding that the primary, if not the sole focus of the inquiry must be on the intent of the political body responsible for making the districting decision. While I agree that the Zimmer analysis should be rejected, I do not believe that it is appropriate to focus on the subjective intent of the decisionmakers." 100 S.Ct. at 1512.

Thus Justice Stevens agreed that the plurality opinion placed too much emphasis on subjective intent.

This same understanding of Mobile is reflected in the dissenting views of Congressman M. Caldwell Butler in the House Committee Report:

> "The Supreme Court's decision in Mobile v. Bolden (1980) raised the issue of what is the appropriate standard by which to judge discrimination in voting rights litigation: the showing of purposeful intent or the showing of imbalanced or discriminatory effects. The intent test defined by the Court is a stringent standard which requires that a 'smoking gun' must be shown to successfully prove voting discrimination." House Report at 70.

Clearly these observations by Justice Stevens and Congressman Butler, as well as the rejection of the tort foreseeability standard, support the proposition that Mobile requires a high evidentiary standard of subjective intent. Thus the availability of indirect or circumstantial evidence to prove a discriminatory intent is inconsequential since the legal standard for measuring the materiality of this evidence was rejected by the Court in Mobile.

An additional concern raised by the Chairman involves the effect of the proposed amendment to Section 2 on the substantive scope of the Fifteenth and Fourteenth Amendments. The amendment to Section 2 will not redefine the rights available under the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments. As noted in the Committee Report, "Pursuant to its authority to enforce the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments Congress has the power to enact legislation which goes beyond the specific prohibitions of the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments themselves so long as the legislation is appropriate to fulfill the purposes of those constitutional provisions." Committee Report at 31. Thus Section 2 can prescribe an effects test even though the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendment protections may only reach purposeful discrimination. Section 2 will not rewrite these Amendments. On the contrary, Section 2 will supplement the protections afforded by the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments.

MALDEF supports the bail-out provisions contained in S. 1992. The proposed bail-out standards permit those covered jurisdictions to bail-out if they have complied with the Section 5 preclearance provisions and have eliminated voting procedures and methods of election which dilute equal access as well as having engaged in constructive efforts to provide an expanded opportunity for the eligible voter population to participate in the electoral process. The bail-out provision offers an incentive for a covered jurisdiction to improve minority voting opportunities and protect minority voting rights.

Similarly the ten year extension of the bilingual election provisions serves to provide Hispanics with physical access to the electoral process. A bilingual election process will not serve to create a Quebec in the Southwest. Rather these provisions will politically integrate the Hispanic community. [12]

CONCLUSION

In view of the extensive documentation prsented before the House hearings and the hearings before this Subcommittee, there is a well doqumented need to continue the federal role on protecting the voting rights of minorities. For these reasons, MALDEF urges the Subcommittee and the full Senate to support S. 1992.

U.S. Department of Justice

Civil Rights Division

Office of the Assistant Attorney General

Washington, D.C. 20530

February 3, 1982

Honorable Orrin G. Hatch
United States Senate
Washington, D.C. 20510

Dear Senator Hatch:

This is responsive to the telephonic request of Mr. Steve Markman of your staff inviting me to respond to allegations made by Joaquin Avila, Associate Counsel of MALDEF that I have refused to meet with that organization to discuss pending submissions under Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act. According to press accounts, Mr. Avila testified, generally, that the Administration "is insensitive to Hispanics" and, specifically, that I had declined to meet with him last week to discuss a pending decision. In my opinion he is wrong on both counts.

The Civil Rights Division reviews about 6,000 changes under Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act annually. Because of the 1980 Census, the past few months have brought the largest volume of redistrictings ever processed in the Division. Although our resources are literally stretched to the breaking point I believe the procedures which have been developed over the last several years, and which I have not changed at all, assure that this important responsibility is carried out fairly and with full opportunity for the views of all affected citizens and organizations to receive consideration. Interested groups such as MALDEF receive a weekly notice of every submission and frequently forward written and oral comments to the officials conducting our reviews. Upon request staff members routinely meet with such groups to discuss their concerns. Mr. Avila himself is a regular participant at such meetings. The analysis done by our Voting Section invariably includes a summary of such views, and in making my decision, I carefully review the analysis.

On occasion when my review indicates it would be helpful, I schedule meetings with one or more interested parties. Obviously, given the volume of submissions and my other responsibilities, it is impossible for me to meet with every organizational representative that wishes to make a special case. Instead, I have continued a system that guarantees a full opportunity to comment.

For example, in the last week, the very period in which Mr. Avila apparently felt slighted, I reviewed and entered objections to the legislative redistricting in the Texas House and Senate and the Congressional redistricting in that state. In each instance comments provided by MALDEF were among the considerations that led to the objection. Indeed, of all the organizations participating in our Section 5 review program, MALDEF is by far the most active. Mr. Avila and his associates are in regular, virtually daily contact with us.

Under these circumstances, if the press accounts are accurate, I am astonished that Mr. Avila would advise the Judiciary Committee that we have been unresponsive to his group's interests based on my unavoidable inability to meet with him on a particular pending matter.

With regard to the general charge that this Administration is insensitive to Hispanics, much of the foregoing discussion is also relevant and instructive. We carefully review each submitted voting change to determine if it has a proscribed discriminatory purpose or effect -- applying the legal standards enunciated by the courts regardless of the nature of the minority group involved. As for our general interest in MALDEF's views, in point of fact I have met with representatives of MALDEF on two separate occasions during our consideration of possible extension of the Voting Rights Act.

In view of Mr. Avila's concerns and because he represents a major civil rights organization, I will attempt to schedule a meeting with him at a mutually agreeable time. On that occasion I will outline the above principles and reassure him of our continuing interest in his organization's views.

Sincerely,

Wm. Bradford Reynolds
Assistant Attorney General
Civil Rights Division

Senator HATCH. Our next witness will be Mr. Steve Suitts, the executive director of the Southern Regional Council.

Mr. Suitts, we are happy to have you here, and we will look forward to taking your testimony at this time.

STATEMENT OF STEVE SUITTS, EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR, SOUTHERN REGIONAL COUNCIL

Mr. SUITTS. Thank you, Mr. Chairman and the subcommittee.

I want to submit my written statement for the record and will briefly review it.

Senator HATCH. We appreciate that, and your statement will be made a part of the record at the conclusion of your oral presentation.

Mr. SUITTS. Thank you, sir.

My name is Steve Suitts, and I am the executive director of the Southern Regional Council, the South's oldest biracial organization.

For more than 38 years, the council has worked toward equal opportunity for all people of the region, and one of our paramount concerns has been the right to vote. Since the 1940's, the council has gathered a great deal of research relating to voter participation and voter registration rates and has recorded incidents of violations of the law in this field. I want to share some of our observations and findings today.

I think it is remarkable, Mr. Chairman; that the South has lived with the Voting Rights Act for more than a decade and a half and it has, in fact, set in motion our region toward a more democratic government, free of racial discrimination in voting. While this progress has been bottomed on all elements of the act, it has depended largely on the administrative mechanics of section 5 and upon private litigation on section 2. These two provisions have accounted for most of the sustained gains that have been made in assuring equal suffrage for black southerners.

Without a U.S. Attorney General and a Justice Department that will enforce section 5 with vigor and without an exacting measurable standard of proof for section 2, we have perhaps the capacity of the law merely to state a principle, leaving only the sham of reality.

It would be, however, a mistaken notion to believe the vast improvements hve been made for black citizens in the right to vote throughout the South. Although registration data is only now being compiled because of the lateness of the census data from 1980, it is worth noting that barely half of the elibible population who are black in Georgia is registered to vote today, while more than two-thirds of all eligible whites are registered.

The racial disparity in registration rates is exceeded in 60 percent of the Georgia counties, and the largest gaps continue to be concentrated among those counties with substantial black populations. Sixteen years ago, the difference between the registration rates of black and white Georgians was 23.6 percent; today that rate remains at 15.2 percent difference.

While this act has been called the most effective piece of civil rights legislation, section 5, which is at its heart, is not self-executing. In fact, our research shows that the enforcement of section 5 has been at times haphazard and certainly not uniform, and that this condition has more often been to the disadvantage of the affected black citizens than to the disavantage of local governments.

Perhaps the most grievous, consistent and widespread failure of the Justice Department has been its inability to assure that every electoral change by local and State jurisdictions is in fact submitted for review. The council's research has found more than 750 State enactments in six Southern States affecting voting have been passed by State legislatures since 1965 which have not been submitted for review under section 5.

The unsubmitted enactments affect a wide variety of practices, and they affect procedures in nearly 200 countires, and they affect procedures in nearly 200 counties among the six Southern States and probably include as many as 100 State enactments applying to all counties of each applicable State

These findings probably indicate only part of the problem of noncompliance. In most Southern States, governmental structures and voting procedures are shaped both by official actions of local government and State government.

While the council's review of State acts examined only the level of compliance at the State level, we have been able to undertake at this time a limited review of some changes affecting county governments in North Carolina. In this research we found that, throughout the State, 150 State laws affecting voting which still have not been submitted for review by the Justice Department have been passed by the State legislature. A total of 17 changes were identified relating to county government in North Carolina in three areas: form of government, number of members, and the terms of office.

Now, among that limited number, we found that only two had been submitted to the Justice Department, and those two were enactments by the State legislature. The other 15 had not been submitted. All of the 12 changes which were incorporated by local governments had not been submitted. In other words, no electoral change identified in this limited study which was made by a local government in North Carolina has been submitted to the Justice Department for review.

I think the evidence of this admittedly limited research, which will continue in the future, suggests the failure of local governments to submit changes in the practices and procedures relating to voting may be as widespread, if not more so, than the patterns of noncompliance of State governments in the South.

On balance, it is clear that the Justice Department has failed to inspire or require strict compliance with the key provision of the Voting Rights Act.

Without vigorous enforcement of the administrative procedures, section 5 is not an effective part of the act. However, section 5 does have an exacting, measurable standard of proof. Section 2 of the act, however, presently under Supreme Court interpretation, has an intent standard, and we urge that that intent standard be amended, as the House bill does, so that Federal courts may be able to judge electoral changes which were enacted before 1965 in the South by a standard which can be measured and which is more exact.

While this change will alter the holding of the Supreme Court case's interpretation of the statute, the Mobile case generally is not the standard by which we believe Federal judges in the Deep South have, in the past, applied the law.

While we believe that the House bill presents some important provisions, we also suggest that this subcommittee consider other changes that would strengthen the act by assuring that key provisions of the act are enforced to the letter of the law and by bringing a greater sense of evenhandedness in the application of the law. I will submit, from our president, a more detailed listing of these proposed changes, but I want to make two for the record.

First, there is a need for civil penalties for local and State governments that fail to comply with the act. The council's research illustrates a pattern of repeated failures to submit voting changes in the Southern States. In North Carolina recently the State submitted a 1968 constitutional amendment, 13 years late, and only after litigants in private litigation asked the court to require that it be submitted. This requirement provided that the North Carolina Legislature had to draw State house and Senate district lines along county lines. It was held to dilute black citizens' right to vote in November 1981 for the U.S. Attorney General. In other words, for more then 13 years, because this enactment had not been submitted, we have seen the practice of an unlawful voting scheme in that State.

Civil penalties could be a useful deterrent in assuring that the law is complied with, and we believe that there is evidence to suggest that that kind of penalty is necessary in order to discourage serious damaging violations which will occur.

We are also asking that there be placed in the law a need for more evenhandedness. Under existing law, public jurisdictions have a right to seek judicial review of an objection under section 5. An affected black citizen who may be damaged by the failure of the Justice Department to object does not have that right.

We believe this is particularly important because the failure of the Justice Department to object can be viewed as merely a technical, clerical, or administrative error. In the case of Sumter County, Ala., recently, there is a dispute over whether the Justice Department in fact had objected within the required 60 days.

Now, apparently, the reason the Justice Department did not object, if it did not, within 60 days was simply a clerical error. The letter that should have been sent did not get sent. Is it a fair process that we have underway to permit that kind of mistake to be the final matter of judicial review for an affected black citizen who may be damaged by the change in the law in rural Alabama? We believe it is not.

Mr. Chairman, an effective Voting Rights Act with vigorous enforcement is the clearest, most realistic promise to black southerners that we will continue to have progress in and not the abridging of the right to vote.

Seventeen years ago, you and your colleagues in the Senate placed into law the mechanics by which to do this. You now have an opportunity to give strength to that act. I hope it is an opportunity, and I think black and white citizens in the South hope that it is an opportunity, that you will not relinquish until the Voting Rights Act helps put into the roots of the South the right to vote.

Senator HATCH. Thank you so much, Mr. Suitts.

You complain about several enactments passed by the North Carolina Legislature which were not submitted under section 5. Is there any decision of the Supreme Court which holds that the legislature of a State which is only partially covered must submit its enactments to the Justice Department?

Mr. SUITTS. I do not know that there is a case precisely on that point, although I do not know that there has been any serious argument that that is not a requirement. It is pretty obvious that all those items which we identified do affect the 40 counties. There is a holding in the Federal court in North Carolina that a statewide law which affects one of the 40 counties must be submitted.

Senator HATCH. What is the difference between the effects test in section 5 and the proposed results test in section 2 of the present law, and why is there different language?

Mr. SUITTS. I think the results test is less strenuous than the effects test in section 5. The council regrets that the House felt it necessary to place the results test under section 2 and avoided the effects test.

I would suggest to you, Senator, that the results test, as has been said, follows the force of White v. Regester. I think the effects test is a bit more stringent.

Senator HATCH. Well, in your opinion, what, specifically, is the results test in section 2 of the House bill and, frankly, what does it mean?

Mr. SUITTS. I think it does mean that where a voting practice has a result of discriminating against minorities in the South, that result is unlawful.

Now, I think that that will be shown by a series of factors shown in the White case, and I think that it is an interpretable standard. I think it is a measurable standard. I simply do not think it is as strong as the effects standard.

Senator HATCH. This still leaves us with my original question unanswered. What is the standard? Can any among you people who so adamantly support the standard, define it?

Let me elaborate. Every time I try to determine what the specific standard is which will be used to identify discrimination under the "results" test, I get the response that the court has to consider the "totality of the circumstances" or that it has to "weigh all the factors." I think that is nice, but I think it is also irrelevant.

I am heartened by the fact that the court must consider all of the evidence. This is, of course, no less true under the intent test. What I would like to know, however, is how the court evaluates this evidence. In other words, what is the judicial standard? What is the judicial inquiry under the intent test? As I view it, the court must evaluate all of the evidence before it can make a determination of whether or not the circumstances raise an inference of intent.

So what is the comparable question under the results test? My personal belief is that is is invariably a question of the existence of proportional represenatation, and I think there is a wide body of authority who would agree with that. Indeed, I do not even see the purpose of a court considering the totality of the circumstances under the results test, because it would not know what to do with all these bits of evidence with no real standard to define effect. In fact, the court would need to look at virtually nothing more than the lack of proportional representation and one other scintilla of evidence, as it was so aptly put last week.

In my opinion, this is the key. I do not want to know what evidence would be permissible. That is not what my question is. I want to know how that evidence is to be evaluated. What does the evidence have to suggest in order to demonstrate a violation. The totality of the evidence is going to be utlized to establish the intent test.

What, really, does the results test mean? I have not gotten a very definitive answer to that question from anybody, I hear all these comments by my colleagues and by those who testify that it is such a very simple standard, yet none seems able to define just what the standard is. What it sounds to me like is that if the result "looks like" discrimination, then it must be. As you and I both know, appearances are an insufficient ground on which to base a finding of discrimination. As a matter of fact, appearance are probably not indicative of discrimination in most cases. In other words, it appears to be obvious that this standard is just a very simplistic method for trying to get around the necessity of proving your case with reasonable, credible evidence.

I guess the question is, what is the purpose, not the scope, of the evidence?

Mr. SUITTS. It is to prove that the results of a practice or procedure are racially discriminatory and does not require a determination, as an intent standard would, as to whether it was in fact the primary, consistent motive that that be the result.

Senator HATCH. Under your definition, then, even if there was no intent nor any shred of evidence that there was an intent to discriminate, a whole community or political subdivision could be branded as a discriminatory political community, subdivision, or division.

Mr. SUITTS. I think, Senator, that if you and I were to go down to the "black belt" of Georgia, I think we could agree on what results——

Senator HATCH. I think we could, and I think, in each and every case, we could agree that there is an inference of intent in those cases. I do not think it is a monumentally difficult job to prove intent. I have done it in almost every case I have had to try as an attorney and I have tried a considerable number of cases.

In every criminal case, I had to prove intent beyond a reasonable double. In a number of the civil cases, I had to prove intent by a preponderance of the evidence. In very few cases did I have a confession so that I could directly show intent. I had to create the influence through circumstantial evidence or otherwise, in order to go to the jury.

What it comes down to is, what question does the Court ask itself? Tell me. You say this is such a wonderful thing and it is going to make civil rights law more just and it is going to solve all our problems. Rather, I see amended section 2 leading to the creation of the racism and the segregation that everybody in the civil rights community strives to eliminate.

But what question does the Court ask itself when employing the effects test or to determine the effects of a situation? Is the standard simply based on a belief that if a situation looks like discrimination it must be discrimination? Is that it?

Senator KENNEDY. Could I ask, Is the Chairman's time up? Are we operating on a 10-minute rule?

Senator HATCH. Let's see. We did not hit the light.

Senator KENNEDY. The light was on. I am just trying to, since I was interrupted in my questioning, I just want to find out what the rules are.

Senator HATCH. Well, why don't you answer that question. Mr. Suitts. I do not think I have gone 10 minutes, but answer that.

Senator KENNEDY. Could I ask just for the clarification so we know, in the course of these hearings, what rules we are going to proceed on?

Senator HATCH. We will proceed on the 10-minute rule.

Answer that question, and then we will turn to Senator Kennedy and give him 10 minutes.

Mr. SUITTS. I think a judge would be bound, under a results test, to look at whether or not the scheme of circumstances created by the jurisdiction creates a discriminatory scheme.

Senator HATCH. You are giving me the evidence again. You are not giving me a standard with which to evaluate the available evidence.

Mr. SUITTS. If the law said that at-large procedures were unlawful, and I do not think the law should say that, but if it did, then I think we could talk about what it is that is an intent standard and what it is that is a results standard.

What you have to do, because this law does not specifically identify a practice, a specific conduct which is unlawful, as would be my taking a gun out at this moment and aiming it at the colleague to your right—there what my intent was would be very important. What we are talking about here is whether or not there is going to be a finding of a violation of law and whether the results of that effect, whether the results of those practices are going to establish that there was a violation, or whether or not you also have to prove both that the results were discriminatory and that, also, there was an intent to make sure that had a disciminatory result.

Senator HATCH. Well, we will go to Senator Kennedy, but I just ask again, what are "discriminatory results." We need a standard in order to make that determination. That is why the Supreme Court has said it, I presume, in Mobile.

Mr. SUITTS. All I can say, Senator, is that the language of Utah west of the Mississippi is different from the language of Eutaw, Ala., east of the Mississippi. We are not communicating.

Senator HATCH. I agree. I certainly agree with that, and I will tell you one thing: You certainly have not given me one shred of evidence of the existence of a standard that would exemplify or justify the results test. We have a standard with the intent test, however, a standard which has been used in courts of law for centuries.

Mr. SUITTS. Well, I regret that I am not cogent enough in this.

Senator HATCH. Senator Kennedy?

Senator KENNEDY. What is the time now, just so we know?

Senator HATCH. You have 10 minutes. As soon as the light goes on, you will have 10 minutes.

Senator KENNEDY. Well, let me ask the staff how much time the chairman had.

Senator HATCH. Might I remind you Senator Kennedy, that you are not even a member of the subcommittee. We are showing you a great deal of deference and courtesy, which I would always extend, by providing you with the opportunity to sit on this committee for these hearings.

Senator KENNEDY. I just wanted to find out. Either I am going to be able to inquire, ask questions, and we are going to have procedures that we are going to follow, and they are going to be respected by the Chair and the other members of the committee, or we are not.

Senator HATCH. We have been trying to do that. When the green light goes on, you have 10 minutes; when the yellow light goes on, you have 1 minute; and when the red one goes on, I want you to stop.

Senator KENNEDY. And my question of the staff is how much time did the Chair have. I think I am entitled to that amount of time.

Senator HATCH. The Chair rules it had 10 minutes. Now, go ahead.

Senator KENNEDY. Well, I am asking the staff. Can I ask the staff?

Senator HATCH. No; if you were a member of the subcommittee, maybe you could. Go ahead and take your 10 minutes or I will move to Senator East. In fact, I will give you more than 10 minutes, Senator Kennedy.

Senator KENNEDY. All I want to do is just be treated as any other member.

Senator HATCH. You are being treated as any other member.

Senator KENNEDY. I have been a member of this committee for 20 years. I have seen the members of this committee who have agreed with my position and have differed with my position treated fairly and equitably, and either there are going to be rules which we are going to follow or there are not, and if there are not going to be, then I am glad to bring that up to the full committee——

Senator HATCH. That will be fine with me.

Senator KENNEDY [continuing]. And have the standards established on it. But I am not going to have one rule set for one member of the committee and another rule set for other members of the committee. That is not the way this committee has operated over the 20 years, and if that is going to be the desire by the majority on that, then I think we are going to find out about it.

Senator HATCH. Well, I believe I did take about 10 minutes. Let me clarify the rules. Apparently, a mistake was made. I do not handle these lights. I estimate that I took about 10 minutes. If I took a little bit more, then I apologize for that, but what we have tried to do is stay within the 10 minutes. I am trying to get today's hearing concluded in a reasonable amount of time.

I might mention, the Senator is not even a member of the subcommittee, yet the chairman has ruled that you can participate fully in these committee hearings. If your 10-minute time limit expires, I will be happy to move to Senator East and then come back to you as I did before, so you can have extra time. We are always going to show that kind of courtesy to you, but I do not think we need to go through a lengthy discourse over any and every procedural problem which may occur. I apologize for the fact that the light was not on, but I do not think I took much more than 10 minutes.

Senator EAST. I would like, since the issue has been raised, to defend publicly the chairman of this subcommittee, who has very graciously invited all members of the Judiciary Committee to be here and to participate.

I would like to remind our distinguished colleague from Massachusetts that, last Thursday, his staff member was allowed to ask questions extensively——

Senator HATCH. We showed deference there.

Senator EAST [continuing]. To a staff member, in other words, playing Senator for some length of time, which no one objected to, and I think that is fine. But if the implication is that Senator Hatch has not given an open, fair, equitable, balanced hand in these hearings, I must, as a guest here, because I, too, am not a member, strenuously object to that, because I think he has done to the contrary, and he has indicated that if, per chance, there is a slip between the cup and the lip, he is willing to go back and correct it. So I commend him. I think he has been very generous and openminded.

Senator KENNEDY. Just for the basis of the record, the chairman's staff member inquired and asked questions, which I welcomed last week.

Senator HATCH. We did ask one question.

Senator KENNEDY. And when the Senator was not here, I made a request to the committee that my staff be able to do so, and that was granted at that time.

Senator EAST. That is right.

Senator KENNEDY. So that was not any unusual procedure.

Senator HATCH. Well, Senator, I do not think anybody is complaining about that.

Could we go to questioning——

Senator KENNEDY. Sure, we can, but——

Senator HATCH. And let's quit worrying so much about procedure and worry a little bit more about the testimony being given. It is the most important consideration to be addressed.

Senator EAST. That is right.

Senator HATCH. If I made a mistake and went a minute over, which I do not think that I did, I apologize. We are going to show deference to Senator Kennedy, even though he is not a member of this committee. I think we have done it from the beginning of this subcommittee, and we are going to do it whether anybody likes if or not. I think I have always done that as a committee chairman, both on the Labor Committee and here.

Senator, to make any inconvenience caused by any procedural difficulties up to you, we will give you 11 minutes right now. How is that?

Senator KENNEDY. I am not asking for any gratuitous action by the chairman.

Senator HATCH. I am merely asking for some reciprocal courtesy; please go ahead, Senator.

Senator KENNEDY. I just happen to be a member of the Judiciary Committee, and I am entitled to rights, and I intend to see those rights complied with——

Senator HATCH. Let's give you 12 minutes, Senator.

Senator KENNEDY [continuing]. Whether it is chairman's desire or not. We are Members of the United States Senate, and I am not going to be pandered to.

Senator HATCH. Well, then, take 13 minutes, Senator. That will be fine with me. In fact, take all the time you want.

Senator KENNEDY. See how well we get along on this? [Laughter.]

Senator HATCH. Actually, we really do. [Laughter.]

Senator KENNEDY. Is that green light still rolling?

Senator HATCH. Put the green light back on.

Mr. SUITTS. For a while I thought this was the Alabama legislature. [Laughter.]

Senator HATCH. We are not that good.

Senator KENNEDY. Those who think that the bailout requirement we are adding to the law in this bill should be a lot looser argue that we are trying to punish jurisdictions for their past sins. What is the perspective of the Southern Regional Council, based on your extensive research about the present threat to the voting rights in many areas, if the protections of section 5 are removed?

Mr. SUITTS. Senator, I think the consequences of removing section 5 would be to halt what has begun since its original passage, and it would, I think, create not only problems with representation for black citizens, but also it would begin to dilute their votes and dilute the notion of democracy in our region.

I have no doubt that there would occur both changes specifically calculated to dilute black voting strength and the rights of black citizens to vote, and a callousness about whether those rights should occur.

I think we have seen in Alabama recently, as this law was pending for renewal and will expire by August 6 if not renewed, some unprecedented efforts to try to require all citizens to reregister under the most restrictive circumstances. I think that is an illustration of local legislation that we would begin to see more often, and we would begin to see often. The basic indicators of the right to vote, voter registration, and other indicators. would begin to show that democracy had been lost in the South. And I do not exaggerate in that forecast.

Senator KENNEDY. Do you think that the provisions in the bill are too stringent or that it is an impossible bailout? If so, what are your reasons?

Mr. SUITTS. Senator, the council is not particularly taken, as we say down South, with this particular bailout, not because it is too stringent but because we fear it is too loose.

Senator KENNEDY. Why do you think it is too loose?

Mr. SUITTS. Well, there has been mention by other witnesses that the affirmative requirements for bailout do provide an incentive but that they are subject to interpretation.

The history of the enforcement of section 5 shows, I think without question, that if there is to be interpretation, it will not be the local governments who suffer from that interpretation of those provisions by the Justice Department or others; it will be the affected black citizens.

Second, we are not particularly taken with the notion that particular counties can bail out, even though the States cannot. We see that that particular provision will allow a shell game to go on. State governments have a lot to do with the particular conditions of local government, and we could find situations where the State legislatures would begin to take actions which the counties could have taken, but they can be permitted not to take those assuming that their local legislators will take the actions in their stead.

We do not want to encourage that kind of duplicity, which is exactly what the Voting Rights Act, in its original form in 1965, put a halt to. So, if anything, we think that this is the bottom line.

Senator KENNEDY. We are referring now to the bailout provisions in the Mathias-Kennedy motions. Is it reasonable, in those bailout provisions, to require that places trying to bail out show some constructive efforts to open up the political process fully to minorities such as reasonably accessible registrations and efforts to stop intimidation?

Mr. SUITTS. I think those are, in general, reasonable, good incentives. I fear, Senator, that while we are willing to live with them, my fear is that that standard is not tough enough, that it will be subject to interpretation which makes those meaningless. We are willing to live with that if we must, but we would prefer a tougher bailout. But if this is one that the House has passed and that the Senate will adopt, we think it is the minimum.

Senator KENNEDY. There have been suggestions questioning the fairness and reasonableness to require that all of the counties of the State be eligible to bail out before the State may bail out. We have been told that this was unfair to state legislators. What is your reaction?

Mr. SUITTS. I think the fact is that the States do have responsibilities for local governments. As a matter of fact, States participate in every session, through their legislatures, in shaping local policies, in overturning decisions of local governments. That responsibility cannot be shirked and should not be shirked, and this subcommittee should not give an incentive to see that that happens.

States are responsible for local governments. They create them; they alter them. This act should recognize that basic fact.

Senator KENNEDY. I want to thank you for your presentation and responses to the questions.

Senator HATCH. Senator East?

Senator EAST. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. SUITTS, I appreciate your coming this morning and helping us on this critically important subject.

I think Senator Hatch has very ably put his finger on the thing that is most difficult for him and, I must say, for me. I am speaking for myself here now; he speaks too ably for himself for me to be an interloper. But this whole question of the effects test, the criteria, they just are not there.

I would submit that is really where we are. There really are not any other standards. You know, in the City of Rome case, there you had the effects test ensconced, and a third of the population was black. No one was contending discrimination, but they were simply contending that, in the at-large elections, blacks had not been elected; hence, ipso facto discrimination—in other words, proportional representation—compelled them to go to a district system.

As this law then has evolved, and you are an advocate on that side of it, and I think this is where your testimony has been very valuable, as I would see it, let us focus on this question as to whether there really are any hard-and-fast criteria. I submit there are not.

As consequence, it leads me to this next point I would like to make to you. You mentioned North Carolina, which obviously I must rise to comment upon, being a Senator from North Carolina, a junior Senator. First of all, North Carolina does have, and has historically had, I think, as progressive a record as any Southern State on this matter. I remember, not long ago, our Governor was up here, and Senator Kennedy and I on the Labor Committee and Governor Hunt were sharing some comments, and he congratulated the Governor on the great record of North Carolina.

But in North Carolina, you see, today, we cannot even hold elections for the House of Representatives and the State legislature. Why? Well, we feel we have been blindsided—mugged, really, in a way—by this very vague effects test. I mean, an innocuous thing is done, and then, all of a sudden, someone turns it around and says, "well, by some strange rationale, it diluted some sort of voting strength, and the effect is racial discrimination."

We are hog-tied down there. We cannot even hold primaries for the House of Respresentative races right now. The whole thing started when Durham County, where Duke Universtiy is located, was put in the Second District, and the Justice Department ruled, based upon the effects test, that it had not been shown that the reason for the change in the county was not to involve racial discrimination. This was a very perverse way of stating the proposition, putting it in the negative of an effects test.

You mentioned our constitutional provision about not splitting counties. Now, the purpose of that was to maintain the political integrity of counties, which seemed to be wholly independent of the question of race. Then someone spun out this theory that, well, you ought to split counties, and if you don't, then there is the potential there that you might discriminate on a racial basis.

My point is, and Senator Hatch is making it, all of this puts the State of North Carolina, or any other covered State, or partially covered—40 out of our 100 counties—under standards that are nonexistent. You are simply at the mercy of the elite bureaucracy here. Again, it has nothing to do with the 15th amendment. No one is contesting, really seriously, as I understand it—I have not seen it in any of the comment in North Carolina or here—that there is a problem of, in this case, black minority members of our State, registering and voting.

The 15th amendment is accorded with, and rightly so, and we are happy to participate in that. But again, we are into effects; we are into proportional representation, apparently; we are into again, the Rome case.

Not just because I represent an affected area but because these new changes would undoubutely extend this nationwide, I do not see how one can take this effects test, in view of, as I noted earlier, my understanding of the 15th amendment and what Congress must have intended in the 1965 Voting Rights Act, to ensconce the effects test in the law of Congress.

As Senator Hatch has indicated, as a practical matter, that is going to give us poportional representation, and as I indicated with the earlier witness and as Senator Hatch has suggested, too, I think it is going to fragment, going to create antagonism in American polities, again the district system, away from at-large, guaranteeing results, I presume with black as well as white, as I was noting with the earlier witness.

In order to bring a sense of some degree of coherence and integrity into the law, there has got to be a degree of objectivity and criteria to it. Otherwise, we are simply at the mercy of whatever intution the Justsice Department might have on Monday morning and Thurday morning.

To people schooled in the law and in Anglo-American law, that is troublesome. That is not law. That is just vague wishes. I think we will do a disservice to the cause of civil rights and voting in this country if we cannot put on our thinking caps and come up with some objective criteria by which we evaluate misconduct as regards the 15th amendment, like we do with every other kind of misconduct, tort or criminal. Standards? I do not see them.

Again, could you give us something we might at least begin with, something other than merely saying, well, there is not proportional representation; ipso facto, there must be discrimination; ipso facto there must be a 15th amendment problem.

Mr. SUITTS. Senator, I have some distant relatives in North Carolina, and I think highly of those folks and that State, but I think the cases in North Carolina under section 5 pertaining to the congressional and legislative districts are not unrepresentative of precisely what is at work here under thats particular element of the statute.

There was an argument, as I understand it by the State top reserve county lines, but in this recent congressional plan, at least one district did cross county lines, did split up counties. The fact is that with the shift of population in North Carolina since the 1880's drawing at-large systems, especially in metropolitan areas and in the seacoast area, did not prevent someone from going to the ballot box, but because of the practices of bloc voting in many of those communities, it did bar black citizens to be able to have that vote counted, just as if it were tantamount to someone saying, Yes, you may mark that ballot, but no, I will not put it in the ballot box.

I think that is a part of the vote. I think that was intended by framers of the 15th amendment. Senator, if there is a problem in defining what are standards, by any definition in this act, it is my view that, on the evidence that we get, the people who suffer are not the local governments in the contest of one side against another. That discretion has more often, if not prevailingly been used to deny relief to affected black citizens.

That is my view of where discretion is and any standards are going to require some interpretation that we have. It cannot work mechanically, nor should.

I think, Senator, that we are not encouraging future racial strife by this bill. I think what we are doing is looking for a democratic society in which all citizens feel that they have some empowered right to go to the ballot box and to cast a vote that is going to mean something to them. I think that is not going to mean that we are going to have more racial polarization; I think it will mean we have less.

In the city in which I now reside, Atlanta Ga., we now have two single-member districts which are more than 70-percent black who elect whites to represent them. They do so with a substantial majority of the registered voters who are black.

I think what we are trying to do is make sure to hold faith with all citizens that have the right to go to the ballot box and to have that vote counted. Once that is secured, once we have done that, once we have accomplished that, I think that we are going to have an equal opportunity, and I think we are going to begin to see that racial barriers, racial distinctions, will break down. That is my vision of what is going to happen.

Senator EAST. But the difference I have with you—I do not quarrel with your saying that it is within the letter and the spirit of the 15th amendment, the right to register to vote and have that vote cast and to have it counted. I would agree with you on that. But you are going further than that now with your effects test, not only to have it counted but to get this result, and therein lies the problem.

You are talking about not only registering to vote and having it counted but you are also saying, "And by the way, if we do not get this result, we small keep changing and manipulating and reorganizing and redoing until we get it if it means abolishing at-large elections and going to districts or whatever," and that is the nub of the problem.

That is where I draw the line, because I do not think it is consistant with the 15th amendment; I do not think it is consistent with sound democratic political theory of the right of individual to register, vote, and have it counted. To go beyond that into the effects test as ipso facto evidence of racial discrimination with no other criteria except some vague longing that justice, as I subjectively define it down in here intuitively, would have produced this result, I cannot agree.

I just do not think that satisfies people who are thinking in the usual norms of the rule of law. We need clearly defined, articulated, specific criteria so that we can act in knowledge upon what the law requires—it goes back to Aristotle's rule of law. No wonder North Carolina is in a total state of turmoil down there. Nobody has the slightest idea that the law is except for the latest reading from some fellows in the Justice Department, bless their hearts, who are probably trying to do their best, but how do they know? It depends on what they had for breakfast, it almost seems sometimes. One does not know, and, doggone it, the rule of law ought not to be killed, I do not care how honorable the intentions.

I think that is what Senator Hatch is insisting upon. That is what I am insisting upon, at least. Again, he is too articulate and eloquent; I do not have to speak for him. But we want specifics and concretes, and if those are there and they are satisfying and can be put in some sort of reasonable form, then we make progress. But right now all we have are vague yearnings for something called justice which is never clear because no one has any defined idea of what it is.

I think the framers of the 15th amendment would say, Gentleman, you have to think a little more clearly than that, and you have to articulate a bit more than that, within the great spirit of Anglo-American law and the legal tradition, it seems to me.

Mr. Chairman, I have run out of my time.

Senator HATCH. Thank you, Senator East.

Let me just ask one other question. Mr. Suitts, you indicated in your statement to Senator East, that the votes of some citizens in North Carolina were not counted, as I recall. I am not misstating that, am I?

Mr. SUITTS. No, sir, I do not believe you are misstating it.

Senator HATCH. What do you mean by that? Does the voting registrar count only those ballots put in the ballot box by whites? Maybe I could ask this: Are you aware of any instances in the areas that you have worked where individual citizens have been denied an oppportunity to register or to cast their vote in North Carolina? Isn't that what the act is aimed at eliminating?

Mr. SUITTS. Do you want to put a time limit on that? Within the last year?

Senator HATCH. I do not particularly care what time frame we assess, let's say the period of time since 1975.

Mr. SUITTS. I do not know that there has been a judicial determination, but there have been some allegations that there have been incidences in some counties. We have had no authority of govenment, authority vested in law, to determine yet those who are at fault.

Senator HATCH. Well, have you brought suits on behalf of those individuals effected where such instances have been evinced?

Mr. SUITTS. There have been complaints to the Department of Justice, I think.

Senator HATCH. I see.

Mr. SUITTS. And there have been contested elections about whether absentee votes should be counted or had been counted, those sorts of disputes.

Senator HATCH. But could you give us specific examples? You say there have been complaints made to the Department of Justice. Do you actually know of any specifically in North Carolina or, for that matter, anywhere else? I am concerned about this prospect.

Mr. SUITTS. I shall be glad to go to our files and pull that out?

Senator HATCH. You will provide that to the committee, then?

Mr. SUITTS. I will provide that to this subcommittee.

Senator HATCH. All right. I think that would be fair.

Thank you, Mr. Suitts. We appreciate your being here.

Mr. SUITTS. Thank you.

Senator HATCH. I might clarify that when I said that my purpose in trying to move this along was to get these hearings over with, that I did not mean to imply that we would get all of our hearings over with today. I simply want to proceed expeditiously with these hearings and I want to get these matters taken care of. I want, however, to have all witnesses have the opportunity of testifying and answering questions. In fact, I have been quite pleased with all witnesses on both sides of these various issues. I think they have been highly informed, articulate, and decent witnesses, and I certainly commend you for coming.

Mr. SUITTS. Thank you, sir.

Senator EAST. I would like to thank Mr. Suitts for coming, also, and for your very valuable testimony. Thank you.

Mr. SUITTS. Thank you.

Mr. Chairman, I would have thought that with your graciousness you have certainly got some southern family somewhere. [Laughter.]

Senator HATCH. That is very nice of you to say. I would be indeed honored if that were true. I am not sure that it is, however.

[The prepared statement of Steve Suitts follows:]

Prepared Statement of Steve Suitts

Mister Chairman:

My name is Steve Suitts and I am the executive director of the Southern Regional Council, the oldest biracial organization of the South. I am pleased to accept the invitation of this Subcommittee to speak about the pending issues surrounding the renewal of the Voting Rights Act.

For most of its 38 years, the Council has considered the right to vote a paramount concern and has carried out research and technical assistance to identify the barriers and problems of equal suffrage and to enforce the provisions of established law guaranteeing voting rights. Since the 1940's the Council has gathered and interpreted data relating to voter registration and participation and has recorded incidents of violations of the right of black citizens to vote and to have their vote counted. Today the Council continues its research and work in these areas, and I want to share with you some of our findings, observations, and conclusions that address the issues before you.

While an obvious fact, it is remarkable that Southerners have now lived for more than a decade and a half with the Voting Rights Act. It has not made the region a "conquered province," as even one of the most dedicated jurists once suggested in hyperbole, and instead has set the South in motion towards a more democratic government, free of racially discriminatory practices. While bottomed on all protections in the Act, this progress has depended heavily upon the administrative mechanisms of Section 5 and private litigation under Section 2 of the Act. These two provisions have accounted for most of the sustained gains that have been made in assuring that equal suffrage for black Southerners is not obstructed by subtle or indirect means. They depend upon the vigor, good faith, and resources of the Justice Department to enforce the law and upon the legal standards of proof by which barriers are challenged in the courts.

Without a United States Attorney General and a Justice Department that will enforce Section 5 scrupulously and vigorously and without an exacting, measurable standard of proof for private litigants in voting cases, the law's capacity to restore and preserve democracy in the South can be reduced to little more than a statement of principle with only the sham of reality.

It would be a mistaken notion to believe that even traditional indicators of voting problems show vast improvements. Although data for all Southern states are not available at the moment, a recent analysis of the registration rates in Georgia tell us that by the most basic indicator of barriers to voter participation substantial differences persist in the full access to the ballot for blacks and whites. Barely half of the eligible black population in Georgia is registered to vote today, although more than two-thirds of all eligible whites are registered.

The racial disparity in registration rates is greater in 60 percent of Georgia's counties than in the state as a whole, and the largest gaps are concentrated among those counties with substantial black populations. Sixteen years ago the difference between the registration rates of black and white Georgians was 23.6 percentage points. Today the black rate remains 15.2 percentage below the white rate.

While the Voting Rights Act itself has been called the most effective civil rights legislation in this country, the enforcement of Section 5 is not self-executing and has been difficult and some times haphazardous. Perhaps the most consistent, grievous, and widespread failure on the part of the Justice Department has been its inability to assure that every electoral change by local and state jurisdictions is submitted for review. The Council's research indicates that since 1965 in six Southern states as many as 750 state enactments affecting voting have been passed by state legislatures and have not been submitted for review under Section 5.[1]

1 These states are: Alabama, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, and South Carolina. The Council's research was carried out by reviewing all state enactments and identifying those which affect voting. Those enactments were checked against the listing of submissions provided by the Department of Justice. The Council is preparing a special report on its research and will file the report with this subcommittee at a later time.

These laws apparently affect a wide variety of practices, including changes in the forms of government, new terms of office, annexations, relocation of polling places, and changes in the methods of election. The unsubmitted enactments affect voting procedures in nearly 200 different counties among the six states and probably include as many as 100 enactments that apply to all counties in each of the applicable states.

These findings indicate only part of the problem of non-compliance. In most Southern states governmental structures and voting procedures are shaped both by official actions of local governments and by state acts. In Alabama, for example, the state legislature has exclusive power to decide the form of local governments and the terms and conditions of government service, although as a practice the legislative delegation from the local jurisdiction has the opportunity to decide for itself the fate of local legislation. In many Alabama cities and counties, however, the local government can move the polling place or change some voting policies or procedures. At the same time, the state legislature can pass laws changing these decisions of local governments at any time.

While the Council's review of state acts examined only one level of compliance with the Voting Rights Act in states which share responsibility at the state and local level for legislating local electoral changes,[2] it has undertaken a review of a few kinds of changes affecting county governments in North Carolina. The data suggest that there are widespread problems with non-compliance at the local level.

The Council's research in North Carolina shows that more than a hundred and fifty state laws affecting voting in one or all of the forty counties covered under the Act were passed from 1965 to 1979 and never submitted for review by the Justice Department. During the same period, a total of 17 changes were made by local county governments covered under the Act in the methods of election, the numbers of members on the governing boards, or the terms of office of those members. Only 5 of those 17 changes were made by the state legislature in North Carolina. The remaining 12 were apparently made with authority granted by the legislature to the local governing boards.

Among these 17 changes affecting the county governing boards, it appears that only 2 were submitted to the U.S. Justice Department for review under Section 5. Both of those submissions were state enactments -- not changes by local governments. Of the remaining 15 changes which have not been submitted, three are state enactments and 12 are changes made by local governments. Hence, no electoral change identified in the Council's study and made by a local government in North Carolina has been submitted to the Justice Department for review.[3]

The evidence of this limited research suggests that the failure of local governments to submit changes in practices and policies that it adopts on the local level affecting voting may be as prevalent, if not more widespread, than the pattern of non-compliance of state governments in the South. On balance, it is clear that the Justice Department has failed to inspire and require strict compliance with the key provision of the Voting Rights Act. Today across the South there are scores of practices and policies affecting voting that have been implemented for months and years and which have never been subjected to the scrutiny of Section 5 as required by law.

While vigorous enforcement of the administrative procedures hasn't been accomplished yet, Section 5 does require an exacting, measurable standard of proof for submitting authorities to meet. This requirement that jurisdictions meet the test of proving the absence of "intent" or "effects" of racial discrimination should be continued. In Section 2 of the Act, the "intent" standard should not be required to prove the presence of racial discrimination in voting. The federal courts must be able to judge electoral changes which were enacted before 1965 in the South by a measurable exacting standard.

3 This analysis of electoral changes involved identifying voting changes that had been passed by the state legislature and checking those changes with reports provided by the North Carolina Institute of Government about changes affecting the methods of election, the numbers of members, and the terms of offices of county governments. Those findings were then compared with the list of changes submitted to the U.S. Justice Department. A report on voting in North Carolina is being prepared by the Council and will be submitted for the record to this subcommittee at a later time.

The bill passed by the U.S. House of Representatives establishes a "results" standard for litigation under Section 2. The adoption of this standard would not require a showing of "intent" and would restore an effective tool by which to reach racially discriminatory electoral changes that are now outside the limits of Section 5. While this change will alter the holding of the Supreme Court in the Mobile case,[4] it is generally a standard by which federal judges in the Deep South have in the past applied the law.

For instance, Judge John Minor Wisdom of the federal Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals wrote in a concurring opinion in Nevett v. Sides in 1978 that "intent is not required to make out a case under . . . Section 1973" (Section 2 of the Voting Rights Act). Referring to the views of the Fifth Circuit, Wisdom wrote that an earlier "en banc decision of the Court was based on the conclusion that effect alone was sufficient to prove a violation of these statutes."[5]

This assessment of the status of the law before Mobile was echoed by Fifth Circuit Judge Goldberg when after Mobile in March of 1981 he concurred in Jones v. City of Lubbock. Writing that the case must be remanded for reconsideration by the lower court in light of the Mobile opinion he said:

> Since the Supreme Court has completely changed the mode of assessing the legality of electoral schemes alleged to discriminate against a class of citizens, we must remand this case to the district court to reexamine the evidence, > and its findings, in whatever light is radiated by Bolden. In addition, due process and precedent mandate that when the rules of the game are changed, the players must be afforded a full and fair opportunity to play by the new regulations.[6]

While the change now placed in the House Bill is important to restoring vigorous enforcement of voting rights in the South, the subcommittee also should consider other changes which would strengthen the Act by assuring that its present, key provisions are enforced to the letter of the law and by bringing a greater sense of evenhandedness in the application of the law.

While the president of the Southern Regional Council, Alabama State Representative Antonio Harrison, will write in more detail to the Subcommittee at a later time about all our suggestions for improving the effectiveness of the Act, I want to suggest two areas: 1) the need for civil penalties for local and state governments that fail to comply with the Act and 2) the need to permit affected citizens the same right of judicial review as is available to covered jurisdictions which disagree with a ruling of the Justice Department under Section 5.

Although criminal penalties are available for violations of the Act, Congress has not provided for civil penalties. To my knowledge the criminal penalties have never been leveled against any local or state official. Yet, the Council's research illustrates a pattern of repeated failures to submit voting changes in Southern states. In North Carolina recently the state submitted a 1968 constitutional amendment -- thirteen years late and only after litigants went to court to require submission. Since its adoption the provision has required the North Carolina legislature to draw state house and senate district lines without dividing counties. The requirement, which was held to dilute black citizens' right to vote in November, 1981, by the U.S. Attorney General, had sustained an unlawful voting scheme for more than a decade.

Civil penalties could be a useful deterrent against the widespread failure to submit voting changes at a time when there are no disincentives in the law to discourage serious and damaging violations which have occurred and continue to occur. Presently, a covered jurisdiction may, and a substantial number have, disregarded a key provision of the Voting Rights Act with impunity.

Under existing law covered jurisdictions have a right to seek judicial review of an objection to a voting change by the Department of Justice; however, affected citizens have no such option when the decision of Justice is not to object.

The need for evenhandedness in the process is a matter of simple fairness. The failure of Justice to object can be due to merely a technical, clerical, or administrative error. For example, Justice may not object because it loses a letter or fails to send a letter within sixty days. Delays in the mail or computer errors are also problems that can and have caused Justice not to object within the time permitted by law.

Currently there is a dispute in Sumter County, Alabama, over the question of whether Justice objected within 60 days to a state bill requiring this majority black county to purge all voters and re-register. On the merits Justice has objected although the local jurisdiction is contending that the objection arrived too late. Apparently the letter of objection had been misplaced for a few days within the Justice Department.

Regardless of the outcome of this factual question in Justice's timely response in this particular case, is it a fair process to permit clerical error to deny deserved relief to local black citizens without a right of review by the courts? It is a right in the administrative process that local jurisdictions now have. So should injured black citizens.

An effective Voting Rights Act with vigorous enforcement remains the clearest, most realistic promise to black citizens in the South that they will have an unabridged right to vote and to have that vote counted. Seventeen years ago, the United States Senate placed into law the mechanics by which the South could begin to realize that democratic promise. You now have an opportunity to give life to an effective Act and thereby continue that promise. It is an opportunity which both black and white Southerners hope you will not relinquish until democratic principles take root in the life of the South.

Senator HATCH. Our final witness today will be Mr. David Walbert, who is former professor of law at Emory University and currently a practicing attorney in Atlanta, Ga.

Professor, we are happy to have you with us, and we will look forward to your testimony at this time.

STATEMENT OF DAVID WALBERT, ESQ., FORMER LAW PROFESSOR, EMORY UNIVERSITY

Mr. WALBERT. Thank you, Mr. Chairman and Senator East.

As you stated, I am formerly an assistant professor of law at Emory University, where I primarily taught constitutional law, election law, and civil litigation, and I have, in private practice, handled a good number of voting rights cases throughout Georgia and, in one instance, in Alabama over the past 6, 7, 8 years.

I am here primarily to testify about the intent question of section 2, and I would like to say at the outset that I am firmly opposed to requiring intent in litigation under section 2, and I support the House bill that was passed because it is directed to a results type of standard.

By way of background, I would also like to point out that as I read the law, the requirement of purpose and intent traditionally has had no place in the law. If we go back to the Supreme Court's decision in Fletcher v. Peck back in 1790, they were very explicit in saying, "we do not look to the motives of the legislature when we determine the constitutionality of a piece of legislation."

Again, as a number of witnesses have said, White v. Regester quite obviously never looked at the intent of the legislature in the adoption of the reapportionment schemes there. There was not the slightest bit of evidence or any finding whatsoever on the intent of the legislature in the White case. That was in 1973 when the Supreme Court there affirmed the decisions of the trial court in invalidating at-large elections.

I think the Mobile decision is most disturbing because of what it does to section 2. In adding in a requirement that one must prove intent, they have largely vitiated section 2. We have set out in our brief in the Lodge case that is on appeal to the Supreme Court now our legal arguments on section 2, and I would just like to tender that to the committee to incorporate that in the record.

Senator HATCH. Without objection, that will be incorporated in the record.

Mr. WALBERT. I think my views on section 2 may be borne out by the experience I have had in litigating voting discrimination over the past 8 years. In about a dozen cases that I have handled in Georgia, it was not my experience that the courts found this some kind of tremendously difficult area to litigate in terms of finding justiciable standards.

Most assuredly, I never ran into a judge anywhere who suggested that proportional representation was required before the Mobile decision, nor did I ever run into any judge that ever would entertain for a moment the idea that merely proving that you had disproportionate representation in election of blacks was sufficient to prevail. Had I ever suggested that, and I never did in any case, I am sure I would have gotten short shrift by the Court.

So I do not think you realistically have any kind of a problem in adopting the legislation that has been passed. It really is specifically intended only to reenact the White v. Regester standard. There is not any realistic way that that is going to be construed to require proportional representation. That was not the track record that was established over a number of years in these cases, and there is no reason whatsoever to expect that to occur in the future.

What did occur in those cases was really a very arduous task of proof to assess the local political process and see whether or not blacks—I have not been involved in any Hispanic litigation in Georgia—did have an opportunity to participate in the political process equally and whether or not blacks had an opportunity to elect legislators of their choice. Were they shut out of the political system? That is the kind of ultimate standard that the district courts in the fifth circuit were looking at in applying the White v. Regester standard. I did not find them having a great deal of trouble doing that.

I really have to take issue with some of the things that have been said about the role of intent in our legal system because it just is not true that intent is normally a requirement in the law. Senator Hatch, I am sure you recall from your litigation experiences, if we were talking about putting local elected officials in jail for discriminating with regard to the right to vote and in enacting discriminatory reapportionment systems, I would be the first one to testify that you should have specific intent. You should be able to prove that there was no other motivation but to discriminate before you could have a criminal conviction.

Senator HATCH. But here you are talking about calling whole communities racist or discriminatory. Where that occurs, it seems to me you have got to have somebody who at least acted with the intent to discriminate.

Mr. WALBERT. Well, that would just differ from every other aspect of law in this country because, in civil litigation, when you are talking about a tort case, if you are just talking about somebody driving down the road and hitting someone, you don't charge the jury that that individual has to be proved to have intended to cause the accident or to have intended to hit that person.

Senator HATCH. In some civil cases, you do; in some tort cases, perhaps not.

Mr. WALBERT. Well, if you are going for punitive damages, of course, you do. If you are going for the question of culpability, as in punitive damages or in criminal law, intent is normally required.

Senator HATCH. Well, of course, the law treats you differently, too, if intent is present.

Mr. WALBERT. I am sorry, Senator.

Senator HATCH. The law treats you differently if you intended to do something, rather than if you did not.

Mr. WALBERT. Sure, you get punitive damages.

Senator HATCH. That is right, but that is not all.

Mr. WALBERT. That is because the question of culpability is there, but when you are talking about normal injunctive remedies or regular civil remedies, intent is a minor, if ever occurring, factor. It is only when you get into culpability questions and punishment questions——

Senator HATCH. Not necessarily. If I am driving down the road and I have a heart attack resulting in my being involved in an accident; I still may be involved in a lawsuit, despite the fact that I never intended or did anything that was negligent.

Mr. WALBERT. But I do not think the Court is going to be focusing on whether you intended to hit the person in terms of the civil case. It only would be the criminal case that they are going to look at whether or not you intended to hit the individual.

I think it is interesting, too, because we are not really even talking about intent in some ways here, as we would normally understand it, for criminal litigation.

Senator HATCH. Of course, we are not talking about intent from a criminal litigation standpoint.

Mr. WALBERT. No, but that is what troubles me particularly, because the plurality opinion in Mobile went much further than the criminal standard.

Senator HATCH. I do not agree. What brings you to that conclusion?

Mr. WALBERT. Well, in this sense. If you sit down and you hear the judge charge the jury in a criminal case on specific intent, foreseeability is invariable a proper basis for the jury to infer criminal intent. The jury is always charged, as we have heard hundreds of times, that you are allowed to assess all of the circumstances; you do not need specific or direct evidence of intent; look at all the circumstances, and you are able to infer intent from the foreseeable consequences of the defendant's actions which he is presumed to have intended.

Senator HATCH. Well, I do not concede that, and frankly, that is only one factor.

Mr. WALBERT. Well, now, here is the problem with that. That is sufficient, as the Supreme Court has said, in criminal cases, and yet that is not enough for the plurality opinion in Mobile. So we have not only not a regular civil standard in these kinds of cases; we do not even have our criminal standard of intent; we have got something that is absolutely unique in American law now, that forseeability is not——

Senator HATCH. Again, I do not agree with you. You know, criminal intent says that you have to have the requisite state of mind to commit the offense.

Mr. WALBERT. You can prove it with foreseeable circumstances.

Senator HATCH. That is not necessarily true.

Mr. WALBERT. Take United States v. United States Gypsum. It is a very good case analogy in this area, an antitrust case. This is actually very much on point in this situation, because there they are comparing civil litigation and civil remedies under Sherman I and under the Clayton Act, and they say intent is absolutely irrelevant in your civil cases under the antitrust laws, which United States v. Gypsum says, and then they start talking about, well, what will be the standard of criminal intent, though.

Senator HATCH. In Sandstrom v. Montana, the Supreme Court decision made it very clear that you have got to have and prove criminal intent.

Mr. WALBERT. In a criminal case.

Senator HATCH. That is right.

Mr. WALBERT. Well, in a criminal case, yes. I am saying, though, in a civil case, typically, historically, as in the United States v. Gypsum, you do not need to show intent to prevail, say, in the antitrust area.

Senator HATCH. Yes, but professor, the Montana case does not mean that you need to show foreseeable circumstances.

Mr. WALBERT. You do not need to, you are saying.

Senator HATCH. That is right.

Mr. WALBERT. So it is even more lax. That would even be more lax than the Mobile rule or even the normal intent thing. I think you are right because you have got your general—you are absolutely right, sir.

Senator HATCH. Well, in other words, foreseeable circumstances will not suffice. You need to show actual intent under the ruling in the Montana case and under Supreme Court law.

Mr. WALBERT. Actual intent? I am not sure what you mean. What did you mean by actual intent?

Senator HATCH. It does not mean foreseeable circumstances, I will tell you that. That, standing alone, does not necessarily constitute intent.

Mr. WALBERT. That would not be allowable. Well, the Supreme Court, I think, endorsed that in Gypsum. I do not know about the Sandstrom v. Montana case.

If you look at all the different areas of litigation, you are going to find a tremendous preponderance in all the civil cases where intent really is not the controlling factor. Punitive damages I would concede immediately because you are talking about punishment, culpability, and it is important there.

Really, I have a very hard time understanding why intent should be relevant in this whole area. We are not dealing with a private citizen, whether to put a private citizen in jail or whether to assess damages.

Senator HATCH. Or with the whole community?

Mr. WALBERT. We are talking about whether or not the whole community and the Government will be allowed to use the law, which is what we are talking about, or a reapportionment scheme, that does discriminate, and that is the basic proposition. Can they use a law that allows white people to have a tremendous predominance over the political process? I do not see, really, how we can say that can be justified, in my own mind, period, and why we have to add any additional requirement to show intent. I have a very difficult time understanding why that would be required, why the mere proof of discrimination, in and of its own right, would not be sufficient.

I do not see, historically, in our law, where we have ever had any kind of a notion that the Government is allowed, authorized, and legally able to discriminate. It just does not exist. It is a lot different even than we talked about when you had the open housing matter here a couple of years ago and you really had kind of the exact same debate.

Senator HATCH. Pretty much the same.

Mr. WALBERT. I think there is a real difference, though. I mean, there you were talking about the Federal Government legislating and regulating the activities of private individuals, less and less Federal control, and so on. We do not have that situation right here. The Government is already acting. The local and State governments have already put into place some kind of legal mechanism to control the elections, so we are not talking about the Government versus the individual. We are talking about a government system of elections that is already in place by the Government.

I think, in this case, there is even less reason for the Federal Government to be concerned about having the power of Federal rule here. I mean, the Government has already acted in setting up the legislation, and to add an additional intent requirement here I think is much more inappropriate than it would be in the title VII employment area or in the open housing area.

I think, too, that we talk abut the unpredictability of what would occur if you did not have an intent requirement, and I think that the results that I would foresee if you do require intent would really be a good deal more bizarre and sort of absurd than anything imaginable, really.

You could have adjacent counties, it seems to me, that had identical facts, a political process that was identical, where black people had the same degree of oppression and elimination from the political process in two adjacent countries; then you have some people run for office who say openly, I am going to keep the at-large election system here specifically in order to keep black people out of office, and then you could bring your case and you could win.

In the next county over, they run on some different platform where people are not so open about their motivations, even though the facts and the operation of the system are identical, and you would lose.

You talk about predictability and consequences and just sort of a good legal system that Senator East talks about: We want predictability in the legal system; we want sense in it; it must make sense. Well, it is not going to make much sense if two counties adjacent to each other can have completely different results because you have an avowed open group of racists perpetuating the law in one county, and in the next county you have a more sophisticated group who are not open about their motivations. That really does not make any sense.

I think, also, frankly, and it is interesting because the appellants in the Lodge v. Buxton case make quite a point of this—they say that it is unseemly to be investigating the motives of the legislatures. Frankly, I think that is true. It would be like having somebody attack the law of this body, of the U.S. Congress, as being unconstitutional because it was racist in its motive, putting you gentlemen on the witness stand, peering into your motivations. That is not right. It is unseemly.

Senator HATCH. I think it would be appropriate if that exists.

Mr. WALBERT. Well, I think the law should be tested by a different standard. I agree with the appellants on that one position in the Lodge case. That is unseemly. The courts should not be interfering in the legislative process in that way. They should not be looking into the minds of Senator East and Senator Hatch and Senator Kennedy in terms of why you passed this particular legislation. That is inappropriate.

I see that my time has expired, and I want to thank you.

Senator HATCH. We will put your full statement in the record.

I do not think you have to read the minds of legislators, however. There are a lot of factors to which you would look to determine whether the legislature has acted to the purposeful detriment of any racial group or groups.

The Supreme Court noted in the Arlington Heights case, "Determining whether invidious discriminatory purpose was a motivating factor demands a sensitive inquiry into such circumstantial and direct evidence as may be available." Of course, it goes on to mention specific considerations such as historical background of the action, the sequence of events leading up to the decision, the existence of departures from normal procedures, legislative history, the impact of the decision upon minority groups, et cetera.

I do not believe legislators should be immune from standards of proof in these cases, but I have also appreciated your testimony expressing your point of view.

Let me ask you this. You have said that all 14th and 15th amendment cases prior to the adoption of the Voting Rights Act in 1965 applied an effects test for discrimination. Can you name one single case——

Mr. WALBERT. Baker v. Carr.

Senator HATCH [continuing]. Before 1965, where a challenged practice struck down by the Supreme Court was not racially discriminatory on its face?

Mr. WALBERT. Baker v. Carr, obviously. It was totally a fair reapportionment scheme when it was adopted in 1901.

Senator HATCH. But Baker v. Carr had nothing to do with racial discrimination.

Mr. WALBERT. Do you remember how that was justified, Senator?

Senator HATCH. Well, keep in mind, I am asking you about anything that was not racially discriminatory on its face before 1965, any single case.

Mr. WALBERT. I do not think, in Colgrove, they were looking at all at the question of discrimination. I think Frankfurter's dissent, as I recall in Colgrove, made that quite clear. I would not suggest to the Senator that this case, other than White v. Regester, which is absolutely explicit in 1973, was not——

Senator HATCH. Colgrove was the predecessor of Baker?

Mr. WALBERT. Colgrove was the pre-Baker case on the same type of issue.

Senator HATCH. No, but my recollection is that that was not racial discrimination.

Mr. WALBERT. Well, let me state it this way.

Senator HATCH. It did not involve an issue of racial discrimination, either, did it? There is a great deal of difference between equal protection analysis focusing upon individuals, as in Baker, and equal protection analysis focusing upon racial groups, as proposed here.

Mr. WALBERT. You are certainly right that these cases did not even come up until, say—I guess Whitcomb was the first one, which is post-1965, so certainly you are right that there were none before 1965.

Senator HATCH. Let me ask you this. With regard to the significance of White v. Regester, did the per curiam district court opinion in this case, or Justice White's opinion for the Supreme Court, mention the 15th amendment?

Mr. WALBERT. Did it, you say?

Senator HATCH. Yes, did they ever mention the 15th amendment?

Mr. WALBERT. It is a strange omission, isn't it? I find that peculiar, myself. I assume you do, too. I mean, it seems like it should be a 15th amendment case if that deals with racial discrimination in voting.

Senator HATCH. Well, not according to the Court. It did not even mention it.

Let me ask you this. Did the per curiam opinion for this case, or Justice White's opinion, mention the Voting Rights Act?

Mr. WALBERT. It was not raised by the parties, so I think it would be inappropriate for them to raise it.

Senator HATCH. It really was not. It was not even part of the case.

Mr. WALBERT. Senator, may I respond to that just briefly?

Senator HATCH. Sure.

Mr. WALBERT. I am sure you are well steeped in the legislative history of the 1965 act, and it was quite clear that most people—certainly, if you go back and read the legal professional journals at that time and if you look at the congressional debates—the namesake of this building, when he was talking about the 1965 Voting Rights Act, thought that the 15th amendment reached things that were purpose or effect in their nature. That is quite clear from the legislative record at that time, so I do not think there would have been much of a dispute back then of what section 2 and——

Senator HATCH. I do not think that is true. We both have got to read that case again, but I do not think that is in there.

Mr. WALBERT. It is not codified in law. I am not talking about the case; I am saying the legislative record, the legislative history.

Senator HATCH. Oh; I do not think that that is true about the legislative history, either. What is your basis for saying that?

Mr. WALBERT. Congress never passed any law and said there are resolutions that say we believe it means effect, but that is how I read it.

Senator HATCH. Are you aware that the district court opinion in White v. Regester states, at page 735, that effect alone is not sufficient to invalidate a districting scheme under the 14th amendment?

Mr. WALBERT. As I recall, though, Senator, they are talking there about effect in the specific sense of dispproportionate election, and I agree with them completely in that regard.

Senator HATCH. Are you aware that the Supreme Court opinion does not comment on the district court's determination that effect alone is not sufficient to invalidate a districting scheme under the 14th amendment?

Mr. WALBERT. Sorry, Senator, I did not hear your question.

Senator HATCH. Are you aware that the Supreme Court opinion in that case does not comment on the district court's determination that effect alone is not sufficient to invalidate a districting scheme under the 14th amendment?

Mr. WALBERT. I would think that when they say that the mere focusing in on the disproportionate election of blacks versus whites is not enough to prevail, that is adopting and affirming that statement by the district court. That is what the district court meant when it said that, as I read it. That is in that context.

Senator HATCH. But you are aware that, in the White case, the Court in fact identified the existence of invidious discrimination or purposeful discrimination. What is "invidious" discrimination?

Mr. WALBERT. Absolutely not, in connection with the maintenance of the electoral system, however. They identified historical discrimination much as in Bolden, the Mobile case, against blacks in schools and in voting, and so on, but absolutely no evidence whatsoever aimed at this question or any finding whatsoever on the question of invidious discrimination in the maintenance or adoption of the multimember districts.

Senator HATCH. Well, of course, in the Mobile case, the Court reiterated the fact that White involved such invidious or purposeful discrimination or, in fact, an intent to discriminate.

Mr. WALBERT. What is your question, sir?

Senator HATCH. That is what Mobile said. White actually involved invidious, purposeful discrimination.

Mr. WALBERT. Well, we would have to look at White. I think four people in the plurality in Mobile, tried to read White that way. If you can show me the language of White that would support that, I would certainly see your point.

Senator HATCH. Well, the thing that bothers me is that proponents of the bill are coming in and claiming White is the basis of their support, but White was not a 15th amendment case, nor was it a voting rights case, and in White the justices agreed that there was invidious discrimination. So what is its value to us in this particular issue?

Mr. WALBERT. Let's use Senator East's analysis here and let's say that we want the Constitution to make sense. Quite clearly, if White v. Regester prevailed on the 14th amendment, a stronger standard should prevail on the 15th amendment, because that specifically deals with voting. The 15th amendment, if it means anything, must mean something more than the 14th amendment or it was nugatory and a worthless thing when they adopted it. Now, it has to mean something, and it says "deny or abridge," not just "deny," "deny or abridge the right to vote." If the 15th amendment means anything, it must be at least as powerful a mechanism as the 14th amendment in a dilution case, at least as powerful if not a stronger test, if we follow the White reasoning and what the Senator is asking. It could not be weaker, certainly. It deals specifically and exclusively with voting, and we would expect a stronger impact, a stronger rule from the 15th amendment for that reason.

Senator HATCH. When you appeared before the House committee, your fellow panelist, James Blacksher, bemoaned the, "absence of a clear, judicially management definition of dilution." Do you agree that the courts have failed to develop such a definition?

Mr. WALBERT. I had never read his testimony, Senator.

Senator HATCH. I see.

Mr. WALBERT. But my recollection is that he was talking about this responsiveness problem. I would agree with him that if a court focuses in on the question of responsiveness, you are into a political thicket; you are into something that should not be focused on, and I would agree with the Senator in that regard.

Senator HATCH. Do you believe that the House bill gives us a definition of dilution in this case?

Mr. WALBERT. As I recall, the House report quite explicitly says that responsiveness should not be focused on. With that deletion, I have no problems with the House bill.

Senator HATCH. Now, you told the House committee, "The ultimate test in White v. Regester is, does the minority group have equal opportunity to elect the legislators of their choice."

Mr. WALBERT. To participate in the political process, I think.

Senator HATCH. Right, leaving aside the fact that the Constitution protects persons, not groups, how can a minority's chance to win elections ever be equal to that of the majority? Isn't the word you really want "proportional"?

Mr. WALBERT. No; the word I want is "some shot," some chance, not no chance like it is today.

Senator HATCH. You are saying there is no chance?

Mr. WALBERT. No chance in the situations where these cases have prevailed. Again, if you take the assumption that the courts have adopted a proportional representation rule, and no decision you could ever cite would support that, then I think you would have the situation the Senator is suggesting.

But if you look at the cases that have prevailed, blacks had no chance. That is how the courts dealt with it before Bolden, and I think they did quite a good job.

Senator HATCH. You claim that in Washington v. Davis, the Supreme Court held for the first time that intent to discriminate is necessary for 14th amendment equal-protection challenge. Of course, we all know that section 2 of the Voting Rights Act represents the 15th amendment.

Be that as it may, did the Supreme Court ever hold that intent was not necessary under the 14th amendment equal protection challenge, either before or after Washington v. Davis?

Mr. WALBERT. Wasn't it Adkins v. Georgia, if my recollection is correct, where they explicitly said that purpose and intent is not required in that jury case? I am not sure it was Adkins, but I believe it was.

Senator HATCH. Senator East?

Senator EAST. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Walbert, again I welcome you and thank you for coming and helping us this morning.

First, what do you think of the City of Rome?

Mr. WALBERT. I like it. [Laughter.]

Senator EAST. You like it, you say.

Mr. WALBERT. Which one do you mean, now? [Laughter.]

Senator EAST. Well, do you like the holding in the City of Rome case?

Mr. WALBERT. Oh, the case. [Laughter.] I really did not prepare on the section 5 question, Senator. I did teach this. I should have some recollection.

Senator EAST. It was in the City of Rome v. Georgia case where there was not any question that individuals could register and vote. The point was that a third of the population of the city of Rome was black. They had at-large elections and no black had been elected to the city council.

There the Court held that that, ipso facto, in and of itself, was evidence of the violation of the applicable law, the 1965 Voting Rights Act. In effect, I am suggesting that gives you proportional representation because it meant they had to abandon the at-large system and had to go to the district system.

Mr. WALBERT. Was that a section 5 case, Senator?

Senator EAST. Pardon?

Mr. WALBERT. That was a section 5 case, then, wasn't it?

Senator EAST. Yes.

Mr. WALBERT. They were applying the straight regression standard which I think is different, as I understand it, than what the House advocates in section 2, though. It is a little different than what I am speaking of.

Senator EAST. All right. Well, let me shift ground here a bit on a good point you are raising, and I think this would be better to focus on, since this is what you feel is critical in terms of your testimony.

Senator HATCH. Senator East, could I interrupt you for a second?

Senator EAST. Yes; you may.

Senator HATCH. I thought I was correct in my assessment of the Adkins case. In the Washington v. Davis case, it does cite this as the proposition from the Adkins case. It says, "A purpose to discriminate"—in fact, this is a quote right out of Adkins—"must be present which may be proven by systematic exclusion of eligible jurymen of the proscribed race whereby unequal application of the law to such extent is to show intentional discrimination."

Mr. WALBERT. Sir, I will get the case where I know there is a decision. I thought it was Adkins and I am wrong. Palmer v. Thompson certainly held it, and there they proved intent. In Palmer v. Thompson, they said, I am sorry, you can't use intent to prove a 14th amendment violation, the 5-4 majority said, and the dissent said you could. Palmer would do it.

Senator HATCH. Perhaps that is what you are thinking about.

Mr. WALBERT. No, there is a jury case. I thought it was Adkins, but it obviously was not if that is a quote from Adkins, but I will get it for you, Senator, if you would like.

Senator HATCH. Let's both look it up and see what it is.

Excuse me, Senator East. I apologize.

Senator EAST. Let me pursue this tack on this matter of intent. Now, you suggest that our perhaps traditional conventional notions of intent in criminal law and elsewhere really are not applicable here, obviously opting out for the idea that an effects test is what we should be utilizing.

Let me pursue this line of reasoning in test of that theory, though. Back to the fundamental first principle here of the Constitution—namely, the 15th amendment—which is where all this begins. Now, as I say, the right of citizens of the United States to vote, which I again would assume means the right to register, to vote, and to have it counted——

Senator HATCH. Senator East, can I interrupt you again?

Senator EAST. Yes.

Senator HATCH. I have to leave.

Senator EAST. All right.

Senator HATCH. Would you close out the hearing. I apologize to you, but I have already gotten to the questions I wanted to ask you, Mr. Walbert, and we appreciate the effort you have taken to be here. Could you close out the hearing, Senator?

Senator EAST. You are leaving me here to run this whole thing on my own?

Senator HATCH. I would like you to do it.

Senator EAST. It is a reckless act. [Laughter.]

Senator HATCH. Without objection, I ask unanimous consent that you continue the hearing and close it out. I am sorry I cannot stay for the end.

Could I just make one other point? I think—and this is not necessarily meant to pick on you—these hearings are extremely important. I don't care which side you are on either side of these issues. But we have not been receiving these statements far enough in advance, and I think that they are important enough that all witnesses, pro or con on this issue, should have their statements in. We are supposed to have them 3 days in advance, but even if we could have them by 5 o'clock the evening before, I would feel good about it.

I am going to look with a jaundiced eye upon not having these statements on time in the future because it is hard for us to prepare and ask the most intelligent questions possible to really thoroughly exhaust this area. So from this time forward, I hope that all witnesses will get their statements in 3 days in advance and no later than 5 o'clock on the day preceding the subcommittee hearing. If we can do that, I think it would help everybody. It helps Senator Kennedy and Senator Mathias; it certainly helps me and all of the other members of this subcommittee, and it helps the other members of the full Judiciary Committee who may want to participate in these hearings.

With that, I am going to have to excuse myself. Senator, I appreciate your taking care of closing out this hearing.

Mr. WALBERT. Senator, I did not "intend" to have my statement in late.

Senator HATCH. We understand.

Mr. WALBERT. But it did have that "effect."

Senator HATCH. That is why I hesitated. I was going to wait until you sat down because I did not want to look like I was picking on you. This has been kind of the rule rather than——

Mr. WALBERT. I had good intentions.

Senator HATCH. I am sure everybody has good intentions, but these are important hearings, and everybody admits that they are important. I think they are important enough for people to have their statements in here so that we can properly prepare. We would appreciate it.

Thanks, Senator.

Senator EAST. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

So this is how you eventually get power around here. It is a battlefield commission. You simply endure long enough and you finally end up getting to chair things. So all of a sudden I am chairman of a committee of which I am not a member. [Laughter.]

I look upon this newfound power with mixed emotions here.

Mr. WALBERT. How about the 10-minute rule? [Laughter.]

Senator EAST. I am in charge now. [Laughter.]

And there will be no further testimony. I will bar the doors. No more interlopers here.

On this question of intent and effects, they are interrelated, but let me focus on this question of intent a bit. You again suggested you did not think our traditional, conventional understanding of intention was applicable to this situation, that it was not, again, a traditional, conventional, criminal law kind of situation.

I appreciate what you are saying and your line of reasoning there, but let me approach it this way. I would just appreciate getting your reaction to my thinking on it. Again, the 15th amendment is predicated upon the idea that the individual shall have the right to register to vote, to have it counted, and that cannot be denied on the basis of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

Now, to me, the language there is fairly clear, as language goes in constitutional law. As I noted earlier, in the 15th amendment and the debate over it, the idea of the right to hold office was rejected. All right, so that is the right, the right of the individual to register, to vote, to have his vote counted without regard to race, color, or previous condition of servitude. It says nothing now about the right to hold office. It certainly says nothing about the right for certain groups to have their proportional representation.

I think it is a simple, elementary, fundamental concept of democratic political theory ensconced rather specifically in the 15th amendment that each and every one of us has the right to register, to vote, and to have it counted.

Now, let me just finish my line of reasoning here. If I am correct on that, and that is my first premise, as a corollary to it, if someone intends to deny me as an individual the right to vote because of any of those things, race, color, previous condition of servitude, they have violated my right. In other words, in order for me to lose the right, someone has to intend and in fact discriminate against me based upon those reasons.

You get into this whole question of a change in a district line, perhaps brought in to broaden the tax base, or perhaps this community wants to be brought into the community to get certain government services, and in return the city likes it because it means a better tax base. Yet it would have the effect—not the intent now—of altering ever so slightly the racial balance or whatever in that community. That violates the 1965 Voting Rights Act as you would currently support it.

Mr. WALBERT. I do not think that is what I am saying. You are saying that, I think.

Senator EAST. Well, I would submit, if intent is no longer what you are looking at——

Mr. WALBERT. I do not think that is correct.

Senator EAST. If intent is no longer what you are looking at, if what you are looking at is the effect, if the effect is to dilute or alter in any substantive way minority voting strength—mind you, not even majority, and I would submit majority is covered by this because each individual is graranteed this. You certainly cannot have it both ways now. You cannot have this thing simply work to the advantage of those minorities as defined by the Department of Justice, whoever is drafting this law.

The problem is, in the hypothetical I gave, that would very likely be considered a violation, because the effect is to dilute minority voting strength and hence a violation of the 1965 Voting Rights Act.

But to me, the idea of the intent to discriminate based upon race, color, or previous condition of servitude inheres in the 15th Amendment. In order to prove intent, I agree, you could look at a whole range of things, external as well as internal, but as it stands now, we are not offered by the witnesses any criteria of that kind. We are simple told, look at the effect, look at the effect, look at the effect. But if you look at the effect, basically, the effects test is a proportional representation test.

If any change is made that alters, creates any imbalance as regards what the designated minority now obtains, any alteration of that that diminishes it, dilutes it, ipso facto, you have a violation. I submit, as a practical matter in the real world of law and application, there are no criteria. There are no criteria except how does it strike you as the head of the Civil Rights Division in the Justice Department, and it goes back to my earlier point about rules of law and the responsibility of the legislative branch to set forth specific criteria whereby the Justice Department can guide its conduct and State and local government can act in response to that in some sort of ordered, rational way.

To me, it is a very fundamental premise of the rule of law that we are up against here, and simply vague yearnings about desired results are not the rule of law; that is benevolent authoritarianism. The standards are vague, undefined, not clear, just large grants of power given over, and I do not think it is good law.

Frankly, as regards the November elections of 1980, not that that has to be the sole determining criteria, but I think it did indicate that there was some desire in this country among the American people that perhaps, as regards bureaucratic elitism and judicial elitism having usurped the legislative process, it was about time that the Congress tried to reclaim its fundamental policymaking role in the American system.

I would submit, as one lowly freshman Senator if what we want is proportional representation, then we ought to amend the Constitution and say so, that racial minorities will be guaranteed x percentage, and I presume it will mean racial majorities will be guaranteed x percentage.

But let us not, because it just is not there, try to strain it out of the 15th amendment. The 15th amendment, in my judgment, on any reasonable, rational reading, will not yield up the premise that racial minorities are guaranteed effects or proportional representation.

It seems to me that however honorable the intentions of those who speak otherwise, as a matter of good constitutional law, let's look at that proposition and see if that is what we want. Is that good, sound, democratic political theory? If so, let's amend the Constitution and put it in. Perhaps it would foster racial harmony in this country. If so, I give it a plus and I would support it.

My own estimate is, and again, I have made the point several times in here, that I think it would violate the fundamental premise of democratic political theory, the Madisonian idea of trying to build consensus out of coalitions of groups.

I am going to give you a chance to respond here in a moment, but why confine this to racial groups? Why not do it with sexes? Why not do it on religious groupings? For example, you could show that in a given Catholic area, no Protestant had ever been elected; ipso facto evidence, Catholics bigoted against Protestants, or vice versa, or people of the Jewish faith versus people of the Christian faith. I mean, the thing has endless ramifications.

What it brings you back to, in every case, is this ideal of proportional representation—religious, ethnic, racial, sex, ad infinitum. And to me, it has nothing to do with that fundamental tenet of democratic political theory, Madison's idea that in the great melting pot, the challenge will be to build consensus, to pull it together, and no one can be guaranteed that their religion or their race or their sex or their political party or whatever it might be will be guaranteed their proportion of the State legislature or the U.S. Congress. Why hold the line at race?

In North Carolina, for example, we have a three-to-one Democrat-over-Republican registration. That is not reflected in the State legislature. Are people of North Carolina prejudiced against Republicans? We do not know. Some of them are able to cross the line from time to time.

But that would be an effects test, wouldn't it? Is it right to discriminate against a person because of party affiliation? I do not think it is a frivolous question because you open up this Pandora's box. You say that race ought to be privileged. I say religion, then, maybe; sex, maybe; political party, maybe; physically handicapped, maybe. I do not know.

But at some point, I think, in democratic political theory, you have to say. We just can't do that, ladies and gentlemen. We cannot guarantee the right to hold office. We cannot guarantee quotas and proportions. But what we can guarantee you this: the unfettered right to participate in the political process, to express your views unintimidated, to register and to vote and to have it counted.

I think if you put that propostion to the American people, they would buy it. But if you got into this whole question of proportional representation, as those of you who are up here talking about what I think in effect is proportional representation, I think they would vote it down overwhelmingly, if they understood it. I do not think the House of Representatives would have sent over that bill, as Henry Hyde indicated the other day, if they had understood it.

I do feel, in the Senate, if we can get our 100 brethren to focus on this thing long enough and get them to understand the nationwide implications of it, they will turn it down or they will ask for major changes in it: intent as opposed to effects, reasonable bailouts, and so on and so forth. That is what we are fighting over.

I respect your point of view, and you say it well, and obviously you are an incredibly literate and articulate person on this matter.

I have packed a lot in here, but let me ask you. where do you think is the fundamental error in my analysis here, beginning with the 15th amendment? Do I misread the 15th amendment? Do I misread what you are trying to do?

Mr. WALBERT. Yes, Senator, you do misconstrue the 15th amendment and what I am representing.

First of all, when the constitutional convention, rather than the Congress, voted down that proposal on the 15th amendment about holding office, they did that because they considered it too narrow, not too broad. Therefore, what was embodied in that particular proposal for the 15th amendment was considered to be embodied in the ultimate 15th amendment that was adopted.

When they talked about the right to hold office, they meant that something more than just the right to walk into the ballot box and cast your ballot was included in the 15th amendment.

Senator EAST. What evidence do you have that, under the 15th amendment, they did mean or could have meant more than that, or we could reasonably expect to guarantee it as a practical matter in American politics?

Mr. WALBERT. Senator, your predecessor——

Senator EAST. You are saying it means more than that. What does it mean? What does it guarantee beyond the right to freely participate and to register and to vote and to have it counted? What do you think it means beyond that? What could it practically mean that you would embrace? Results, effects, proportional representation? I mean, I am curious.

Mr. WALBERT. I think that it does. As the Senator says, the right to freely and equally participate is certainly embodied in it, and that is part of what we are talking about today.

Senator EAST. Yes, but again, that does not guarantee results now.

Mr. WALBERT. No, it does not. Most assuredly, I would not suggest that we are talking about guaranteeing results. I would agree with you there, and I do not think we are talking about proportional representation, and I would disavow any relationship with proportional representationalists. I do not support that.

Senator EAST. But that is the problem that Senator Hatch and the others and I are having, that in effect that is what we are going to have, proportional representation. We are going to have the Rome case, and we are getting it in North Carolina. They have got us in such a convoluted state down there in terms of our electoral process, and fundamentally what they are saying is there has to be proportional representation.

Mr. WALBERT. You need a good election lawyer down there, Senator East.

Senator EAST. Well, what we need is a good law that makes it clear to the Justice Department what they can and cannot do, because right now we are at the mercy of faceless bureaucrats in the Justice Department, bless their hearts, doing their best, but they have no standards, no criteria; it is just, "Hey guys, how does it strike you this morning?" It is sort of vague humanitarian yearnings that have become the standard for the rule of law. However honorable those intentions, and that is always the tact of the benevolent dictator, I want some standards, I want some criteria, and that is what we are not getting.

Mr. WALBERT. All right.

Senator EAST. We are just getting vague yearnings for something here of this ideal system of voting justice, which I submit is proportional representation. That is the path you are leading us down.

Mr. WALBERT. I think, Senator, you put your finger on a point very well when you keep talking about not wanting to disrupt the harmony, racial harmony, of North Carolina or somewhere by having district elections. I think harmony is an interesting point here, because if you go into a commmunity, and let's say you find that the political process is completely segregated like it might have been in 1960—let's say that there is no interaction among blacks and whites. Let's say that you have a situation where black people in a North Carolina town have no access to the political process in terms of the decisionmakers, in terms of who is running for office, and in terms of support groups, and so on. Then you do not have equal access to the political process as White v. Regester meant it.

In those towns in North Carolina where you no longer have the vestiages of segregation, where you have the harmony that the Senator is speaking of, you cannot prevail in one of these cases. If you have this harmonious, integrated relationship, you would have no problems, and the fact that blacks may not have been elected is completely irrelevant.

Senator EAST. Who would make that determination? You are saying the standard could be harmonious racial relationships as defined by whom? Well, I presume the gentleman in charge of the Civil Rights Division of the Justice Department.

Mr. WALBERT. They have no authority over section 2 whatsoever in the Justice Department. What we are talking about today, I thought, was section 2. The Justice Department has no role in it, has no interpretive power. They certainly never file lawsuits under it, although I suppose they should.

Senator EAST. Well, as regards their preclearance requirements, that is exactly what they are doing in North Carolina, are they not?

Mr. WALBERT. Section 2 has no preclearance requirements.

Senator EAST. They are telling us that we cannot have this particular approach in this particular legislative district because it is diluting potentially, they say, black voting strength. It is the results test, I think these things are interrelated.

Mr. WALBERT. Well, section 2, of course, does not have any of those problems, thank goodness, because there is no preclearance, there is no role for the Justice Department, and the Supreme Court will ultimately determine what the standards are, and the Justice Department, I think, is 0 for 12 before the Supreme Court, so you do not need to worry about them.

Senator EAST. But on the preclearance of determining whether a given voting change is of discriminatory character, that is what they are doing, are they not?

Mr. WALBERT. Not under section 2 because there is no such thing as preclearance under section 2. It does not exist.

Senator EAST. Well, the whole concept in terms of preclearance, which is where the issue arises extensively, is that you go to the Justice Department to get the affected jurisdiction cleared that this change in the election law process is not discriminatory in character. Is that correct?

Mr. WALBERT. I do not know.

Senator EAST. Well, you do.

Mr. WALBERT. Section 2 is what I know, the constitutional litigation.

Senator EAST. Well, all right. We are back to your specialty now, so we will go ahead with that. But I am submitting that under preclearance the issue arises, too, because you are trying to determine whether that particular change in the State election law, as we were noting earlier in Mr. Suitts' testimony—they tell us in North Carolina that our change in the Constitution forbids you, in redistricting, to split counties, that the effect is to dilute minority voting strength. There was never the understanding or the correlation; simply a marginal corollary point spun out of it.

The idea was, to protest the integrity of counties, you put them in various districts. Trying not to split counties as the basic unit of State government seemed to make sense. It had nothing to do with racial discrimination.

The Justice Department said, Hey, the effect is, as we see it, possibly to cause dilution of minority voting strength, and it is an effects test under preclearance.

Mr. WALBERT. Were they right?

Senator EAST. Well, do you know what our choices are?

Mr. WALBERT. What?

Senator EAST. To fight it in the courts or to call the legislature back into special session. It is a nonchoice. We are trying to get on with the election process, so the legislature is back in special session, trying to unscramble this thing, keeping their fingers crossed that the young lawyers in the Civil Rights Division of the Justice Department will find it OK. So our people are coming up, cup in hand, to see if these young gents think it is fine. We in the Congress have not given them any guidance.

Mr. WALBERT. I am not one to endorse the Justice Department's behavior under section 5. You will not find me doing that, Senator.

Senator EAST. All right, but these things are interrelated because preclearance, then, in this case, depends on what is the intent of the legislature of North Carolina? They concluded it must have been to discriminate. In other words, they put it in a fascinating way. They said, "We see no evidence that it was not done for purposes of discrimination." That really puts you in a bind. How do you prove that crazy negative?

And so, as a practical matter, what you have to do is what our legislature is doing. You go back into special session, you come up to the Justice Department, and you say, "Gentlemen, what would satisfy you?," and they say, "Well, let's see. Ah, we like this and this and this, or whatever." And so you go back and you try to draw it to conform to their way.

Not surprisingly, this is not very popular in North Carolina. I think the problem is not because anyone wants to discriminate on the basis of race, because people understand that it does not have anything to do with discrimination based upon race.

Mr. WALBERT. It is strange, though, Senator, that among black people in North Carolina, it is very popular.

Senator EAST. Well, it could be.

Mr. WALBERT. There seems to be a different perception there.

Senator EAST. What evidence do you have that that is so? I would submit that in North Carolina, unless there are certain black political figures who want guaranteed results, and perhaps there are—we have got Republicans in our State. You know, often some of these things work against us in the State legislature, which is Democratically dominated, and often we could possibly go in and prove that this was done for the purpose of possibly altering the chance of Republican victory. I mean, there is no end to this.

Again, you could get into sex, you could get into religion. You open up Pandora's box here. It is not strictly a racial problem.

Mr. WALBERT. Aren't we safe, though, Senator, because the Civil War was fought solely over the race issue, and the 13th, 14th, and 15th amendments deal with race, not Republicans, not Democrats, not sex, nothin else but race.

Senator EAST. But they all come out of the same period. Often the discrimination based upon party in the South goes back to the same period, the hostility to the Republican party. And the whole question of discrimination against women based upon sex, is this not a part of it, too?

Mr. WALBERT. But as the Senator points out, we must stick with a principled interpretation of the Constitution, and where only race and color are mentioned in the 15th amendment, you are getting on pretty thin grounds to say that you could pass——

Senator EAST. That is right. That is why I say I think what they are talking about is to make sure that the right to register and to vote and to have it counted based upon race, color, or previous condition of servitude will not be denied. I think we ought to look at that in that spirit.

Mr. WALBERT. Senator, you notice the word "intent" is not in the 15th amendment.

Senator EAST. Well, I think it is clear, as I was noting, that the right to vote, to register, to vote, and to have it counted, that the intent is required that when of a State legislature or any subdivision thereof makes a change in the election laws, in order to show that it violated the spirit and the letter of the 15th amendment, you would have to show some degree of intent to discriminate based upon those grounds. But you do not. You are just saying effects.

Actually, the effect could be brought about not by the intent to discriminate but simply because, for example, you brought in a subdivision to increase the tax base and to expand the opportunity for city services. That is not uncommon. It had nothing to do with race, but yet the conclusion is the change was made for purposes of discriminating based upon race.

I think you need some criteria for saying, the reason the city council did that, or the State legislature did that, is palpably, clearly, the motivation is what?; it is racial. That is the letter and the spirit and the meaning of the 15th amendment.

I think you are making a jump here that the Constitution cannot bear, that the 15th amendment does not yield up. You are going to effects, which is going to mean proportional representation.

Mr. WALBERT. I just did not want to engraft intent into the 15th amendment when I do not read it there.

Senator EAST. Pardon?

Mr. WALBERT. I do not want to see intent engrafted into the 15th amendment when I do not read it there. When I read the amendment, I do not see the word there.

Senator EAST. Well, I think that by "intent" I mean some demonstrated evidence, some specific criteria, that the purpose of doing what was done was to discriminate based upon race, color, or previous condition of servitude, and it affected directly the right to vote, to register, to vote, to have it counted, and to participate in the political process, but again, not effects, not results; above all, not proportional representation.

Well, we have probably exhausted that one. I appreciate your coming, and I shall cease and desist. If there are no further proceedings, and I gather there are none, we shall stand adjourned.

Mr. WALBERT. Thank you, Senator.

Senator EAST. Thank you.

[The prepared statement of David F. Walbert follows:]

PREPARED STATEMENT OF DAVID F. WALBERT

Good morning, Mr. Chairman and members of the Subcommittee. I am David Walbert from Atlanta, Georgia. I am formerly an assistant professor of law at Emory University where I primarily taught constitutional and election law. I have resided and practiced law in Georgia for most of the past eight years and have specialized over the years in voting rights and election litigation.

I would like to thank the Subcommittee for inviting me to testify before you, and I hope I can offer some useful comments on the " purpose or intent " issue that has cropped up in the constitutional and election litigation in the past few years. At the outset let me say that I am firmly opposed to the newly created intent requirement that has been injected into the law for the first time in our Nation's history. I am opposed to this development not only because it contradicts our historical legal traditions but also because of the practical consequences of the new doctrine.

By way of background, I should first point out that the requirement of purpose and intent traditionally has had no place whatsoever in our legal system. Since 1790, the Supreme Court has repeatedly refused to consider the intent and motive that lay behind the adoption or retention of a particular or legislative scheme. The constitutionality of official action has always hinged on the impact, not its motivating purposes. That was the rule set down in the landmark opinion of Chief Justice Marshall in the 1810 decision, Fletcher v. Peck, 6 Cranch 87, 130 (1810). That position was reiterated by our Supreme Court on many occasions in the nearly two centuries that followed, and was most recently restated in Palmer v. Thompson, 403 U.S. 217 (1971).

In the voting area in particular, there had never been any dispute that the discriminatory effect was enough in its own right to raise a constitutional question. Justice Black stated what he felt was a self-evident constitutional rule in his opinion in the 1946 decision in Colgrove v. Green, 328 U.S.

549, 572 (1946). In Justice Black's words, the Supreme Court has a "duty to invalidate [a] state law" where discrimination results from either "negligence or a willful effort to deprive some citizens of an effective vote." Even the most conservative wing of the Supreme Court that dissented in the historic Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186 (1962) reapportionment case agreed that the constitutionality of a statute was tested by its consequences, not by the intent that may have motived the adoption of the statute. Justice Frankfurter stated that it "is settled that whatever [constitutional] consequences may derive from a discrimination worked by a state statute must be the same as if the same discrimination were written into the State's fundamental law." Id. at 325-26. Thus, where a statute "works" some form of discrimination--i.e., where it had the effect of discriminating in actual implementation--its constitutionality was tested by these consequences, and not by some underlying motivations that may have been expressed on the face of the statute or otherwise. A "purpose or effect" type of standard was reiterated subsequently by the Supreme Court and lower federal courts, and by the Supreme Court at least as recently as 1973 in the case of White v. Regester, 412 U.S. 755 (1973). In that case, the Supreme Court unanimously struck down certain countywide elections that had the effect of discriminating against blacks and Hispanics in the State of Texas. The district court and the Supreme Court found those elections to be unconstitutional, notwithstanding the complete absence of any evidence whatsoever of an intent to discriminate in either the adoption or maintenance of the countywide election scheme.

The historic American principle that the Constitution of the United States was concerned with effects and consequences, and not motivations, first began to change in 1976 with the Supreme Court's decision in Washington v. Davis, 426 U.S. 229 (1976), an employment discrimination case involving Washington, D.C. For the first time, the Supreme Court held that intent to discriminate was necessary in maintaining a Fourteenth Amendment equal protection challenge. Then in the 1980 decision in City of Mobile v. Bolden, 446 U.S. 55 (1980), a number of the Justices of the United States Supreme Court imposed the newly created intent standard in the area of election litigation.

Concerning today's problem, the most disturbing aspect of the Mobile decision in the plurality's construction of §2 of the Voting Rights Act. The plurality concluded that §2 of the Act reached only a narrow class of cases, and that a plaintiff could not ever prevail unless he or she proved that the discriminatory practice was actually motivated, in its adoption or retention, by an invidious racist intent to discriminate. This interpretation of §2 was without any support in history or logic.

I believe that interpretation of section 2 was erroneous. I have recently filed a brief in the Supreme Court in the case of Rogers v. Lodge, in which I have set forth the arguments on this point. I believe you have also been presented with an amicus brief in that case as well as the amicus brief filed by the United States of America when the case was pending in the fifth circuit. Both these amicus briefs make the same argument, so, with the Subcommittee's permission I would like to make my brief a part of the record of this hearing. Although I do not propose to describe the reasons for my view in detail in this statement, I would be happy to answer any questions the Subcommittee members may have about the arguments.

I should say that my views on what had to be proved before Mobile are borne out, to my way of thinking, by my actual experiences in litigating voting discrimination cases over the past eight years. By my count, I filed approximately ten cases in Georgia during this eriod, as well as one case in Alabama, not counting four cases in which I was co-counsel with others. I would like to share my experiences in those cases with the Subcommittee, because I believe that experience is directly relevant in assessing the proposed amendment to section 2.

Overall, I would like to make several principal points, and I will try to illustrate them with specific discussions of some of the cases. First, there was never any notion, either one expressed by any court or by any of the defendants' counsel, that we had to prove discriminatory intent. Second, these were all arduous cases because notwithstanding the absence of any requirement of intent, what we did have to prove was not easy. We were required to prove essentially that the electoral system in the particular county or city, taken in the totality of circumstances, shut minority voters out of a fair opportunity to participate--that is important, there was never any aspect to our claims of any guarantee of a particular result (much less a result of proportional representation); it was opportunity. And if any of the Subcommittee members would actually go and look at some of these places, they would see that it is really pretty irrelevant to talk about claims of proportional representation; just as it is also pretty irrelevant to talk about any realistic opportunity within the existing electoral system because black voters had always been shut out, pure and simple. Even though the proof was arduous, it was at least possible in those places that really fit that description; in contrast, the intent test of Mobile is not only well-nigh impossible unless there are very fortuitous circumstances, but it also goes after a fact that I think has very little relevance in considering whether a particular system is discriminating today.

A third factor is that it was clear the standard would not be met in very many places, so the fears I have heard expressed about an all-out assault on election systems everywhere do not seem to have any foundation in fact or experience.

In contrast, I have learned some lessons since Mobile too. One lesson I have learned is not to file a dilution suit without smoking gun evidence, and in fact I have not filed a dilution case since Mobile. Lodge v. Buxton does not weaken that severe lesson, and I will be happy to discuss with the Subcommittee my reasons for thinking so.

The starting point for the position I take is that the most fundamental right we have is the right to vote. It holds our entire system of government together, and maybe more importantly, it provides the very legitimacy upon which the government is founded. Where the election mechanisms themselves are fundamentally unfair and operate to discriminate on the basis of race, the government does not have the legitimate claim to govern under our democratic principles. Whether these discriminatory practices have been adopted or retained with the specific intent to discriminate, or whether they are the results of negligence, political self-protection, ignorance, or whatever other reason there might be, is simply irrelevant.

The very basis of the United States, and our sole claim to historical significance, is the promise that our government will affirmatively seek to maintain a true democracy on behalf of all citizens. We live on the promise that we will make our government open to all people, and not that we will allow the callous exclusion of people who may be powerless to come in because the electoral system operates to keep them out.

[Whereupon, at 12:41 p.m. the subcommittee recessed, to reconvene at the call of the Chair.]

VOTING RIGHTS ACT

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 2, 1982

U.S. SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE ON THE CONSTITUTION,
COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY
Washington, D.C.

The subcommittee met, pursuant to recess, at 1:40 p.m., in room 2228, Dirksen Senate Office Building, Senator Orrin G. Hatch (chairman of the subcommittee) presiding.

Present: Senators Thurmond, Metzenbaum, and East.

Staff present: Stephen Markman, chief counsel; William Lucius, counsel; Dennis Shedd, counsel; Claire Greif, clerk; and Prof. Laurens Walker.

OPENING STATEMENT OF HON. ORRIN G. HATCH, A U.S. SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF UTAH, CHAIRMAN, SUBCOMMITTEE ON THE CONSTITUTION

Senator HATCH. Ladies and gentlemen, this marks the 4th day of hearings by the Subcommittee on the Constitution on the Voting Rights Act. The subject of today's hearings will be section 2 of the Voting Rights Act, although it is fair to say that this has also been the focus of discussion of the first 3 days of hearings as well. I am confident that we will be exploring the proposed "bailout" provisions of the House legislation as well as other provisions of existing law in substantially greater detail during future hearing days.

There has been a great deal of discussion during the first 3 days of hearings about what the Supreme Court and other Federal courts have had to say about the intent/effect issue in the past. We have debated White v. Regester, Arlington Heights, Washington v. Davis, Feeney v. Massachusetts, Mobile v. Bolden, and other cases. Far more than most hearings, even Judiciary Committee hearings, we have devoted time to trying to understand and distinguish these cases.

We have explored these decisions primarily as I see it in order to determine the extent to which the Mobile decision reflected a departure in the existing law. In my view and in the view of a number of our witnesses, including the Attorney General of the United States, the Mobile decision restated previous law. This was the view, of course, of the Supreme Court as well and that is a pretty good authority. According to this view, intent or purpose has always been an indispensable element of 15th amendment discrimination just as it has always been an indispensable element of 14th amendment equal protection violations.

Other witnesses and some of my colleagues on this committee see Mobile as a reversal of existing law. By this view, courts prior to Mobile identified constitutional civil rights violations on the basis of some effects or results test.

What most witnesses do seem to agree upon is that the Mobile decision is the present law. Whether or not to overturn this law as well as whether or not such a constitutional ruling can be overturned by a simple statute are the basic issues involved in the Voting Rights Act debate.

While I believe that these hearings thus far have proven extremely informative and that they insure the development of a thoroughgoing record on section 2, I would hope that today's and Thursday's hearings would begin to focus more upon the substantive merit or lack of merit of the proposed results test.

As far as the state of the law prior to Mobile, I believe that most members of this committee are familiar with the arguments that have been suggested during these hearings. I would hope that my colleagues as well as interested members of the public and the media might make some effort to disclose the major court decisions that have been discussed here in order to make up their own minds.

I believe, however, that we do a disservice to this debate, whatever one's perspective on the issues, if we lose sight of the forest for the trees. From my own perspective I would oppose the results test and I would oppose overturning the Mobile decision, whatever the state of the law 5, 10, or 50 years ago. I would guess that proponents of the results test would feel similarly.

Several of the issues or questions that I would hope to explore in some detail over the next 2 days of hearings are: What precisely is the results test? How does it differ from the effects test in section 5 of the Voting Rights Act? How does a court identify violations of the results test? How does a community know when it is in violation of this so-called results test? What is the impact of the so-called objective factors of discrimination discussed in the House report?

With respect to the overriding issue here, the issue of proportional representation by race, I would hope that we could explore both problems of definition and of substance. How is it that there can be such a fundamental difference on the issue of proportional representation? To restate the issue, does the results test inevitably move us in the direction of reevaluating election laws and procedures on the basis of whether or not such laws and procedures move us in the direction of proportional representation?

The issue is not whether or not pure proportional representation will be achieved overnight. It is whether or not future courts and future Justice Departments will look into the proportional representation as the standard against which all electoral and voting practices are assessed. If such a practice does not at least move a jurisdiction in the direction of proportional representation, I believe that it will be constitutionally and legally suspect.

During the debate on this subject, I hope that we would all bear in mind that the burden of proof is upon those who propose to change the current law. The burden is upon such individuals to demonstrate that their proposed alterations in the law would represent improvements in the law.

Ladies and gentlemen, I do look forward to each of our witnesses today and I would anticipate that each of them would assist the committee in trying to understand more thoroughly the impact of the proposed new section 2 standard.

I might mention that I personally am a strong supporter of civil rights and I believe that we should do everything in our power to see that the civil rights laws are enforced in this country because there is no reason for anybody's civil rights to be violated, and certainly there is no reason for any violation of constitutional civil rights. However, this issue on section 2, as well as some other issues in this matter, is one of the most important constitutional issues of our time. Unfortunately, I don't think it is being explained except in this committee, and I encourage those who are interested and those who have the obligation to explain it to explain both sides of this issue and not just one side.

I notice that Senator Metzenbaum is here and we will turn to Senator Metzenbaum.

OPENING STATEMENT OF HON. HOWARD METZENBAUM, A U.S. SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF OHIO

Senator METZENBAUM. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I would like to commend you for moving the hearings forward. I know that you have been very diligent in giving those who wish to be heard an opportunity to be heard, and for that I certainly have nothing but great words of praise.

Senator HATCH. Thank you, Senator.

Senator METZENBAUM. I also recognize that well-intentioned people can come to a different conclusion with respect to the issue of intent or the results test, and I am also aware of the fact that nobody as such is against civil rights. It is a question of what the bottom line is and how you come out.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that the overriding concern that many of us have, at least this Senator has, is that this very, very important issue although fully heard, fully discussed before the hearings—fair hearings and plenty of them—may take us down a road to the point where we have to legislate under the pressure of a time limitation.

As I have mentioned to you personally before, so this is not a new question, does the chairman have any idea as to when the subcommittee might be acting on this particular matter so that it could be before the full committee for an adequate period of time, to provide the entire committee an opportunity to act on it and so it will have adequate time on the floor of the Senate? As you well know, around here time flies very rapidly.

Senator HATCH. The last day of hearings will be on the 25th of this month so I am hopeful that shortly before or shortly after the end of this month we will hold a subcommittee markup on this bill. I presume that it would take us a little more time after that and then it would come to the full Judiciary Committee. I am hopeful that before the end of March this matter will be marked up in both this committee and the full committee.

Senator METZENBAUM. I thank the Chair.

Senator HATCH. I can't guarantee that, I am just saying that is my goal.

Senator METZENBAUM. Well, as I said to you, I think reasonable people can come to different conclusions on this subject. I think all of us agree that we ought to move it forward as soon as possible, and I think the administration feels the same way. I know we on the minority side are prepared to work with you to expedite the process.

Senator HATCH. Well, I think we are trying to do that. We will need some time to prepare the committee report on this matter. It is not simple, as you so well have articulated, but I intend to accomplish it as expeditiously as we can without failing to do the thorough job that needs to be done.

Senator METZENBAUM. Might I suggest to the Chair that the staff might start to think about and start work on the preparation of the report because I don't think there are going to be any shocking developments between now and the time that we actually vote on it. I would urge that the staff be so instructed, including the minority staff, because I don't know what the votes will be in the subcommittee. I haven't counted them, but I have my own opinion.

Senator HATCH. Yes. One of the problems that we are faced with in preparing a report, and one of the problems we are trying to face here in this subcommittee in these 9 days of hearings, is that they hardly looked at section 2 in the House, yet almost everybody here has admitted that section 2 is the most important issue to be considered. I find it somewhat astonishing that since everyone here admits that section 2 is the real issue and that it is a very real important constitutional issue, that they spent little, if any, time on that particular issue in the House. For that reason we will have to listen to the rest of these witnesses. I suspect by the 25th we will have concluded our last hearing; at least I hope so.

We do have some complications there. As you know, if the Williams matter comes up on the 23d as is anticipated, they have asked that we hold no hearings during that period of time. If that happens, we may have to postpone the last hearing until after the Williams matter is disposed of. I still think we may have time in the morning to hold the hearing on the 25th or those hearings that would conflict with the Williams schedule. We will see what we can do to keep this series of hearings on a nice steady course. I am determined to do that.

I believe in an extension of this bill. The question is, as we have been debating here, in what form should that extension take place? If I had my way, it would be a simple extension of the present law, which everybody until 2 or 3 months ago indicated was a perfectly fine law, one that worked well, and probably was and is the most important Civil Rights Act ever enacted.

Be that as it may, we have had a legitimate and productive public debate on this issue. I think that is what is taking place here, and I think it is good for everybody concerned.

Senator METZENBAUM. If we find that the Williams debate is going to interfere, I would respectfully suggest to the Chair that we meet early in the morning. I would say to the Chair that, if he so decides, I would pledge to him that I would make every possible effort to be here at whatever time he schedules the hearings.

Senator HATCH. Well, we certainly appreciate our distinguished Senator from Ohio's position on that. I am grateful to you for bringing these matters up. We will certainly continue to try to push this along. We realize there is a time constraint and I personally don't want to approach that time constraint. It may take longer than March because of reports and conflicts, but I think that we will have this done expeditiously.

Are there any other Senators here?

[No response.]

Senator HATCH. Our first witness then will be Dr. John Bunzel, a senior fellow at the Hoover Institution at Stanford University in California. Dr. Bunzel is the former dean of San Jose State University in California and has written extensively on civil rights, including the Voting Rights Act. I might add that he has written extensively on what he calls the egalitarian revolution.

Dr. Bunzel has been an active Democrat most of his life, I understand, and in spite of that, Dr. Bunzel, I as a Republican, welcome you to this committee. We are very happy to have you here. You have been an eloquent witness on matters in the past. We will very strongly look forward to your testimony here today.

STATEMENT OF PROF. JOHN BUNZEL, THE HOOVER INSTITUTION, STANFORD UNIVERSITY

Mr. BUNZEL. I thank the Chairman very much. I would only make two corrections to his generous comments. I was not the dean at San Jose State. Some wished I had been. I was the president.

Senator HATCH. That is what I thought. My staff wrote down "dean" but, as I recall from a prior session, you were the president.

Mr. BUNZEL. Some feel that the jobs are really interchangeable.

Senator HATCH. I am just very happy that San Jose State is still active and strong.

Mr. BUNZEL. Yes. We have had a very good football season. Thank you very much, Senator. [Laughter.]

The other point I would like to make is that while I have participated as an administrator and as one who has sought to reflect on my experiences, and have also written somewhat on matters of equality, I have only recently become interested and begun to write on the Voting Rights Act.

I should point out to both you and Senator Metzenbaum and others that I am not a lawyer so I am going to be looking at forests rather than trees.

Senator HATCH. Right. We appreciate that.

Mr. BUNZEL. I deal with lawyers. I have dealt with them for a long time but I know you have also had people here who know the intricacies of the law and you will have other witnesses.

You mentioned the fact that——

Senator HATCH. Dr. Bunzel, what we are going to do here is have what is called a 10-minute rule. We would like all witnesses to summarize their testimony. Your full written testimony will be placed in the record at the conclusion of your oral remarks.

Again, I am encouraging witnesses to get their statements in by 5 the night before. That is cutting 2 days off the committee requirement. However, in the future, just so everybody understands, I don't know if we are going to allow a witness to testify who doesn't get his statement in by at least by 5 the evening before because we just can't make it otherwise. If this issue is this important, we want the statements in so the full committee can analyze them. This applies to all witnesses.

When Ms. Greif presses this button, the green light comes on. You have 10 minutes. When the yellow light comes on, you have 1 minute. The red light means you should stop and let us ask you some questions.

Senator METZENBAUM. If you are 1 minute over the place explodes. [Laughter.]

Senator HATCH. Well, Senator Metzenbaum explodes. That is the problem. [Laughter.]

Or should I say Senator Kennedy does, after yesterday.

Mr. BUNZEL. Well, I will look for the fireworks. I am looking forward to it.

You mentioned the fact, Mr. Chairman, that I was a Democrat and have been most of my adult life. I must say that one of the reasons that I have come before this committee is that a number of my colleagues and friends in the Democratic Party and in the civil rights movement, with which I was most active before I became a university administrator and had to become neutral on these matters, have taken what I have considered to be a very unfortunate position with regard to my coming here or some of the things that I hope to say.

Senator HATCH. What do you mean by that?

Mr. BUNZEL. Well, I mean that it has been suggested to me that this particular bill, the Voting Rights Act as it has come out of the House—and now I am quoting a friend of mine—"is our turf and that you really should be with us on this and stop throwing up dust in terms of other kinds of considerations."

"Did you know," I was told, "this bill passed through the House overwhelmingly?" And I said, "Yes, I did."

Senator HATCH. The House does a lot of that, you know. They throw insufficiently researched bills over here and expect us to do the cleanup.

Mr. BUNZEL. Well, I have since discovered that there really hasn't been a serious page of discussion and analysis of section 2, for example.

Senator HATCH. That's right.

Mr. BUNZEL. That disturbs me because one of the propositions which I hold dear—and it is a point which Senator Metzenbaum made for many of us who belong to his party—is that one can have many differences of opinion about matters having to do, say, in this case with the Voting Rights Act and have some concerns about language that has been added and in no sense diminish one's commitment to civil rights.

Senator HATCH. That is right.

Mr. BUNZEL. When I was an administrator I found myself, for example, very supportive of affirmative action in terms of its original goals and its purposes, but as it developed I became very discouraged by the notion that we were moving, without any legislative intent, support, or language in the Civil Rights Act, to a proposition that was transforming equality of opportunity into something that became equality of results.

I also discovered firsthand experiences which led me to believe that people now, having defined discrimination by some numbers standard, were saying in effect what we need to do now when we are looking, say, for faculty is not to find the best qualified person but to give preferential treatment on the basis of race or sex and that we should, in fact, as many members on the departments on the faculty believe, set aside certain positions for those based in terms of one group or another.

I find that whole argument repugnant. It goes back to my earliest days when my values of civil rights were honed by members of the Democratic Party and others—I think of Hubert Humphrey among a long line of people.

I take very seriously the general ethic that individuals should be treated as individuals irrespective of their origins, sex, and background. I find very difficult, therefore, part of what I see now as a trend in the Voting Rights Act which would tend to raise questions about whether or not we are moving more in the direction of making race and politics so mixed that the results will become more important, particularly if this leads to block voting or if this leads to competition that is no longer to be open between white and black candidates. I find this very difficult, and I am sympathetic to the "intent-effects" distinction that has been drawn by the Supreme Court. Indeed, the Bolden case is one which I find of paramount importance, again in terms of my own values, and which I would hope this committee would be able to support and to defend.

I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that there are so many difficulties with respect to the bill that came out of the House that it seems perhaps useful to state some of those problems by asking the committee, perhaps for the umpteenth time, if it would address some of the questions which seem to me to be necessary to raise.

I would like to know, because I can't find it clearly stated, what the defining principle in the Voting Rights Act would be that would clearly establish when the opportunity of blacks and Hispanics to register and to vote has been reduced.

"Can the value of a person's vote be diluted without a standard of reference as to what a full vote should be worth?" I am quoting Justice Frankfurter in Baker v. Carr.

If the voting strength of black citizens is to be protected against dilution, will there be some specification in the act of what full strength means?

A different kind of question but very much related to this is, if blacks are mostly Democrats in, say, a predominantly Republican county, is their vote to be considered diluted when a black candidate loses, even when it is agreed by everyone that race had nothing to do with it?

Is it the intention of Congress that the Voting Rights Act should now carry the message that at-large voting deprives blacks or Hispanics of a voice in the electoral process?

Under what conditions and for what kinds of reasons should district lines be drawn that will insure that black candidates will not face competition from white competitors?

If a city believes that it would benefit economically from expansion, and if it passes an annexation ordinance in which racial considerations played no part, does the fact that there was a proportionate drop in the black population provide prima facie evidence of discriminatory impact? Does even a small reduction justify the imposition of ward voting?

Is the original commitment of the Voting Rights Act to a nondiscriminatory electoral process now to be changed to a standard which implies a commitment to maximum legislative seats held by blacks?

There are many other kinds of questions. These to me are by no means definitive but they are suggestive. I find the debate over the Voting Rights Act frequently echoed by a familiar statement which Stokely Carmichael made in another context years ago, a rather facile distinction: If you are not actively with us, you are actively against us. I don't think that is satisfactory in this instance.

Those who have been long-time supporters of the Voting Rights Act, and I count myself in that large company, are not now, Mr. Chairman, in retreat because we are troubled by the efforts of some of the sponsors of a new extension to redefine in a major way the meaning and direction of "equal electoral opportunity" by creating an artificial mix of race and politics.

I don't think these people are friends who have suddenly become enemies merely because they contend that the other side has the burden of proving that the court's emphasis on racially discriminatory intent should be repudiated; or because they reject the notion that a person's voting behavior reflects a single dominating interest such as race or ethnicity; or that elected officials of one race cannot represent the interests of another; or because they wonder why 30 percent influence over three representatives who are white may not be worth more than 90 percent influence over one who is black.

The measure of their continuing commitment to the Voting Rights Act is that they would not want to see this goal transformed into a policy that, in the words of perhaps this country's most knowledgeable student of the Voting Rights Act, Abigail Thernstrom, has called a color-coordinated politics, the color of the candidate unfailingly matching the color of his constituency, which would make proportional racial and ethnic representation the true test of voting effectiveness and political equality.

These are men and women who do not wish, Mr. Chairman, to support those whose actions would increase the already pronounced trend to politicize and racialize more and more aspects of American life. They believe that the equal protection clause means, among other things, that white and black voters are equal when their opportunities to register and vote are equal.

They would not lend their weight to any cause that would foster race consciousness, that would perpetuate stereotypical thinking, or deepen the tensions, fragmentation, and outright resentment among racial groups, thus exacerbating the tendency to identify and then to judge persons on the basis of the racial group to which they belong.

Some of us are old enough to remember when the great fight facing civil rights leaders and civil libertarians in this country was to remove, for example, any references to a person's religion, race, or color from admission forms to universities because anything to do with group origins, background, and national origin was offensive to those who were a part of the civil rights struggle. I find that those values today are equally important and just as compelling.

These are the values, I might add, that lead me to accept the principle that is embedded, I believe in both the Civil and Voting Rights Acts, namely, that in a democratic society an individual's worth has a much higher moral claim than his color, his sex, and his origin.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator HATCH. Well, thank you, Professor. Is it your opinion that as the Voting Rights Act has evolved its goal in 1982 is different from its goal in 1965?

Mr. BUNZEL. Yes. I find myself troubled by the change in language that has been part of the House-passed bill. I have looked as hard as I can for some indication that when Congress passed the Voting Rights Act it had anything but an intent standard in mind. I believe that it is generally agreed that the purpose of the Voting Rights Act was to make certain that blacks, for example, who had been disenfranchised by white racist discrimination would no longer persist, and, indeed, that there would be movement toward an integrated political process.

Those of us who were actively in support of the act found this reflecting our own deepest commitments and concerns. Now I worry that the Voting Rights Act, as amended by the House, would change the standard from an intent or purposeful discriminatory standard to something that suggests a results test, and, even more disturbing to me, is a results test that would lead to more rather than less emphasis on proportional representation.

Those who wish to change, Mr. Chairman—and this is quite an irony—it seems to me that those who wish to change the language of section 2 deny that they intend to support the idea of proportionate representation, but the change they want has that effect or result.

I believe that while I am in no position to get inside their heads, and I am in no position whatsoever to point to a smoking gun, I think there are some indications nevertheless that proportional representation for minorities is a likely direction and outcome. After all, they are the ones who are proposing this new language and, at the very least, there is now confusion and ambiguity. This is clearly one of the reasons why this committee is holding these hearings.

If the intent standard is now to be considered insubstantial or insufficient, how are the results to be measured? One inference is the dilution of the potential numerical strength of a minority voting block.

I would find one clear way, Mr. Chairman, for this body, this committee, the Senate, and ultimately the Congress to clear the air on all of these questions—namely, in my own preference to leave the language of section 2 as it is with the presumption of intention to discriminate intact and understood.

I think, furthermore, the Senate could remove the suspicions of moving to a right to proportional representation as a remedy by making some unambiguous declaration that the legislative purpose of the Voting Rights Act resolves to avoid proportional representation. This is what the Supreme Court has resolved in the Bolden case.

If the voting rights act, as extended, seeks to overrule Bolden, I think it will signal a different and rather mischievous message.

There are some points that I think need clarification, if I may be specific for a moment.

Senator HATCH. Go ahead.

Mr. BUNZEL. The Voting Rights Act originally enunciated the ethic of equal access to the ballot box; that is to say, a political process that was to be integrated. Now one wonders if the intent and the goal is a political process equally open to blacks and Hispanics that will produce proportionate results in some form of racial proportionality.

If this is not intended, why does the House-passed bill want to restore the pre-Bolden understanding of the proper legal standing which focuses on the result and consequences of an allegedly discriminatory voting or electoral practice rather than the intent or motivation behind it? The courts will then be able to infer, I am afraid, that proportionate representation based on race can be sanctioned. I would have very serious reservations about signaling a message of this kind either to the Department of Justice or to any of the courts.

What does "effect" as a standard mean or, indeed, what does effect as a standard imply? I think the Voting Rights Act should leave no doubt that equal access does not mean equal results. It was never intended to mean equal results. There is no such language in the Civil Rights Act that would suggest anything parallel to that. There is no such language in the Voting Rights Act itself.

I think the Senate, Mr. Chairman, should leave no doubt that the right to vote does not mean in some unspecified way the right to an effective vote, with the effectiveness of that vote measured in terms of a group's rather than an individual's vote.

Here, again, I would suggest a parallel with what has happened in the whole debate on affirmative action because I think what we have found here is a great reversal. I think we now find, not because the Civil Rights Act intended it so but because other agencies of the Government have now moved to a point where discrimination has been redefined—and discrimination used to mean "without regard to race, creed, or color"—it now has the connotation, and in many important respects the practice, of suggesting that if there aren't sufficient numbers, then the burden shifts to an employer or to a university to prove they have not been discriminating.

Originally, Mr. Chairman, the Voting Rights Act was clear that it was directed to remedying disfranchisement. Now there is considerable talk of dilution. Again, this parallels the language of the new equality in affirmative action, where proportionate results have become the test of discrimination.

I don't think that this committee or the Senate or the Voting Rights Act itself can address these questions and resolve them unless it talks specifically to what it believes minorities are entitled to. It should not leave this to the Department of Justice or the courts to decide. I believe it must also come to some understanding as to what it means by equal electoral opportunity.

The "effects" standard, I am afraid, leaves the inference that the individual principle of one-person-one-vote can be transformed into a group principle, and not all groups but racial group claims. That gives me considerable pause.

I think that the Voting Rights Act would clear the air by stating, as Edward Elder observed here, that dilution measured in terms of racial proportionality is not the constitutional equivalent of disfranchisement.

If there is no proof of discriminatory intent, proportionality, I am afraid, will become further embedded in our political and electoral language, with equal access less controlling than equal outcomes, and those outcomes to be based on race.

I say again, Mr. Chairman, that I think that the Voting Rights Act—since there is this confusion and since there are now questions dangling out there like participles—it should leave no doubt that it does not subscribe to the notion that every political group, or at least every such group that is in the minority, has a Federal constitutional right to elect candidates in proportion to its number.

Senator HATCH. Professor Bunzel, the House report on H.R. 3112 states on page 30,

> It would be illegal for an at-large election scheme for a particular State or local body to permit a block voting majority over a substantial period of time consistently to defeat minority candidates or candidates identified with the interest of a racial or language minority.

How would we be able to determine whether a candidate was "identified with the interests of a racial or language minority"?

Mr. BUNZEL. Well, that is one of the real problems. I think that it would be very difficult to try to establish this. I think, if one did try, one would run into some very serious problems that go to fundamental premises.

One of the difficulties with the whole notion of looking for an "effects" or a "disparate impact" test is that the result tends to make us work our way back to the primacy of race as the criterion by which we determine whether or not there has been equal opportunity or equal treatment. Many of us feel very strongly that there is no real reason to assume—and I would give you as the most clear example one from the State from which I come, California—to believe that the voters of that State are motivated exclusively by race or color in what is now the 80-percent endorsement of the people for Mayor Bradley of Los Angeles as a Democratic candidate for Governor.

I think, were he to appear before this committee, he would be the first to tell you that he does not come before this committee or before the people of California as a black candidate. Of course, he is black and everyone knows this, and one is not proposing for one moment that this is not an important point in our history, but he has been able to build his success—and this is not simply a local story—based on the notion of coalition politics.

If we begin to isolate districts, if we begin to move to the notion that certain districts are based squarely on a number in proportion to their own color, then I think we are moving further toward a polarization. I believe that that is neither healthy for what we want in this country nor in keeping with the Voting Rights Act's original purpose.

Senator HATCH. What is the defining principle for discrimination under the Voting Rights Act?

Mr. BUNZEL. I think it was very clear. It was to remove all obstacles to voting and registration that were based on race; it was to make certain that every individual had an equal right to vote and to register; that race and all of the obstacles which the white racist structure in the South had been practicing for years was no longer to obtain; and, furthermore, that these particular concerns were very much in keeping with the implicit and explicitly stated notion that the consequence of this would be not a fragmentation but a political process that would be both more equal in terms of participation but also moving us toward an integrated society.

Senator HATCH. Can you elaborate on your statements with respect to "color coordinated politics"?

Mr. BUNZEL. What I am beginning to see, and what I am worried about, is the kind of view that suggests that only blacks can represent blacks, only whites can represent whites, and only Hispanics can represent Hispanics. While there may be some exceptions to this, the argument goes on: We need to bring about an equality of representation based on color and that what is really important for so many people, the argument goes on, is to understand that there are certain kinds of interests that only those of a certain color or background can represent fully. I don't know what "fully" means and, further, I don't believe in the proposition that only those of a certain background, group, or color can represent that particular group or color.

Senator HATCH. Thank you, Doctor. Can you wait? I have to vote so we will have a short recess until we return. If Senator Thurmond returns, I will instruct the staff to ask him to start the questioning, or if Senator Metzenbaum returns first he may start it, whichever the case may be. Please wait for us. We will recess for about 10 minutes. Thank you.

[Recess taken.]

Senator HATCH. We will call the subcommittee to order again.

Dr. Bunzel, it looks as though neither Senator Thurmond nor Senator Metzenbaum is here. If they come, I will call you back. Therefore, please wait just a little while longer.

Mr. BUNZEL. I will be here for another half hour or so, Mr. Chairman. I have another commitment.

Senator HATCH. If you have to leave, we will understand. They understand, too.

Mr. BUNZEL. Thank you.

Senator HATCH. Let me ask you one more question, though, in the interest perhaps of getting just a little more information from you.

As you know, the amended version of section 2 in S. 1992 contains a disclaimer provision with respect to proportional representation. In your opinion, what is the effect of this disclaimer language?

Mr. BUNZEL. I think that what is being disclaimed here is honest in its intent, at least I would make that presumption. But I also think that it is very likely something of a sleeper.

One of the difficulties here in the changing of the language from an abridgement of the right to vote to language that talks about the results and the effects is that it opens up the possibility for a variety of searches for all kinds of evidence that would show discrimination. I think, as I try to suggest elsewhere, that if one, for example, were to look at the fact that in a State such as New Jersey, let us say, if blacks register less in number than whites, this is the kind of thing that might open the door for the kind of conclusion that this is that scintilla of evidence that would suggest there is discrimination.

I am afraid that what the disclaimer suggests when it says "in and of itself," what it really opens the door to, is the possibility of being able to show that a variety of other factors can make it possible to make a violation stick. If you could show, for example, that there has been a history of low minority participation or if there has been a malproportion of financial services, or moneys to education, or whatever, then this would be interpreted to show that there has been discrimination.

The standard of discrimination becomes more elastic. As the standard becomes more elastic, then one moves much more quickly to a standard that suggests that there has been discrimination, and discrimination is no longer one of whether it is purposely intended. It simply suggests that there has been an impact on a particular group and that impact may have very little to do with race whatsoever.

Senator HATCH. One of the witnesses said that lack of proportional representation plus any additional scintilla of evidence amounts to a section 2 violation under the proposed legislation.

Mr. BUNZEL. Well, I am afraid that is rather simplistic. I am not as prepared to argue in these kinds of rather morally absolutist terms.

There are districts in the South. There are districts elsewhere around the country. We would find all kinds of lawsuits, I think, coming in all manner of form and shape in the States around the country if we moved to an effects test which was based on disparate results.

I find, for example, that if a particular city in the South, having no reason whatsoever based on race, wants to extend its population or to annex itself for financial purposes because it needs a larger tax base, these are legitimate reasons. They do not show intent to discriminate.

If the result is to reduce the voting population in that district of blacks from 52 percent to 46 percent, I am afraid that the "effects" test, and those who would want to push it—and a Justice Department that might be sympathetic—would be able to show that this again has something to do with race, and, therefore, the reason for annexation would be secondary to the concern of race.

Senator HATCH. When this professor said the lack of proportional representation plus a scintilla of evidence would equal a section 2 violation under the House bill, he defined "scintilla of evidence" as to include at-large voting, block voting, reregistration requirements, impediments to independent voting, economic disparities relating to registration process, limits on singleshot voting, majority vote requirement, registration disparities, et cetera, et cetera. In other words, what he meant was that if you can show that there is a lack of proportional representation plus any one of those additional institutional factors, then you have a section 2 violation. I happen to agree with that interpretation.

Mr. BUNZEL. I see. I misunderstood your question.

Senator HATCH. Yes. I thought maybe you had.

Mr. BUNZEL. Yes.

Senator HATCH. Would you agree with that as well——

Mr. BUNZEL. Yes.

Senator HATCH [continuing]. The way this present bill is written?

Mr. BUNZEL. I am afraid that is true.

Senator HATCH. Therefore, what the bill really comes down to is an effects test obviating the necessity of showing any kind of intent.

Mr. BUNZEL. I am afraid that one of the reasons that I find the statutory direction and the language in the Voting Rights Act very discouraging is that it is moving in an increasingly different direction from what is now the court test of the constitutional document.

I keep coming back to the proposition that in order for this committee and for the Voting Rights Act itself to clarify precisely in what direction it intends to move, it will have to determine—and I believe it is the responsibility of the Congress to determine—what kinds of entitlements minorities have politically.

What does it mean, for example, for the black population of a State such as Texas, in some counties in Texas, where blacks themselves have objected strongly to having an arrangement made where they will have a considerable percentage of the vote in one district rather than in three? They have, interestingly enough, wanted to have representation that would be competitive, controlling, and influential over whites in three or four districts rather than settling for one.

The Hispanics in southern California and throughout the State of California, and indeed in many other parts of the country, are also less interested because they are far more scattered. They are not as homogeneous. They would not be very receptive to the notion that we should polarize and draw district lines based on color.

Senator HATCH. Well, thank you, Dr. Bunzel. We appreciate your testimony and the effort you have made in coming here to testify before this committee.

Mr. BUNZEL. Thank you. It is nice to see you again.

Senator HATCH. Thank you so much. It is nice to see you.

Without objection, your entire statement will be inserted into the hearing record.

[The prepared statement of Mr. Bunzel follows:]

Prepared Statement of John H. Bunzel*

A funny thing happened on the way to the hearing today. I was struck by a case of déjà vu.

During the 1960s I was an early and vigorous supporter of the Civil Rights Act because it spoke eloquently to the proposition that discrimination against anyone must be eliminated and that employment opportunities were to be independent of race, color, religion, sex or national origin. In the 1970s, when I was in my former life as a university administrator, I supported the principle that all contractors with the government, including colleges and universities, should take affirmative action to eliminate employment discrimination against women and minorities. Executive Order 11246 also prohibited "discrimination-because of. . .", commanded equal treatment "without-regard-to. . .", and required positive measures to eliminate the one and accomplish the other. Soon, however, affirmative action was transformed into a policy that endorsed and encouraged racially preferential treatment and fostered a "numbers definition" of discrimination that redefined equality of opportunity not as "equal rights for all" but as some form of group proportional equality.

I was not alone in feeling caught in the winds of a great reversal. The long-standing principle of individual achievement had been subordinated to the new principle of (really an old and discredited principle) group identity. Yet I can remember when it was believed to be unjust to bar an individual from a university or a job because of the particular group to which he or she belonged - indeed, that was the meaning of discrimination. Furthermore, millions of Americans have long been dedicated to creating a society in which distinctions based on race will be eradicated.

Today we have reached a point where there is no clear agreement about what constitutes discrimination. We are repeatedly told that the prohibition against discrimination means that men and women should receive "equal treatment", but what kind of treatment is "equal" remains a matter of dispute. At one time discrimination turned on whether or not an employer took racial considerations into account in making employment decisions - "intentional discrimination on the basis of race." Now "discrimination" can take place even if the employer does not intend to discriminate in this way. The new test is whether an employer's hiring procedure (or a university's admissions policy) has an "adverse impact" on certain (but not all) minority groups. In other words, if the effect is disproportionately to disadvantage blacks as against whites, the burden to prove good behavior shifts to the employer (or the campus) to show that it is not guilty of discriminating on grounds of race, reversing the ordinary requirements of legal procedure. I should add that there is nothing in the record to show that Congress has set the direction or given its legislative approval for replacing the principle of equality of opportunity with the principle of equality of results. That was certainly never intended to be the consequence of the Civil Rights Act.

Now the Senate is considering an extension of the Voting Rights Act of 1965, which has already been extended and expanded in 1970 and 1975. But, once again, there are proposed changes in the air that are disturbing - disturbing, I want to emphasize, to many liberals, conservatives, Democrats, Republicans, the labels are unimportant, who were strong backers of the landmark law (and would like to see it extended) because its permanent accomplishment was that by eliminating discrimination, it provided blacks and other minorities equal access to the voting process by securing the ballot. They believe in the fundamental premise of the Voting Rights Act - that equal political opportunity for all requires that everyone be counted for one and no one for more than one. Its passage, in fact, was a political revolution.

One of the major changes is in the House-passed Voting Rights bill, which seeks to overturn the "intent-effects" distinction drawn by the U.S. Supreme Court. (I recently discussed this issue briefly in the Los Angeles Times (January 21, 1982) and am taking the liberty of re-stating some of those comments and concerns here.) Section 2 of the Act, which is applicable nationwide, is a statutory codification of the 15th Amendment that protects all citizens from having their right to vote denied or abridged on the basis of race or color. It has traditionally been understood to mean - and was reaffirmed by the Supreme Court in 1980 in City of Mobile v. Bolden - that a violation requires a demonstration of intention or a discriminatory purpose. The Court has also ruled that only if there is "purposeful discrimination" can there be a violation of the Equal Protection Clause of the 14th Amendment.

H.R. 3112 changes the standard of proof for Section 2 lawsuits by eliminating the requirement that an electoral jurisdiction has intentionally discriminated in voting laws. Instead, it need only act "in a manner that results in a denial or abridgment" of voting rights. The House proposes a standard for identifying discrimination that looks to the racial "effects" or "disparate impact" of some particular action on blacks or other minorities rather than on whether or not the action was undertaken for an illegal purpose. It would go beyond the standard of Section 5 that covers specified jurisdictions with histories of electoral discrmination (mostly in the South) and that bans all election practices - gerrymandering election districts, for example - which prevent minorities from enhancing their political power. H.R. 3112 would change the right of minorities to vote to an effective right to vote. In short, blacks and Hispanics should not only have the right to select black and Hispanic candidates - an unarguable right - but blacks should have the maximum political opportunity to be represented by blacks and Hispanics by Hispanics.

The presumption is that minorities will be able to increase their political strength and influence only if Congress changes Section 2 of the Voting Rights Act so that blacks and Hispanics have more than equal access to the ballot box. They must somehow be assured of equal electoral results. The center of concern would move from eliminating racially motivated discrimination in the voting process to endorsing a theory of group representation that would push our politics closer to institutionalizing a system of single-member districts and racial bloc voting. This, it is claimed, is the only way to make sure that the black or Hispanic vote is not diluted and that every ethnic group is "fully represented." What worries many observers is that it is only a short step to sanctioning the concept of proportional racial and ethnic representation.

Thus, as the American Jewish Congress' Nathan Z. Dershowitz and Marc D. Stern point out, a law designed to guarantee full minority participation in the democratic process can also undermine a major tenet of that process - majority rule. "What is worse, it does so by insisting that racial considerations be used to dictate election results."

It is in this light that one must weigh carefully the implications of new language in H.R. 3112, which states that the fact that members of a minority group have not been elected "in numbers equal to the group's proportion of the population" shall not constitute a violation of Section 2 "in and of itself." That is the key phrase - and the "sleeper." It recalls to mind the difference between quotas and goals in affirmative action. Proportional representation may be wrong, but the "effects" test is said to be right and necessary in much the same way that engaging in racially preferential treatment is claimed to be the right remedy for past discrimination.

A more fundamental problem involves the kind of representation blacks and other minorities are entitled to. Consider a western state that has a 30% black population but only 15 black state senators out of 100. By itself, this "disproportionate representation" would not violate Section 2. But it can serve as a trigger mechanism. The Justice Department could look at the discrepancy in registration figures between blacks and whites, or the disparity in state funds between black and white educational facilities, or the maldistribution of public services, and claim that any one of these additional factors constitutes that scintilla of evidence to make a violation stick. Furthermore, the "effects" test would permit this kind of evidence in order to "prove" that Section 2 had been violated. By contrast, all of the factors and circumstances would have to be examined together, as a total package, to satisfy the standard of purposefully discriminatory intent.

It is unfortunate that this whole matter was not extensively debated in the House. As far as I can determine, there was not one page of discussion before H.R. 3112 was passed, which is one reason why these Senate hearings can serve a very useful purpose.

There are other related questions which an extension and revision of the Voting Rights Act raise and for which the answers are anything but quick and easy. As Abigail M. Thernstrom, perhaps the country's most knowledgeable student of the Act, has pointed out, 15 years of experience and litigation have not yet settled the basic issue of electoral equality and minority voting rights. "And as long as it remains unsettled," she says, "the basic goal of the Voting Rights Act will remain elusive."

Originally the goal was clear - to remove all obstacles intended to sustain white racist power by preventing blacks from registering and voting, and to work toward an "integrated political process." Now there is growing ambiguity and confusion, both about desired ends and the means by which to achieve them. There is also a big difference between what is meant by the right to vote as set forth in various opinions of the Supreme Court and as understood by the Voting Rights Act. The one (constitutional law) has declared that black and white voters are equal when their opportunities to register and vote are equal; the other (statutory law) suggests that political equality might depend on some notion of the representational rights of groups. At the very least, in Justice Felix Frankfurter's terms, we are dealing with "a choice among competing theories of political philosophy."

I would hope that the Senate Judiciary Committee would give careful consideration to the following questions (intended to be suggestive rather than definitive) in an attempt to clarify the meaning of electoral discrimination:

- What is the defining principle in the Voting Rights Act that would clearly establish when the opportunity of blacks and Hispanics to register and vote has been reduced?

- Can the value of a person's vote be "diluted" without "a standard of reference as to what a vote should be worth"? (Justice Frankfurter in Baker v. Carr)

- If the voting strength of black citizens is to be protected against "dilution", will there be some specification in the Act of what "full" strength means?

- Is electoral discrimination against blacks and Hispanics to depend on a showing of "underrepresentation"?

- If blacks are mostly Democrats in a predominately Republican County, is their vote to be considered "diluted" when a black candidate loses even when it is agreed by everyone that race had nothing to do with it?

- Does the fact that there is a disproportionate number of blacks on the Boston City Council imply an "adverse effect" in the form of a "diluted" vote, thereby constituting evidence of electoral inequality even though the voting process was fully open to black participation?

- Is it the intention of Congress that the Voting Rights Act should now carry the message that at-large voting deprives blacks or Hispanics of a voice in the electoral process?

- Under what conditions and for what kinds of reasons should district lines be drawn that will ensure that black candidates will not face competition from white competitors?

- If a city believes that it would benefit economically from expansion and passes an annexation ordinance in which racial considerations played no part, does the fact that there was a proportionate drop in the black population provide prima facie evidence of discriminatory impact? Does even a small reduction justify the imposition of ward voting?

- Is the original commitment of the Voting Rights Act to a nondiscriminatory electoral process now to be changed to a standard which implies a commitment to maximum legislative seats held by blacks - in a word, black power?

I regret that the debate over the Voting Rights Act has frequently echoed Stokeley Carmichael's familiar and facile distinction: if you are not actively with us, you are actively against us. When applied to policy-making decisions facing the Congress, this simplistic moral absolute denies legitimacy to complicated and inevitably vexing questions. Those who have been long-time supporters of the Act - and I count myself in that large company - are not now in retreat because they are troubled by efforts of some of the sponsors of a new extension to redefine in a major way the meaning and direction of equal electoral opportunity by creating an artificial mix of race and politics. They are not friends who have suddenly become enemies simply because they contend that the other side has the burden of proving that the Court's emphasis on racially discriminatory "intent" should be repudiated - or because they reject the notion that a person's voting behavior reflects a single, dominating "interest" such as race or ethnicity (or that elected officials of one race cannot represent the interests of another), or because they wonder why 30% influence over three representatives who are white may not be worth more than 90% influence over one who is black. The measure of their continuing commitment to the Voting Rights Act is that they would not want to see this goal transformed into a policy that, in Thernstrom's words, would promote "color-coordinated politics - the color of the candidate unfailingly matching the color of his constituency" - and would make proportional racial and ethnic representation the true test of voting effectiveness and political equality.

These are men and women who do not wish to support those whose actions would increase the already pronounced trend to politicize and racialize more and more aspects of American life. They believe that the equal protection clause means (among other things) that black and white voters are equal when their opportunities to register and vote are equal. They would not lend their weight to any cause that would foster race consciousness, perpetuate stereotypical thinking, or deepen the tensions, fragmentation and outright resentment among racial groups, thus exacerbating the tendency to identify and then to judge persons on the basis of the racial group to which they belong. Their values lead them to accept the principle embedded in both the Civil and Voting Rights Acts - that in a democratic society an individual's worth has a higher moral claim than his color, his sex, or his origins.

VOTING RIGHTS AND BLOC POWER—PROPOSED BILL CHIPS AWAY AT THE NOTION OF MAJORITY RULE

(By John H. Bunzel) [1]

The U.S. Senate is about to begin hearings on extending the Voting Rights Act of 1965. President Reagan and most members of Congress agree that the landmark law, which was extended and expanded in 1970 and 1975, should be extended for 10 more years. But a real fight is shaping up over how to go about it.

One of the major issues involves the "intent-effects" distinction drawn by the U.S. Supreme Court that the House-passed voting-rights measure is seeking to overturn. Section 2 of the act, which is applicable nationwide, protects all citizens from having their right to vote denied or abridged on the basis of race or color. It has traditionally been understood to mean, and was reaffirmed by the Supreme Court in 1980, that a violation of that law requires a demonstration of intention or a discriminatory purpose. The court has also ruled that only if there is "purposeful discrimination" can there be a violation of the equal-protection clause of the 14th Amendment.

The House-passed measure would change the standard of proof for Section 2 lawsuits by eliminating the requirement that an electoral jurisdiction has intentionally discriminated in voting laws. Instead, it need only act "in a manner that results in a denial or abridgment" of voting rights. The House proposes a standard for indentifying discrimination that looks to the racial "effects" or "disparate impact" of some particular action on blacks or other minorities rather than on whether or not the action was undertaken for an illegal purpose.

It would go beyond the existing standard that covers specified jurisdictions with histories of electoral discrimination (mostly in the South) and bans all election practices—gerrymandering election districts, for example—that prevent minorities from enhancing their political power. The proposed legislation would change the right of minorities to vote to an effective right to vote. In short, not only should blacks and Latinos have the right to select black and Latino candidates—an unarguable right—but also blacks should have the maximum political opportunity to be represented by blacks and Latinos by Latinos.

The presumption is that minorities will be able to increase their political strength and influence only if Congress changes Section 2 of the Voting Rights Act so that blacks and Latinos have more than equal access to the ballot box. They must somehow be assured of equal electoral results. The center of concern would move from eliminating racially motivated discrimination in the voting process to endorsing a theory of group representation that would push our politics closer to institutionalizing a system of single-member districts and racial-bloc voting.

This, it is claimed, is the only way to make sure that the black or Latino vote is not diluted, and that every ethnic group is "fully represented." What worries many observers is that it is only a short step to sanctioning the concept of proportional racial and ethnic representation.

Thus, as Nathan Z. Dershowitz and Marc D. Stern of the American Jewish Congress point out, a law designed to guarantee full minority participation in the democratic process can also undermine a major tenet of that process—majority rule. "What is worse, it does so by insisting that racial considerations be used to dictate election results.

It is in this light that one must weigh carefully the implications of new language in the House-passed measure, which says that the fact that members of a minority group have not been elected "in numbers equal to the group's proportion of the population" shall not constitute a violation of Section 2 "in and of itself." That is the key phrase—and the sleeper. It calls to mind the difference between quotas and goals in affirmative action. Proportional representations may be wrong, but the "effects" test is said to be right and necessary in much the same way that engaging in racially preferential treatment is claimed to be the right remedy for past discrimination.

A more fundamental problem involves the kind of representation to which blacks and other minorities are entitled. Consider a Western state that has a 30 percent black population but only 15 black state senators out of 100. By itself, this "disproportionate representation" would not violate Section 2. But it could serve as a trigger mechanism. The Justice Department could take a look at the discrepancy in registration figures between blacks and white educational facilities, or the maldistribution of public services, and claim that any one of these additional factors constitutes that scintilla of evidence to make a violation stick.

Furthermore, the "effects" test would permit this kind of evidence in order to "prove" that Section 2 had been violated. By contrast, all factors and circumstances would have to be examined together, as a total package, to satisfy the standard of purposefully discriminatory intent.

Those who have been long-time friends of civil rights are not suddenly enemies simply because they do not favor an electoral system that would shield a black candidate running for office from a white candidate, or because they do not believe that elected officials of one race cannot represent the interests of another. They continue to support the original aims of the Voting Rights Act because they remain committed to working toward an integrated political process rather than toward the goal of black or Latino power that, they feel strongly, is not the true test, of electoral equality.

Senator HATCH. Our second witness today will be Hon. Henry Kirksey who is a State senator from Mississippi. State Senator Kirksey has been a litigant in numerous Voting Rights Act cases.

We will look forward to taking your testimony at this time, Senator.

STATEMENT OF HON. HENRY J. KIRKSEY, STATE SENATOR, JACKSON, MISS., ACCOMPANIED BY BARBARA PHILLIPS

Mr. KIRKSEY. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Let me introduce Ms. Barbara Phillips——

Senator HATCH. Ms. Phillips, we are happy to have you with us.

Mr. KIRKSEY [continuing]. Who will sit with me.

Mr. Chairman, first of all, let me express my appreciation for this opportunity to come before this committee and to testify. I shall read for the committee a summary statement rather than the lengthy statement that I have prepared.

Senator HATCH. Well, we would appreciate that, and then we will put your full, lengthy statement into the record as though fully delivered immediately following your oral presentation.

Mr. KIRKSEY. Thank you. I am Henry J. Kirksey, a member of the Mississippi Senate. I was elected to the Mississippi Senate in 1979 because of the protections of the Voting Rights Act.

Although Mississippi is 35 percent black, the Mississippi Legislature through racial gerrymandering of legislative districts succeeded in excluding any black representation in the Mississippi Senate from reconstruction through 1979.

I was born in Tupelo, Miss., in 1915, and I have been directly involved since 1965 in ligitation to protect the rights of black Mississippians fully to participate in the electoral process.

I was a plaintiff in the Mississippi State Legislative reapportionment case which went on for 14 years, including nine trips to the U.S. Supreme Court, until effective relief finally was obtained in 1979.

I have also successfully challenged racial gerrymandering in county supervisors' districts in Hinds County, Miss., and unsuccessfully challenged at-large elections in Jackson, Miss., also in Hinds County.

I would like to submit for the inclusion into the record of these hearings my written statement; a report entitled "Voting in Mississippi: a Right Still Denied," which describes continuing voting rights denials in Mississippi; another report, "Black Political Power in Mississippi, a Report of the Mississippi NAACP Political Actions Committee," which shows continuing violations of the Voting Rights Act, and the broad base of support for a strengthened act. I also have one additional document here that I would like to submit. It is called Questions and Answers on the Section 2 Results Standards of Senate Bill 1992.

Senator HATCH. Without objection, those will be included in the record.

Mr. KIRKSEY. I am here to urge your support for Senate bill 1992 which extends and strengthens the protections of the Voting Rights Act.

One of the aspects of this problem that concerns me the most is the failure of the Justice Department under the Reagan administration to enforce the protections of the present act. One example of this in Mississippi is the Justice Department's decision in July 1981 to withdraw 4½ years after it was filed the Justice Department's objection to a racially discriminatory municipal annexation in Jackson, Miss., which clearly diluted black voting strength.

Jackson is governed by a three-member city council, all elected at large. Although blacks constitute 45 percent of the population, no black has been elected to the Jackson City Council since at-large voting was adopted in 1912.

Since 1960, the black percentage in Jackson's population has been steadily growing. The growth of the black population has been offset by a series of annexations of predominantly white areas to prevent blacks from becoming a majority in Jackson's population.

In 1976, the city annexed a 40-square-mile area which was 74 percent white and the Attorney General objected to this annexation for dilution of black voting strength. My own calculation indicates that, but for this annexation, Jackson would be majority black today.

In July of last year, after intervention by Senator Thad Cochran and Representative Trent Lott, this objection was withdrawn even though there was no change in the facts of the law applicable in this case. The withdrawal of this objection violated all of the procedures of the Justice Department and was clearly politically motivated. These are the kinds of things that we are faced with in Mississippi and show the need for strengthening section 2 of the Voting Rights Act to provide private plaintiffs an opportunity to file suit to correct these kinds of discriminations.

The Voting Rights Act is intended to eliminate discrimination which denies or bridges the voting rights of minorities because of their status as minorities. The amendment to section 2 is necessary to accomplish this goal.

To argue that discriminatory purpose must be proved is to condone the violation of the right to vote and to make illegal only a discriminatory purpose. How can anyone claim to support the right of minorities to vote and participate in the democratic process and yet oppose an amendment which makes illegal those laws and practices which result in a denial or abridgment of that right?

Our effort to end discriminatory at-large elections in the city of Jackson, Mississippi provides a clear example of how the City of Mobile decision changed the legal standard and why the amendment to section 2 is needed to maintain the standard which had been applied in the Fifth Circuit prior to Mobile.

Together with 16 other blacks, I filed an action in 1977 challenging the discriminatory at-large selection in Jackson, Mississippi. This case, Kirksey v. City of Jackson, is still pending. The case was tried in July 1977 in the District Court of the Southern District of Mississippi relying on the Zimmer v. McKeithen and White v. Regester factors. We lost in district court in 1978.

On appeal, the fifth circuit vacated and remanded for a supplemental hearing and reconsideration because City of Mobile had changed the law. The fifth circuit judge stated that the validity of the criteria developed in Zimmer is now very much in question in light of the recent Supreme Court decision in the City of Mobile, Alabama v. Bolden.

The Court then explained:

> We have many times held that factfindings that were made under the spell of legal principle which were either improper or since then declared to be improper really can't be credited one way or the other.

In Jones v. City of Lubbock the fifth circuit again remanded a voting rights case because the City of Mobile decision in the court's words "rejected the Zimmer test, simultaneously casting aside the 10 years of thought, experience, and struggle embodied within it."

Judge Goldberg in his concurring opinion leaves no doubt that judges know the City of Mobile opinion changed the rules. The Supreme Court has completely changed the mode of accessing the legality of electoral schemes alleged to discriminate against a class of citizens. When the rules of the game are changed, the players must be afforded a full and fair opportunity to play by the new regulations.

Judge Goldberg went on to say that the courts no longer know how to proceed; therefore, although much was written by the Justices in Bolden little, save the rejections of Zimmer test, was actually decided therein.

It is a purely academic exercise to debate whether the Mobile opinion changed the law. Judges who interpret the law have addressed the issue. The proposed amendment to section 2 is needed to restore the 10 years of thought, experience, and struggle referred to by Judge Goldberg.

In October 1980, we retried Kirksey v. City of Jackson exclusively on the intent issue in light of the Mobile case. We offered both direct and extensive circumstantial evidence of the discriminatory purpose in adopting and maintaining at-large elections in Jackson, Miss., a city in which blacks are 45 percent of the population but in which blacks have never been elected to the city council since at-large elections were instituted in 1912.

We lost in the district court, which held that the motivation of the electorate is immune from judicial scrutiny. A panel of the fifth circuit court at appeal affirmed in Jackson, Miss., where at-large elections were first adopted by referendum in 1912 and were maintained by a referendum in 1977. The court held that even though Mobile requires us to prove discriminatory purpose, we are barred from using evidence of the motivation of the decisionmaker, the city voters.

The direct and circumstantial evidence of denial of access to the political process which meets the standards of Zimmer and White is not sufficient, neither is the Mobile decision, to prove a violation of the rights protected by section 2.

Senator HATCH. Mr. Kirksey, your narrative of the annexation case in Jackson I think may leave out one important fact. Isn't it true that the Carter administration permitted the 1977 election to proceed on the condition that a referendum be held to decide whether to change the city's form of government? Doesn't Mr. Turner's letter of February 17, 1981, reflect that fact?

Mr. KIRKSEY. I am sorry; I didn't get that latter part of your statement, sir.

Senator HATCH. Well, what I am saying is that the narrative that you have given on the annexation case leaves out the fact that Mr. Turner sent a letter dated February 17, 1981 indicating the election was supposed to proceed on the basis that a referendum be held to decide whether to change the city's form of government.

Mr. KIRKSEY. That is not basically the way I understand what occurred.

Because of the annexation's occurring close to the election, it was decided that the election would proceed. Those people in the annexation area would have to vote in separate boxes so that those votes would not count. We did not rule that they did not have the right to go out and vote but those boxes were held separate from the others.

Senator HATCH. You complain about the new congressional redistricting in Mississippi which clearly resembles the present apportionment. While you say that the existing plan is discriminatory, hasn't that existing plan been approved by the Justice Department?

Mr. KIRKSEY. For the first time, I think the Justice Department did not have that case before it after the redistricting in 1966, and that is very important because they did not have an opportunity to judge that case one way or the other when it occurred in 1966. In fact, it was into 1970 or 1972 before the Justice Department had an opportunity to look at the redistricting that occurred in 1966.

The fact of the matter is, sir, that over the years from 1882 Mississippi's congressional districts had followed regional district lines. Recently a former Congressman from Mississippi came to see me on the Senate floor to talk about that redistricting in 1966. I think that you should read an interview with former Congressman Smith, who was a Congressman of the delta district in which all of the counties in that district were black majority. You should read and see what he had to say about it. However, the Congressman who came to see me recently in the Senate said that it was very plain to him that race was the only reason for abandoning the congressional district.

The reason I am not using his name is very significant. He said to me, "I would prefer that you not use my name. I am telling you this. I don't want you to use it because of the condemnation that I will receive from my community should you use my name."

Now here is a man who has been retired from politics for years, but he was afraid of the consequence of having said that that was a racially discriminatory redistricting of the congressional district in 1966.

Now the current redistricting plan is simply a shifting of a few counties in that plan in order to meet the one-person-one-vote standard.

Senator HATCH. We certainly appreciate your testimony.

Senator Metzenbaum?

Senator METZENBAUM. Senator Kirksey, I found your testimony interesting, but I want to be certain that I heard you correctly on one point.

As I understand it, under President Ford the Attorney General objected to the annexation in connection with the city of Jackson, Miss. Then, if I understand you correctly, Attorney General Smith and Assistant Attorney General Brad Reynolds went before the court, withdrew the objection, and, as I also understand you, there were no substantial changes in the facts which would warrant that total reversal of position. Now did I hear you correctly?

Mr. KIRKSEY. That is absolutely correct. The conditions remain exactly the same. Now it has been said to me that perhaps I should have filed a suit, but actually we were depending upon the Justice Department to hold its position in that case. That is why no additional suit was filed.

Senator METZENBAUM. What did Justice Department say to the blacks of Jackson, Miss., as to why it was withdrawing its objection?

Mr. KIRKSEY. It said nothing. In fact, in relaying to the black community what it was doing, in fact, what actually happened occurred without any consultation.

Senator METZENBAUM. They just went in?

Mr. KIRKSEY. They went ahead and did it.

Senator METZENBAUM. Have you or anybody from Jackson, Miss., attempted to meet with Attorney General Smith?

Mr. KIRKSEY. We have counsel who have tried to determine what actually occurred, and in fact have determined the extent to which there was political pressure exerted upon the Justice Department to make the changes that it did change.

Senator METZENBAUM. Well, Senator Kirksey, I have heard everybody say that they are for civil rights. I have heard everybody say that they are against discrimination. I have heard the Attorney General say that. Yet, it would seem to me that this kind of action is just totally outrageous and even more so for a lawyer who reversed the position of the Department without there being some additional evidence or some causal reason.

I am concerned that what you are saying is that the Department of Justice is being run on a political basis and also on a very discriminatory basis against minorities in this country. Now would you agree with that conclusion?

Mr. KIRKSEY. I agree wholeheartedly. That is my feeling and I have had that feeling for some time, sir.

Senator METZENBAUM. Let me ask you further, what was Mississippi's experience prior to the Bolden case with the courts applying a results standard? In other words, prior to the Bolden case, did the courts end up requiring proportional representation under that standard?

Mr. KIRKSEY. We used a large number of experts to document discrimination that was very clearly what occurred in Jackson, Miss. Those, I believe, were the same standards and the same documentations that were submitted in the Bolden case.

Now when the Supreme Court reversed the Bolden case and applied new standards, our case went to the fifth circuit. As a result of the Supreme Court's decision, the fifth circuit remanded the case back to the district court, saying that new standards were now in effect and that the standards by which the district court judged that case were no longer relevant.

Senator METZENBAUM. Senator Kirksey, how many members are there of the State senate in Mississippi?

Mr. KIRKSEY. Fifty-two.

Senator METZENBAUM. How many members are black?

Mr. KIRKSEY. Two.

Senator METZENBAUM. And that is in spite of the fact that up until the Bolden case the results interpretation was applicable in voting rights cases.

Mr. KIRKSEY. Yes.

Senator METZENBAUM. So that proportional representation was not obtained, and a claim to that effect is really somewhat of a figment of the imagination of those who opposed the results test; is it not?

Mr. KIRKSEY. May I just say something on that?

Senator METZENBAUM. Anything.

Mr. KIRKSEY. I came here yesterday, and this is the first time that I have heard any mention of proportional representation. Now that has never been our purpose. In fact, we have had the Voting Rights Act since 1965.

There is absolutely no indication that in the foreseeable future we will have proportional representation in Mississippi. There are many reasons for it, but the bottom line is that is not what we were seeking; that is not the case now; and it is not going to be the case.

Senator METZENBAUM. What percentage of the State's population is black?

Mr. KIRKSEY. Thirty-five percent.

Let me read, if I may, sir: Under the standards applied by the Federal courts prior to the Mobile decision, we have never proved our case simply by showing the lack of proportional representation, nor have we obtained proportional representation as a remedy. The cases clearly show that the proportional representation argument is not based on fact.

In Warren County, Miss., from 1970 to 1979, the all-white Warren County Board of Supervisors prevented the election of a black county official in this 41 percent black county by redistricting plans which fragmented the black population concentration in Vicksburg among several districts. In 1979, the Federal district court ordered into effect a plan which resulted in the election of one black county supervisor, one black justice of the peace, and two black constables—the first black elected officials in Warren County since reconstruction. Since there are five supervisors, justices of the peace, and constables from each district, we clearly did not obtain proportional representation.

Sentor METZENBAUM. Senator Kirksey.

Mr. KIRKSEY. Yes, sir.

Senator METZENBAUM. I prefer that the balance of your statement be included in the record because I don't want my time to run out.

If the Chair will permit, I would like to ask that the balance of the statement be included in the record.

Senator HATCH. Yes. That has been done.

Mr. KIRKSEY. Certainly.

Senator METZENBAUM. Let me ask you another question. You indicated that one of the State legislators had told you that in 1966 the redistricting was done on a racially discriminatory basis and then said to you, "But don't use my name."

Isn't that pretty much proof positive itself that the ability to prove intent is almost an impossible task since any white or anyone who is a party to the proceeding who would admit his involvement or her involvement would pretty much be ostracized in the Mississippi community?

Mr. KIRKSEY. Certainly, it is, sir. You said, "legislator." He is a former U.S. Congressman.

Senator METZENBAUM. I'm sorry.

Mr. KIRKSEY. Now let me give you another good example. Last year I ran for Congress in the Fourth Congressional District. Having been in the legislature for a couple of sessions, I came to know the legislators from that congressional district. One of the first things that I did was to call each of the legislators in that district, two of whom are black, and ask them if they would campaign for me in their respective districts.

I remember distinctly that the senior senator in the district I was unable to contact, but most of them I did contact. Almost to a man the answer was in this context: "I don't know too many black people in my district, but I do know a few ministers and a few teachers and I will talk to them."

My reply was to each one: "I didn't ask you to campaign for me in the black community. I have people out there campaigning for me. I want you to campaign among your own peers in the white community." The answer was precisely the same every time: "You are trying to make it impossible for me to get reelected."

Senator METZENBAUM. Senator Kirksey, I am glad you did get reelected. I gather you did get reelected?

Mr. KIRKSEY. No; I am on my first term.

Senator METZENBAUM. Oh, I see.

Mr. KIRKSEY. This is the third session of my first term.

Senator METZENBAUM. You refer in your testimony to a poll among white voters in Jackson, Miss. What exactly did the poll show in terms of racial motivation?

Mr. KIRKSEY. We were not able to present these claims in court. The claim was that it was not submitted in time and we were not able to submit it.

This was the result that you have just asked for: Different voters responded for two different racial reasons: (a) might cause racial tension, which was 33 percent of the respondents; (b) would encourage black participation in city government, which was 36 percent of the respondents; (c) might make it possible for blacks to serve as city councilmen, which was 40 percent of the response; and (d) might result in my being represented by a person of another race, which was 33 percent of the respondents.

Senator METZENBAUM. What was that last one?

Mr. KIRKSEY. Might result in my being represented by a person of another race. Up at the top is the number of persons who gave statistics. Let me read from the statement which preceded the statistic which I just gave you.

Senator METZENBAUM. The lady with you may do it herself if you would like.

Mr. KIRKSEY. Yes. I will just start reading at the top of the paragraph.

We offered in evidence the result of a poll reporting the racial motivation of white votes in Jackson who in the 1977 citywide referendum rejected a change to single-member districts or wards. The referendum to change from the at-large system was defeated. Seventy-two percent—and this is the data that I want you to have—of the white voters voted to retain at-large elections and 97.9 percent of the black voters voted for the change. The poll among white voters showed that 61 percent of those who voted to retain at-large elections did so for one or more racial reasons, those reasons which I previously read to you.

Senator METZENBAUM. Mr. Chairman, my time has expired, but I would ask the unanimous consent that the entire poll be included in the record.

Senator HATCH. That will be fine. Without objection, that will be included.

Senator METZENBAUM. Will you make a copy available?

Mr. KIRKSEY. Yes.

Senator HATCH. I would simply comment in this way, Senator Kirksey: The fact that Mississippi doesn't have porportional representation is not very persuasive on this issue of section 2. It isn't very persuasive. Indeed, in my opinion, it isn't even particularly relevant for three simple reasons.

First, I strongly disagree that the results standard was the law under section 2 on the 15th amendment prior to the Mobile case. We have asked witness after witness to prove that it is, and none in my opinion has been able to do so.

Second, the notions of "dilution" and "effective votes" has developed only very recently, even in the context of section 5.

Finally, the results test in section 2 is a completely new test. I have been told by witness after witness that it is different than the effects test in section 5.

I am not here to defend or to castigate Mississippi. By the same token, let us not labor under the mistaken impression that your relating your Mississippi experience, under section 5, is particularly relevant to the section 2 debate. I just want to set the record straight with regard to that.

We are grateful to you for coming. We are grateful to have your statements put into the record at this point, and hopefully that will make a better record for us. Thank you so much.

Mr. KIRKSEY. May I say something?

Senator HATCH. Yes. Go ahead.

Mr. KIRKSEY. I would like this to be entered into the record. Of course, we are obviously in disagreement.

Senator HATCH. We are.

Mr. KIRKSEY. But let me say—and I think this is most important because it speaks to the heart of the problem in Mississippi as far as blacks are concerned—the district from which I was elected in 1979 has 15 precincts in it. As of the 1970 census, about seven of those precincts had white majority. Three of the precincts had a significantly larger population and voter registration than the other precincts in the district. The important thing, though, is that the district was drawn up basically to enhance the reelection of the incumbent and it was considered that no black would be able to defeat the incumbent.

It so happened in this case—and I don't to this day believe that I could have won that election except for the fact that the incumbent was in trouble with his constituents, about which the people in my community knew very little as to the circumstances, but the incumbent later was indicted and found guilty of whatever the problem was. The people in his community knew very well what he had done. They did not turn out in his support. Because they did not turn out—they certainly didn't vote for me—the black vote in the black majority precincts enabled me to get elected.

Now I brought that in because I wanted to make this important point. I have been senator from that district since 1979. I don't know and have been unable to make acquaintance on any kind of a cordial relationship with anyone in those white majority precincts.

It is a different world altogether, and that is the basic problem that we are faced with in Mississippi. There are two worlds. There is the black world and the white world. The whites are able to come in and always have been able to come into the black community. They are always able to find people in the black community who will represent them, who will campaign for them, but we cannot do the same thing in the white community.

There are no welcome signs out to blacks for campaigning in white communities. That is very important, in addition to the fact that there is a tremendous difference in the ability of blacks in campaigning to campaign in the same way.

As you know, today unless you can get on the television and radio and get in the newspapers, you simply are more or less ineffective. Well, unless we have that kind of money—and it is not available to us—in at-large elections we certainly are not equal participants.

Senator HATCH. Of course, Senator, I agree with you that is a deplorable situation where it exists, but that has little or no relevance to the Voting Rights Act itself. Be that as it may, we appreciate the testimony that you have brought to the committee today. Thank you for being with us.

Mr. KIRKSEY. Thank you, sir.

[The prepared statement of Mr. Kirksey and additional material follow:]

PREPARED STATEMENT OF HENRY J. KIRKSEY

I am Henry J. Kirksey, a member of the Mississippi Senate, elected in 1979 because of the protections of the Voting Rights Act. Prior to 1979, no blacks had been elected to the Mississippi Senate since Reconstruction.

I was born in Tupelo, Mississippi in 1915 and have been directly involved since 1965 in litigation to protect the right of black Mississippians to fully participate in the political process. In addition to voting rights cases in which I have prepared and analyzed redistricting plans, I have been a plaintiff in voting rights cases challenging the dilution of minority voting strength in Mississippi state legislative districts, Hinds County board of Supervisors districts, and the at-large election system in Jackson, Mississippi.

I would like to submit the following documents for inclusion in this hearing record along with my written statement:

--Voting in Mississippi: A Right Still Denied. This is a report on continued voting rights denials in Mississippi prepared by the Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights Under Law, endorsed by former Attorney General Nicholas Katzenbach and six former Assistant Attorney Generals for the Civil Rights Division. The report describes in detail the efforts--many of them since 1975--to maintain political white supremacy. The report also discusses methods of election adopted prior to the Voting Rights Act which continue to exclude blacks from the political process.

--Black Political Power in Mississippi. This is a report of the NAACP Political Action Committee of which I am chairman. This report shows that black Mississippians are still denied equal access to the political process and shows the broad base of support for a strong Voting Rights Act.

I am here today to urge your support for S. 1992. My remarks will focus upon the need to amend Section 2 as proposed in that bill in order to protect minority citizens from discriminatory laws and practices.

The only legitimate issue concerning the proposed amendment is whether laws and practices which discriminate against minorities should be illegal. Any statement that the proposed amendment requires proportional representation is wrong. In Mississippi we have experienced 17 years of the more stringent "effects" standard of Section 5 and we have not experienced a revolution of proportional representation. Blacks continue to be excluded from representation at every level of government in a state which is 35% black

--Of a total of 5,271 elective offices in Mississippi, only 7.34% are held by blacks.

--There are still no black elected officials in Mississippi's five-member Congressional delegation or in the statewide elected state offices.

--Of the 21 counties which are majority black in population eight still have no black representation on their county boards of supervisors, and black county supervisors make up a majority in only two counties.

--Of the 1,420 city council members, only 143 (10%) are black.

--From 1965 to 1979 black voters were denied all but token representation in the Mississippi Legislature by the discriminatory use of multi-member legislative districts with at-large voting in areas of black population concentrations. When the Legislature finally was forced to abandon at-large voting by a Section 5 objection and litigation challenging these multi-member districts, the number of blacks in the Legislature increased from 4 (1975) to 17 (1980). Blacks still comprise only 10 percent of the membership of the Mississippi Legislature.

The Voting Rights Act is intended to eliminate discriminatoin which denies or abridges the voting rights of minorities because of their status as minorities. The amendment to Section 2 is necessary to accomplish that goal. To argue that discriminatory purpose must be proved is to condone the violation of the right to vote and to make illegal only a discriminatory purpose. How can anyone claim to support the right of minorities to vote and participate in the democratic process and yet oppose an amendment which makes illegal those laws and practices which result in a denial or abridgment of that right?

There are now 387 black elected officials in Mississippi compared to 29 in 1968. The Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals made a comment about Escambia County, Florida which is also appropriate for Mississippi:

> We hope eventually we will reach the point where local governing bodies will be elected on an at-large basis, and people will vote for candidates based on their individual merit and not on the color of their skin. Unfortunately, we have not yet reached that state. McMillan v. Escambia County, Fla., 638 F.2d 1239, 1248 n. 18 (5th Cir. 1981).

The progress we have made under the Voting Rights Act is not that whites now welcome black political participation. A comparison of election results from 1971 through 1980 shows no fundamental change in the attitudes and voting behavior of white Mississippians--described by Dr. James W. Loewen as a "furious determination" to deny blacks participation in the political system. 1/ Our progress has resulted from the protections of the Voting Rights Act which are slowly dismantling voting laws and practices which discriminate against black voters and unfairly advantage white voters.

1/ Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights Under Law, Voting in Mississippi: A Right Still Denied, pp. 112-122.

We need the amendment to Section 2 so that the progress we made prior to the Supreme Court's decision in City of Mobile v. Bolden, 446 U.S. 55 (1980), will not be stopped. In the State of Mississippi, because of its history of discrimination, racial bloc voting, majority vote requirement, prohibition on single-shot voting, and discriminatory party politics, at-large elections remain a major method of discriminating against black citizens. Because of these factors, at-large elections in Mississipp are much more than an affirmative action program for whites--they are a major method of maintaining white supremacy.

Our efforts to end discriminatory at-large elections in the City of Jackson, Mississippi, provide a clear example of how the City of Mobile decision changed the legal standard and why the amendment to Section 2 is needed to maintain the standard which had been applied in the Fifth Circuit prior to Mobile.

Together with 16 other black voters, I filed an action in 1977 challenging the discriminatory at-large elections in Jackson, Mississippi. This case--Kirksey v. City of Jackson, is still pending. The case was tried in July 1977 in the District Court for the Southern District of Mississippi, relying upon the Zimmer v. McKeithen 2/ and White v. Regester 3/ factors. We lost in district court in 1978. 4/ On appeal, the Fifth Circuit vacated and remanded for a supplemental hearing and reconsideration because City of Mobile had changed the law. 5/

4/ Kirksey v. City of Jackson, 461 F.Supp. 1282 (S.D. Miss. 1978).

5/ 625 F.2d 21 (5th Cir. 1980).

The Fifth Circuit judges stated that the validity of the criteria developed in Zimmer "is now very much in question in light of the recent Supreme Court opinion in City of Mobile, Alabama v. Bolden." 625 F.2d at 21 (citation omitted). The Court then explained:

> We have many times held that fact findings that were made under the spell of legal principles, which were either improper or since then declared to be improper, really can't be credited one way or the other. 625 F.2d at 21-22.

In Jones v. City of Lubbock, 6/ the Fifth Circuit again remanded a voting rights case because the City of Mobile decision, in the Court's words:

> rejected the Zimmer test, simultaneously casting aside the ten-years of thought, experience and struggle embodied within it. 640 F.2d at 777.

Judge Goldberg, in his opinion of the Court, leaves no doubt that judges know the City of Mobile opinion changed the rules:

> [T]he Supreme Court has completely changed the mode of assessing the legality of electoral schemes alleged to discriminate against a class of citizens . . . .
> [W]hen the rules of the game are changed the players must be afforded a full and fair opportunity to play by the new regulations. 640 F.2d at 777-78.

Judge Goldberg went on to say that the courts no longer know how to proceed:

> Therefore, although much was written by the justices in Bolden, little--save for the rejection of the Zimmer test, was actually decided therein. 640 F.2d at 778.

6/ 640 F.2d 777 (5th Cir. 1981).

It is a purely academic exercise to debate whether the Mobile opinions changed the law. The judges who interpret the law have addressed the issue. The proposed amendment to Section 2 is needed to restore the "ten years of thought, experience and struggle" referred to by Judge Goldberg.

In October, 1980, we retried Kirksey v. City of Jackson exclusively on the intent issue in light of the Mobile case. We offered both direct and extensive circumstantial evidence of the discriminatory purpose in adopting and maintaining at-large elections in Jackson, Mississippi, a city in which blacks are 45% of the population, but in which blacks have never been elected to the city council since at-large elections were instituted in 1912.

We offered in evidence the results of a poll reporting the racial motivation of white voters in Jackson who, in a 1977 citywide referendum, rejected a change to single-member districgs or wards. The referendum to change from the at-large system was defeated: 72.4% of the white voters voted to retain at-large elections, and 97.9% of the black voters voted for the change. The poll among white voters showed that 61% of those who voted to retain at-large elections did so for one or more racial reasons. 7/

Different voters responded to different racial reasons:

(a)	Might cause racial tension	33%
(b)	Would encourage black participation in city government	36%
(c)	Might make it possible for blacks to serve as City councilmen	40%
(d)	Might result in my being represented by a person of another race	33%

A number of voters also offerred unsolicited racial comments, such as "I don't want a 'nigra' representing me" and "Blacks are human, but whites are more efficient."

We lost in the district court which held that the motivation of the electorate is immune from judicial scrutiny. 8/ A panel of the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals affirmed. 9/ In Jackson, Mississippi, where at-large elections were first adopted by a referendum in 1912, and were maintained by a referendum in 1977, the Court held that even though Mobile requires us to prove discriminatory purpose we are barred from using evidence of the motivation of the decisionmakers--the city voters. The direct and circumstantial evidence of denial of access to the political process which meets the standards of Zimmer and White is not sufficient, after the Mobile decision, to prove a violation of the rights protected by Section 2.

POLITICAL MEDDLING: THE WITHDRAWAL OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S OBJECTION TO THE 1976 JACKSON ANNEXATION

In 1976, the Attorney General objected pursuant to Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act to annexation by the City of Jackson of a predominantly white area because the annexation diluted black voting strength in Jackson. The, in 1981--four and a half years later--after protests from Senator Thad Cochran (R-Miss.) and House Whip Trent Lott (R-Miss.), the objection was revoked and withdrawn, allowing the White voters in the annexed area legally to participate in Jackson elections.

On December 3, 1976, the Attorney General lodged a Section 5 objection for dilution of black voting strength to annexation of a 40-square-mile area containing 32,490 persons, 74 percent of whom were white. This was the third annexation of predominantly white areas by Jackson since 1960. Jackson is governed by a three-member city council, all elected at-large. The Justice Department determined that the 1976 annexation "continues a trend dating back at least to 1960 of the annexation of areas of primarily white population, which has the effect of counteracting the impact of an otherwise growing black percentage." The effect of these annexations was to "more than offset the growth of the black population," and without which "the black population in the City of Jackson would be approaching a majority."

This Section 5 objection was ignored by the City of Jackson, and--despite repeated request--the Justice Department refused to file any action to enforce it. Residents of the newly-annexed area were permitted to vote in the city elections of 1977 and 1981. In May, 1981, Rev. Jesse Jackson, Reps. John Conyers and Walter Fauntroy and several other black leaders formerly requested the Justice Department to file suit to enforce this objection, but no action was filed. One month prior to the June, 1981 general election, James P. Turner, Acting Assistant Attorney General, wrote counsel for the City of Jackson:

> It is our understanding that the City intends to hold its 1981 elections by including in the electorate the areas annexed in 1976. Because of the short time remaining before the elections and the disruptive nature of this last minute litigation, we will not seek to enjoin or delay the election process. However, if the 1981 elections are conducted in a manner violative of federal law, and if the objection is not resolved and remains outstanding, we will be obligated to take prompt action to enforce the provisions of the Voting Rights Act. We should adivse you that the relief we seek may involve an order shortening the terms of the persons elected and requiring that a new election in compliance with federal law be conducted.

On July 23, 1981--four and a half years after the objection was made--the objection was withdrawn. The letter withdrawing the objection contains evidence of several major irregularities:

(1) There is no evidence that Jackson officials ever specifically requested the Justice Department to reconsider its 1976 objection. A "transmittal" received on May 23, 1981 was merely interpreted by the Justice Department as a request for reconsideration, and then granted.

(2) The letter specifically notes that the Department's "thorough re-evaluation" included "consultation with the Deputy Attorney General." Justice Department regulations specifically delegate the Attorney General's Section 5 responsibilities to the Assistant Attorney General in charge of the Civil Rights Division. Consultation with the Deputy Attorney General, Edward C. Schmults, is outside the normal procedure followed in these cases.

(3) Justice Department regulations require that reconsideration of an objection can only be based on "a substantial change in operative fact or relevant law." 28 CFR § 51-45. This objection was reconsidered and withdrawn even though there was no change in the facts or the law.

(4) The standards applied in withdrawing the objection directly contradict the standards applied and litigated by the Justice Department in City of Rome v. United States and affirmed by the Supreme Court in 1980.

The withdrawal of the objection was the direct result of political interference by Senator Thad Cochran (R-Miss.) and Rep. Trent Lott (R-Miss.) in the Justice Department's enforcement of the Voting Rights Act. In a Jackson Clarion-Ledger article published the day before the objection was withdrawn, both Cochran and Lott admitted intervening with Justice Department officials on the Jackson objection. Cochran admitted a telephone conversation, "I only asked the high echelon people to take a look at the Jackson problem," and Lott admitted a face-to-face meeting with Deputy Attorney General Schmults. Cochran is the brother of Jackson City Commissioner Nielson Cochran, a member of the three-member Jackson City Council.

Copies of the relevant correspondence are attached to my statement.

Mississippi Congressional Redistricting

In Mississippi, blacks are heavily concentrated in the Delta, a geographic and economic region in the northwest portion of the state. Fourteen of Mississippi's 21 majority black counties (1980 Census) are located in this region. Almost half of the state's 387 black elected officials are concentrated in the Delta.

The Mississippi legislature recently adopted a plan for ~~Congressional~~ districts termed the "Least Change" plan. The plan divides these fourteen majority black counties among three of the five oddly-shaped congressional districts, depriving blacks of a majority in any of the five districts. Mississippi is 35 percent black in population. In enacting the "Least Change" plan, the legislature rejected two plans which would have provided majority black districts in the Delta. One plan, which I drafted, would have created a 65 percent black Delta district; another plan drafted by state Rep. Jim Simpson, a white legislator, would have created a 54 percent black Delta district.

During legislative deliberations, state Rep. Tommy Campbell, chairman of the Legislature's congressional redistricting committee, argued that adoption of one of the alternative plans would jeopardize the reelection changes of Mississippi's all-white congressional delegation:

> To trade these considerations for the symbolism of electing a black would throw away real political considerations. [A black majority district] was not in the best interest . . . of citizens of both races.

During legislative hearings on the plan, the "Least Change" plan was criticized by the Mississippi NAACP, the Mississippi AFL-CIO, the Mississippi ACLU, the Children's Defense Fund, the Mississippi League of Women Voters, a number of black community organizations, and members of Mississippi's Legislative Black Caucus, all of whom criticized the plan as a racial gerrymander and urged the adoption of a majority black congressional district.

Mississippi has not had a black congressional representative since 1882 when Rep. John Roy Lynch was seated after winning an election contest in the U.S. House of Representatives. For most of this century, Mississippi has had a Delta district stretching from Memphis to Vicksburg. In 1960, the district was 59 percent black in population. In 1966, a year after the Voting Rights Act was passed, the Mississippi Legislature sliced up the Delta district horizontally, and divided it among the First, Second an Third Congressional Districts, thus depriving newly-enfranchised black voters in Mississippi of the opportunity to elect a member of Congress. The 1981 "Least Change" plan perpetuates this gerrymandering of the black population of the Delta.

Newspaper reports on the debates surrounding the 1966 congressional redistricting clearly show the racial motivation behind the adoption of the 1966 plan fragmenting the Delta district. The 1981 plan, nearly identical to the 1966 plan is, indeed, the "Least Change" from effective discrimination against black voters. The legislative debates of 1966 were reported as follows:

> Jackson Daily News, January 14, 1966
> "Did the Negro situation enter in this redistricting plan?" asked Rep. Odie Trenor . . . When he got no answer to his question, he said "we all know the Negro situation was the main factor."
>
> Rep. Thompson McLelland of Clay, said, "When this bill is attacked in the courts, they're going to look into what areas were moved, where they were moved and for what purposes they have been moved. They were moved so there shall not be a majority of certain groups in a district. The Courts will consider a similar case and they'll throw this out. We will have congressmen elected at-large or by districts fixed by the Supreme Court.
>
> This patently was drawn in a manner to devalue the vote of a certain group of people."
>
> Backers of the plan did not deny that the Delta area was split up to divide the heavy Negro vote.

Jackson Daily News, March 7, 1966:

> Rep. Clyde Burnes said that the House bill "had a little too much discrimination to be ignored (by the courts)."

Jackson Clarion-Ledger, April 1, 1966:

> A plan adopted by the Senate would have given second (District) a heavy Negro majority, but the House rejected this in favor of five districts with white majorities. Most senators agree that unless one heavily-Negro majority district is established, the government will knock the redistricting plan out through the federal courts.

Jackson Daily News, April 6, 1966:

> Rep. Thompson McClellan . . . argued . . . "Any bill that shows discrimination against a certain race they'll knock down. You are trying to take two white counties in northeast Mississippi out of the 2nd District and put a heavy Negro populated county in. They will say this bill is fraught with discrimination."

The year of the first Congressional redistricting to split the Delta -- 1966 -- saw a number of other actions by the same Mississippi legislature directed at diminishing black political participation. With black voter registration substantially rising as a result of the 1965 Voting Rights Act, the 1966 Mississippi legislature introduced at least 30 bills pertaining to elections or the political process, and no fewer than 12 bills or resolutions were passed which altered the state's election laws. United States Commission on Civil Rights, Political Participation, p. 22 (1968). Included among those measures which the legislature enacted into law:

--A statute repealing the previously mandatory single-member district elections for county boards of supervisors, and allowing each particular board the local option of switching to at-large elections. The state failed to present this measure for Justice Department review under Section 5, and was finally ordered to do so by the Supreme Court in Fairley v. Patterson, a black candidate for U.S. Senate who won two counties in the June, 1966 primary. As one state senator put it, the bill was revived "just because a few niggers voted down there [in Claiborne County]." United States Commission on Civil Rights, Political Participation, pp. 25-26.

--Legislation providing for "open primary" elections in Mississippi. This discarded "the traditional rule where the top vote-getter in a general election is the winner, whether he captured a plurality or majority of the votes. In its place was substituted a system where candidates can only win with a majority of the vote. Under this new system, black independents in white population majority electoral districts had no hope of winning office, even upon attainment of a plurality of general election votes. In recognition of the racial motive of the legislature behind the bill, the governor vetoed it, saying "this is an inopportune time for racial changes to be made in our election procedures." 1977 House Journal, pp. 1111-1112. Later versions of the open primary bill were introduced and passed by the Legislature in subsequent years, and were three times overridden by Section 5 objections from the Justice Department. The matter is currently in litigation following the initiation by the state of a declaratory judgment action under Section 5 in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia.

--A statutory package significantly increasing the burdens of qualifying and running as an independent candidate. This legislation, enacted after three black members of the Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party announced their independent candidacy in the general election for U.S. Senate and House of Representatives, contained the following provisions: (1) A tenfold increase in the number of signatures of qualified electors needed for the independent qualifying petition; (2) a change in the time for qualifying from 40 days before the general election to 60 days prior to the primary election; (3) a new rule that no person who has voted in a primary election may run for office as an independent in the general election; and (4) a new requirement that each qualified elector who signs the independent petition must personally sign the petition and include his polling precinct and county. The state did not submit these changes for Section 5 review until ordered to do so by the Supreme Court in Whitley v. Williams, decided sub nom. Allen v. State Board of Elections. The Justice Department then objected to the legislation, concluding that it was racially discriminatory in both purpose and effect. Letter from Leonard to Summer, May 21, 1969.

While these facts should be sufficient to prove that the rights of black voters are violated by the 1981 plan, this is just the kind of direct and circumstantial evidence which post-Mobile decisions of the district court and appellate court in Kirksey v. City of Jackson held did not meet the new standard of proving discriminatory purpose.

Mr. John L. Stone
City Attorney
City of Jackson
Post Office Box 17
Jackson, Mississippi 39205

Dear Mr. Stone:

This is in reference to the annexation, with precinct lines and polling places for the annexed area, to the City of Jackson, Mississippi, submitted to the Attorney General for review under Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act of 1965, as amended. Your submission was completed by our receipt of supplemental information on October 4, 1976.

Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act requires the Attorney General to examine submitted changes that affect the voting process to determine that a change "does not have the purpose and will not have the effect of denying or abridging the right to vote on account of race or color." In making this determination on behalf of the Attorney General, we apply the legal principles developed by the courts in the same or analogous situations. The principal cases dealing with the proper approach to an evaluation of annexations under Section 5 are City of Richmond v. United States, 422 U.S. 358 (1975) and City of Petersburg v. United States, 354 F. Supp. 1021 (D.D.C. 1972), aff'd 410 U.S. 962 (1973). Essentially, these cases require an analysis of an annexation submission to examine the impact of the boundary expansion on minority voting rights, both statistically and in the context of the local electoral system, with due consideration to the historic patterns of minority electoral participation. See also Whitcomb v. Chavis, 403 U.S. 124 (1971); White v. Regester, 412 U.S. 755 (1973); and Blacks United for Lasting Leadership, et al. v. City of Shreveport, et al., F. Supp. (Civ. Action No. 74-272 W.D. La., decided July 16, 1976.)

The decisions cited above prescribe our approach to the review of annexations under Section 5. With respect to racial effect, the Supreme Court, in reaffirming its holding in Petersburg, supra, stated in Richmond, supra, 422 U.S. at 370:

> the annexation of an area with a white majority, combined with at-large councilmanic elections and racial voting, created or enhanced the power of the white majority to exclude Negroes totally from participation in the governing of the city through membership on the city council.

According to the information you have provided, the area annexed in 1976 is populated by 32,490 persons, of whom 23,979, or 74%, are white. The effect of including approximately three times as many whites as blacks in the annexation is that the black percentage of the city's total population dropped from 40% to 36%.

This decrease in the black percentage in Jackson could itself have a significant effect on the political strength of blacks in the city. Moreover, it continues a trend dating back at least to 1960 of the annexation of areas of primarily white population, which has the effect of counteracting the impact of an otherwise growing black population percentage.

Year	Total	White	%	Black	%
1960 (preannexation)	120,761	70,694	58.6	49,994	41.4
1960 (postannexation)	144,422	92,793	64.3	51,556	35.7
1970 (preannexation)	153,968	92,651	60.2	61,063	39.7
1971 (postannexation)	163,063	100,338	61.6	62,471	38.3
1976 (preannexation)	200,700	120,420	60	80,280	40
1976 (postannexation)	233,190	144,399	61.9	88,791	38.1

As the above chart indicates in 1960 Jackson had a population of about 120,000, of which over 41% was black. A large annexation that year, of an area containing a population that was over 90% white, reduced the black percentage to less than 36%. In the 10 years between the 1960 and 1970 censuses there were no annexations and the black proportion of the city's population grew by about four percentage points. In that period the white population was static, declining in its proportion of the whole. The 1971 annexation interrupted this trend by adding 9000 persons, of whom 84.5% were white. At this point we raised with you the problem of selective annexation and pointed out the potentially dilutive effect of the annexation. However, with the understanding that the city planned to include two specific black areas as part of then pending annexations, we did not object to that annexation under Section 5.

The annexation of the two areas did not go forward as promptly as had been projected. Instead, they were included in the large annexation of 1976, which is now under consideration. Even though the city appears to have included all eligible black areas in the current annexation, the inescapable effect of the 1976 annexation is to continue the pattern of the earlier annexations.

Taken together, the three annexations have included whites at almost a five to one ratio to blacks (53,765 to 11, 481). They have more than offset the growth in the black proportion of the city's population that has been occurring. But for this series of annexations, the black population in the City of Jackson would be approaching a majority.

Annexations are reviewable under Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act because they affect the composition of the electorate. They are objectionable if they are designed to dilute the voting power of a minority or if they have that effect. Thus a city's electoral system as well as demographic statistics must be included in the Attorney General's consideration of the effect of an annexation.

Jackson has a three-member city council, with the mayor and two commissioners elected at large. A majority vote is required for nomination and full slate voting is required. No black has ever been elected to the council, although several have been candidates. Our research indicates that elections in Jackson are characterized by racial bloc voting. Thus the dilutive effect of the annexation combined with a system of election that minimizes the opportunity for minorities to be elected and with the existence of racial bloc voting makes it impossible for the Attorney General to conclude that the 1976 annexation will not have a racially discriminatory effect.

Where there is a dilutive effect, an annexation may still be unobjectionable if, as the Supreme Court held in Petersburg, supra, 410 U.S. at 1031, the city also takes steps 'to neutralize to the extent possible any adverse effect upon the political participation of black voters.' The Supreme Court explained in Richmond, supra, 422 U.S. at 370, that 'the consequences would be satisfactorily obviated if at large elections were replaced by a ward system of choosing councilmen.' Although it is our understanding that the City of Jackson has the authority to make such a change in its electoral system, no such action has been taken.

On the question of racial purpose, our analysis has not disclosed any racially discriminatory motivation associated with this annexation.

Accordingly, I must on behalf of the Attorney General enter an objection to the implementation of the submitted annexation to the extent that it affects voting in the City of Jackson. It is our view that such an objection does not under federal law affect the legality or propriety of the annexation itself. However, until withdrawn or invalidated by court action, the objection does preclude the conduct of municipal elections in the annexed area.

Of course, as provided by Section 5, you have the right to seek a declaratory judgment from the United States District Court for the District of Columbia that this annexation has neither the purpose nor the effect of denying or abridging the right to vote on account of race or color. In any event, we would be pleased to discuss with you any questions you may have in connection with this matter.

In regard to the precinct lines and polling places for the annexed area, no determination will be made at this time due to the effect of this objection on voting in the annexed area.

Sincerely,

J. Stanley Pottinger

Mr. Howard C. Ross, Jr.
City Attorney
P. O. Box 17
Jackson, Mississippi 39205

Dear Mr. Ross:

I am writing to determine what action the City of Jackson intends to take to comply with the requirements of Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act of 1965, 42 U.S.C. 1973c, concerning the annexation made by the City in 1976. As you know, a Section 5 objection to the voting changes occasioned by the annexation has been outstanding since December 3, 1976.

In the December 3, 1976, Section 5 objection we suggested that the annexation at issue might satisfy the Section 5 test if the City took action to remedy the dilution of minority voting strength resulting from the annexation, that is, "if at-large elections were replaced by a ward system" of election. City of Richmond v. United States, 422 U.S. 358, 370 (1975). Since the objection, the City has been provided more than four years to take the action described or, in the alternative, to seek Section 5 preclearance from the United States District Court for the District of Columbia. On December 21, 1976, we were notified that, upon petition of the voters, a referendum election would be held to present a proposal that the present commission form of government, elected at large, be replaced by a mayor-council form of government with the council members elected by district. The Attorney General granted Section 5 preclearance for the conduct of that referendum in the newly expanded city since the referendum appeared to be a step in the direction of resolving the concerns which led to the Section 5 objection. However, the electorate, in a racially polarized referendum election, rejected the change to the single-member district plan.

Prior to the commission elections of 1977 we again discussed with the former city attorney the City's compliance with the objection. At that time we noted that litigation had been instituted challenging, on constitutional grounds, the at-large election plan (Kirksey v. City of Jackson) and that that litigation might provide another vehicle for altering the at-large election scheme and thereby remedy the concerns which led to the Section 5 objection. On that basis, we notified the City that we would not institute legal proceedings to enjoin implementation of the voting changes caused by the annexation in the 1977 elections. However, the City opposed the relief requested by the Kirksey plaintiffs and, to this date, the litigation has not remedies the dilution which resulted in the Section 5 objection.

We are aware that municipal elections will again be conducted in June 1981. Unless the City obtains a withdrawal of the Section 5 objection prior to the election, the voting changes occasioned by the 1976 annexation may not be implemented in the 1981 election. In other words, as long as the objection is outstanding the citizens in the annexed area may not legally participate in the election. In this regard I request that you notify me within twenty days as to what action the City plans to take to comply with Section 5 in the upcoming election.

Our staff remains willing to work with you and city officials in an effort to resolve this matter. However, our efforts over the past four years to obtain voluntary compliance with federal law have not been successful and thus, if the City is unwilling to remedy the concerns which led to the objection or to exclude the annexed area from participation in the 1981 election, we will be required to institute legal proceedings to obtain compliance with federal law. Of course, the City also retains the option to seek Section 5 preclearance of the annexation from the United States District Court for the District of Columbia.

If you have any questions, please feel free to contact Mr. Robert Kwan at 202/724-7436; Mr. Kwan is the attorney in our Voting Section who has been assigned to handle this matter.

We look forward to hearing from you.

Re: Section 5 Objection to the City of Jackson Annexation

Dear Mr. Turner:

I am writing to urge the Department of Justice to file suit to enforce its December 3, 1976 Section 5 objection to the City of Jackson's 1976 annexation prior to the upcoming May 12 municipal primaries to insure that the rights of black voters in Jackson secured by the Voting Rights Act of 1965 are protected and not diluted in the May 12 voting.

On December 3, 1976 the Attorney General determined that the City of Jackson had engaged in a series of annexations of predominantly white areas (1960--over 90% white, 1971--84.5% white, 1976--74% white) which offset increases in the black population percentage and prevented blacks in Jackson from gaining a majority of the total population. Because Jackson City Council elections are conducted on an at-large basis in citywide voting, these successive annexations substantially submerged black voting strength in Jackson in the newly annexed white vote, thus preventing black voters from having a great influence in municipal elections or even electing candidates of their choice to city government. In the Section 5 objection letter, Assistant Attorney General J. Stanley Pottinger, acting on behalf of the Attorney General, concluded:

> "Thus the dilutive effect of the annexation combined with a system of election that minimizes the opportunity for minorities to be elected and with the existence of racial bloc voting makes it impossible for the Attorney General > to conclude that the 1976 annexation will not have a racially discriminatory effect."

That objection has not been withdrawn, and no action has been filed by the City of Jackson in the District Court for the District of Columbia seeking to overturn that objection.

The Section 5 objection letter made clear to Jackson officials that "the objection does preclude the conduct of municipal elections in the annexed area." However, since the objection was interposed, the City of Jackson has conducted municipal elections in the newly annexed area and has included the precinct tallies from that area in the official returns. In his January 23, 1981 opinion in Kirksey v. City of Jackson, Civil No. J77-0075(N) (S.D. Miss.) our lawsuit challenging the constitutionality of the at-large voting system, District Judge Walter L. Nixon, Jr., found that the Department has failed to enforce this objection:

> "The Justice Department did not object to any of the citizens in the annexed area voting [since 1976], and thus, they did vote in the 1977 referendum and have voted since in all municipal elections, as evidenced by the testimony of Mrs. Evelyn Ballard, Jackson City Clerk." Supp. Mem. Op., pp. 46-47.

We urge you to take immediate court action pursuant to Section 12(d) to enforce this 1976 objection and to prevent the City of Jackson from including the votes cast in the newly annexed area in the May primary and June municipal election returns. Failure to take effective enforcement action will be widely interpreted as representing a retreat by the Department from its commitment to vigorous enforcement of the laws protecting the right to vote.

May I please have a response from you on what action you plan to take as soon as possible.

Thank you for your consideration of this matter.

Yours very truly,

Washington, D. C. 20006

Dear Jerris:

As you will recall, we met on April 13, at your request, to discuss the longstanding Section 5 objection to the voting changes occasioned by the 1976 annexation by the City of Jackson. At that time, I indicated to you that it was the position of the Department of Justice to enforce the outstanding objection unless the City of Jackson submitted additional information (viz., a revised demographic analysis concerning the annexation based upon the 1980 census) to demonstrate that the factual basis upon which the objection was originally based is in error or unless the City would enter into a Consent Decree with the Justice Department preserving all remedies available to the parties.

As you know, the law is quite clear in authorizing the Department of Justice to enjoin the conduct of elections in the newly expanded section of a city unless and until the necessary Section 5 preclearance is obtained. I am enclosing, for your information, one of the most recent federal court decisions regarding the effect of a Section 5 objection to annexations, Gamble v. Town of Clio, C.A. No. 80-456-N (M.D. Ala., March 5, 1981). In that case, the three judge court held that unprecleared annexations "are legally unenforceable and the votes of persons residing in these annexed areas are without effect in determining the persons legally elected to office." Id. at p.3.

As I indicated to you in our April 13 meeting, the Justice Department is willing to enter into a Consent Decree that would permit the conduct of the regularly scheduled election this year provided that the City of Jackson undertake to obtain a resolution of this issue. The matter could be resolved in one of three ways. First the City could enact or otherwise obtain the legislation necessary to alter the at-large structure to remedy dilution and to implement the new plan. Although regularly scheduled elections would not be enjoined by the Consent Decree, the order would provide for an election in compliance with federal law at the earliest possible date. Similar relief was recently ordered in United States v. Clarke County Commission, C.A. No. 80-0457-P (S. D. Ala. Oct. 24, 1980); a copy of that decision is enclosed for your information.

Second, the City could file with the Attorney General a request for a reconsideration of the objection or, third, it could seek preclearance from the United States District Court for the District of Columbia. However, absent preclearance of the annexation by the District of Columbia court or withdrawal of the objection by the Attorney General, a new election would have to be conducted by a date certain under a new plan which remedies the dilution caused by the annexation (and therefore satisfies the Section 5 standards) or, if the requirements of Section 5 have not been satisfied by that date, a new election would have to be held without the inclusion of voters in the annexed area at issue. Of course the length of the provisional terms and the timing of the new election would be dependent upon the amount of time required to obtain the necessary legislation; those timeframes could be established through discussions between you and our staff.

I would appreciate your discussing this matter with City officials and notifying me as to whether a voluntary resolution is possible. We are prepared to discuss this matter further with you and, if you feel the idea is worth pursuing, will prepare an appropriate Consent Decree.

In our meeting of April 13, you advised me that you would respond to our proposals for resolving this matter as soon as you had the opportunity to discuss the proposals with your client. Because the election is fast approaching, I respectfully request that you respond by Wednesday, May 6. We will take no further action during this period in the hope that a Consent Decree can be prepared and filed.

We look forward to hearing from you and it is our hope that this longstanding problem will be resolved promptly.

Sincerely,

HAND DELIVERED

Jerris Leonard, Esq.
Leonard, Gettings & Sher
1700 Pennsylvania Avenue, N.W.
Suite 550
Washington, D. C. 20006

Dear Jerris:

I am writing to you in your capacity as counsel to the City of Jackson, Mississippi in connection with the City's compliance with the requirements of Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act of 1965, 42 U.S.C. 1973c.

As you are aware, by letter dated February 17, 1981, we requested that the city attorney tell us as to what action the City intended to take to comply with the December 3, 1976, Section 5 objection to the voting changes occasioned by a 1976 annexation to the City. The February 17, 1981, letter stated in part:

> Unless the city obtains a withdrawal of the Section 5 objection prior to the election, the voting changes occasioned by the 1976 annexation may not be implemented in the 1981 election. In other words, as long as the objection is outstanding the citizens in the annexed area may not legally participate in the election.

Since then we have exchanged correspondence with the city attorney and have met with you on two occasions in an effort to resolve this matter. Although at our most recent meeting with you, held on May 5, 1981, you stated that the City desires to seek reconsideration of the objection, there has been no commitment that the City will comply with the objection unless and until it is withdrawn. Notwithstanding our efforts to obtain voluntary compliance with federal law, our understanding is that the City intends to implement the unprecleared voting changes in the election which will begin on May 12, 1981, with the first primary. A three-judge federal court has recently described similar conduct by officials of an Alabama city under like factual circumstances as follows:

> Defendants sought the approval of the Attorney General for the proposed annexation, and when they failed to get such approval, they proceeded in violation of the law. Officials charged with administering the law should be most careful to obey, not defy the statutes under which all United States citizens are governed.

Gamble v. Town of Clio, Civ. No. 80-456-N (March 5, 1981) at 2-3.

It is our understanding that the City intends to hold its 1981 elections by including in the electorate the areas annexed in 1976. Because of the short time remaining before the elections and the disruptive nature of last minute litigation, we will not seek to enjoin or delay the election process. However, if the 1981 elections are conducted in a manner violative of federal law, and if the objection is not resolved and remains outstanding, we will be obligated to take prompt action to enforce the provisions of the Voting Rights Act. We should advise you that the relief we seek may involve an order shortening the terms of the persons elected and requiring that a new election in compliance with federal law be conducted.

We also understand that the City intends to keep separate the ballots cast in the annexed area so as to have them available for use in any challenge which may result and we would urge that the City do so.

Because of the time constraints under which we are operating we are hand delivering this letter to your office and we will telephone the city attorney and read to him the contents of this letter. Also, because of the intense public interest we feel constrained, upon request, to provide the information in this letter to the public.

Sincerely,

James P. Turner

COCHRAN-LOTT, ONE-TWO PUNCH ATTACK STIRS CONTROVERSY IN FEDERAL AGENCIES

(By Johanna Neuman)

WASHINGTON.—Rep. Trent Lott of Mississippi remembers standing in his Pascagoula home sometime last summer, staring out at the Gulf of Mexico as he talked on the phone to one of the mayors in his 5th Congressional District.

The mayor of Laurel, W.I. Patrick Jr., was worried that the U.S. Civil Rights Commission had chosen his city to use as the focal point for a film about the at-large system of municipal elections. The commission wanted to examine in what parts of town federal revenue sharing dollars are spent by city fathers who are elected citywide, rather than by districts.

Patrick himself was facing re-election early in 1981, and did not want any additional attention from the U.S. Civil Rights Commission. As it turned out, the film painted a picture of Laurel as a city divided by its railroad tracks and racially segregated by its economics. Laurel-Laurel: A City Divided was not a favorite with the mayor, who lost his re-election bid.

Lott, an eight-year veteran of Congress, did not do anything about the mayor's concern right away. In fact, the Republican congressman says, he dragged his feet.

But after Ronald Reagan, another Republican who advocated states' rights during the 1980 campaign, was sworn in as president in January, Lott, who by then had become minority whip of the House, went to work.

Joined by Mississippi's Republican senator, Thad Cochran, Lott made calls and sent letters to the commission—all with the same theme.

"I am appalled that the commission would undertake such an endeavor," Lott wrote in one letter that called the completed documentary one-sided.

Cochran, meanwhile, was blasting away at the Civil Rights Commission from his post on the Senate Appropriations Committee. During one subcommittee hearing on the Civil Rights Commission's budget, Cochran grilled Director Luis Nunez about the Laurel film.

"I assume (the film) is not an effort to influence action by the Congress to use a appropriated funds, is it?" Cochran asked.

When Nunez replied that it was not, Cochran added, "For instance, the extension of the Voting Rights Act?" The act requires certain states, primarily in the South, to obtain prior approval from the Justice Department or U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia for any voting changes that might affect minority voting strength.

Cochran, who wants the Voting Rights Act's provisions extended nationwide, said later that he never meant to threaten the commission with an implied fight over its funding. But he acknowledged with a grin that federal agency directors "tend to listen better" when they appear before an Appropriations subcommittee.

The fuss initiated by Mayor Patrick about the Laurel film and escalated with effective Washington muscle by Cochran and Lott won a 30-day delay in the film's completion so the mayor could add a protest.

Critics within the agency lament the delay, and wonder if it was not timed to give the mayor a breather during the re-election campaign, or to skirt presentation to the Judiciary subcommittee holding spring hearings on the Voting Rights Act.

This, Cochran and Lott deny. But what they do not deny—what they in fact seem proud of—is that their involvement in the dispute is only one in a series of instances where the two have intervened in the affairs of ostensibly independent federal agencies.

"I haven't done anything other members don't do or my predecessor didn't do," Lott said during an interview in his minority whip office at the Capitol. "I'm thankful I'm in a position where I can effect some change."

Added Cochran, "There's nothing remiss or out of line. I would not have been fulfilling my function if I had not brought these complaints of my constituents to the attention of the federal agencies."

Throughout the Cochran and Lott interviews runs a corollary theme. Not only do the two Mississippi Republicans see their intervention with federal agencies as part of their jobs as ombudsmen for constituents, but they also believe the federal agencies are riddled with lower-level and career bureaucrats who served under Democrat Jimmy Carter and are not especially attuned to the policies of Republican Ronald Reagan.

"Termites," said Lott in describing what he views as the infestation of the State Department with closet Carterites. Clean out the bugs, the minority whip recently told Secretary of State Alexander Haig, or lose Republican House support for the foreign aid bill.

Some federal bureaucrats are angered by what they perceive as blatant and unethical political interference by Cochran and Lott.

"I resented it," said one federal bureaucrat who insisted on anonymity. "It has a chilling effect," said a staffer in another agency who likewise asked not to be named.

But others within the federal agencies lean more toward the view that Cochran and Lott are merely asserting the right of conservatives to call the shots now that they are in power.

"It used to be that the NAACP could walk in here and practically write policy," said one mid-level Justice Department official who also asked not to be named. "Now it's their turn."

Often in their intervention in federal agency matters, Cochran and Lott have used a good cop-bad cop routine, with the Republican senator delivering a mild letter of protest or a complaint couched as an inquiry, and the Republican whip following up with a blistering protest or dramatic insistence that something give.

The two Republicans—whose backers historically have been at war within the state Republican Party—say they usually do not coordinate their attack.

Organized or not, the Cochran-Lott, one-two punch has stirred controversy in agencies from the Justice Department to the Internal Revenue Service, from the civil rights division at Justice to the federal courthouse in north Mississippi.

The first evidence of their intervention came with the dispute involving the Civil Rights Commission's documentary on Laurel. Cochran and Lott have been rolling up coups ever since.

It is early March. Municipal primary elections in Mississippi are coming up, and city officials in Jackson are upset.

The Justice Department has just written asking Jackson to comply with the 1976 objection lodged under Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act to the annexation of white suburbs.

The administration of Dale Danks Jr., who was elected mayor in 1977, tells the Justice Department that Jackson officials assumed the annexation had been cleared with the Justice Department by the previous city administration.

The current city fathers include City Commissioner Nielsen Cochran, who called brother Thad Cochran in Washington.

Sen. Cochran gets on the phone to the Justice Department. Lott has a face-to-face meeting with the Justice Department's top political aide, Edward C. Schmults, in which he mentions the case of Jackson, a city not in his congressional district.

Rev. Jesse Jackson, the civil rights activist from Chicago, is winning national headlines with his calls for the Justice Department to enforce its 1976 objection. He charges that the annexed votes could hurt the mayoral campaign of state Sen. Henry Kirksey, a black. But less than a month before the June 2 general election, the Justice Department backs off, telling the city to hold the election but keep the annexed votes separate, in case there is a later dispute.

Cochran: "This (mayoral) administration assumed that the past administration had worked out an arrangement with the Justice Department. Then all of a sudden, the city gets this letter reminding the city that the annexation was never approved. Why didn't they say something about it two years ago?"

Lott: "It was an untenable situation. All we said to the Justice Department was, 'Can't you make a clear statement one way or the other?' I feel toward the Justice Department just like I did four years ago. Those are the same damn people."

Cochran: "I got the impression they were third- and fourth-level bureaucrats, not new administration appointees. I only asked the high echelon people to take a look at the Jackson problem."

It is late April. The Justice Department has asked U.S. District Judge William C. Keady to allow federal agents, including the FBI, to inspect local Mississippi jails. The Justice Department said it wanted to determine whether state prisoners are being housed in inadequate facilities at county jails in an effort to circumvent Keady's orders on jail standards at the Mississippi State Penitentiary at Parchman.

The state attorney general sends two emissaries to Washington to visit Cochran and Lott. Cochran calls the Justice Department to inquire about the case. Lott gets Schmults to ask the court for a three-week delay in the lawsuit while a compromise is worked out with the state attorney general's office. Keady later agrees to the compromise negotiated through Lott's office, a congressionally inspired deal that allows state officials, rather than federal agents, to inspect the jails.

Cochran: "Two assistant (state) attorneys general came by to see me. They were concerned that the Justice Department was enlarging its litigation to include all the jails where state prisoners are temporarily housed. It sounded as if it was a case invloving policy questions that was being decided by some hyperactive low-level bureaucrats who had just been turned loose on streets in every town hall in Mississippi. I wanted to bring it to the attention of the head man."

Lott: "The Justice Department is absolutely and totally out of order trying to tell local county jails what to have in their systems. I do not back up one moment on that one. Yes, we've got penal problems in Mississippi, but they do in New York and Maryland too."

Lott is reminded that this is a pending lawsuit, not a policy decision, that a doctrine of separation of powers is involved.

"Yes, I know, I know. But I just feel so strongly about that—that it is a policy decision that the Justice Department had to make whether to send agents into county jails. It's not an individual criminal matter. It's a policy decision. It's a fundamental federalist question. I acknowledge that it is unusual, probably."

It is early March. The Internal Revenue Service has been preparing to implement regulations stripping church and private schools that discriminate against minorities of their tax exempt status. The regulations are the result of a lawsuit brought by Mississippi parents on behalf of their children, but the IRS has been trying to implement them nationwide. Because of that, Congress has attached a rider to the IRS appropriations every year precluding the agency from implementing new regulations.

This year, before the congressional battle even begins, Cochran convenes a meeting of the Mississippi delegation at the Capitol with the newly appointed commissioner of the IRS, Roscoe Egger Jr. Also attending are representatives from the Justice and Treasury departments.

Cochran tells the IRS commissioner that the regulations would unfairly single out private schools in Mississippi, that even parishioners who contributed to their church could not write off their donations as tax deductible if the church's school was found to discriminate.

Egger tells Cochran and the others, according to a staffer who sat in on the meeting, that the government is "proceeding slowly and carefully in evaluating efforts by the schools to comply with the regulations."

Three months later, while the IRS is still slowly surveying the record of Mississippi's private schools, a U.S. Circuit Court in the District of Columbia opens the lawsuit to out-of-state plaintiffs. With the case going nationwide, the IRS waits.

Cochran: "None of the efforts I made were directed toward the court. I do think that would be inappropriate. The purpose of my involvement was to see that the concerns of the school districts were brought to the attention of the federal agency so they would be fully advised of the practical effects."

Lott: "Mississippi is the only state in the nation where they have sent IRS investigators to go in there on a witchhunt to religious schools, which again gets to a fundamental constitutional question. We consciously escalated the rhetoric on that one."

Lott said he was prepared to escalate the rhetoric in the IRS case even further by filing a friend of the court brief, but backed off when it became clear that Commissioner Egger was "very attentive," and that "since the case seemed to be taking a turn for the better that we would not press the case."

Howard C. Ross, Jr., Esq.
City Attorney
City of Jackson
P. O. Box 17
Jackson, Mississippi 39205

Dear Mr. Ross:

This is in reference to the 1976 annexation to the City of Jackson in Hinds County, Mississippi, transmitted to the Attorney General pursuant to Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act of 1965, as amended, 42 U.S.C. 1973c. Your transmittal was received on May 23, 1981. We consider your transmittal to be a request for reconsideration of the Attorney General's previous objection to the 1976 annexation. See Section 51.44 of the Procedures for the Administration of Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act of 1965, as amended.

We have carefully reviewed the materials you submitted, the information furnished by others and our entire file on this matter. Based upon our thorough re-evaluation, including consultation with the Deputy Attorney General, we have concluded that the objection to the 1976 annexation to the City of Jackson should be withdrawn for the reasons discussed below.

First, it has never been considered that this annexation of approximately 28,000 persons was purposefully designed or carried out to dilute minority voting strength in the City. Indeed, the annexation was based in part on a commitment to contradict such an inference from a largely white annexation in 1971 and in fact about one-third of the persons in the annexed area are minorities. Compare City of Rome v. United States, 446 U. S. 156 (1980). Those minority persons may now vote in City elections and will have proportionally greater voting strength than before the annexation. The voting opportunities of those persons were thus enhanced by the annexation. Indeed, as the information you submitted suggests, all black areas reasonably within the range of annexation have been included.

Second, the objection to the annexation, entered December 3, 1976, was based solely on a dilutive effect on the black vote which as originally calculated was approximately 2%. The first request for reconsideration was denied on April 26, 1977, but the denial letter acknowledged that the dilution could be as low as 1.4%. The 1980 Census data you provided confirm that as of the present time those estimates were approximately correct. Where the dilutive effect is that low, the other factors discussed in this letter assume more significance than situations where there is a more substantial effect.

Third, for the reasons described in my letter of February 17, 1981, there was no attempt to enforce the 1976 objection by seeking judicial intervention to prevent elections from being held in the annexed area and this Department, on at least two occasions acquiesed in the conduct of such elections. Although in each instance government acquiescence may have been justified by the circumstances, the holding of elections involving the annexed areas has contributed to a community sense that the new area was in fact a part of Jackson. We understand that the black citizens in the annexed area have been politically active in City elections. Moreover, as you point out in each of the three elections held since the objection, the inclusion of the vote of the annexed area did not affect the results. Actual experience in elections thus cast doubt on the apparent dilutive effect perceived at the time of the objection.

Finally, in absolute terms, the size of the minority community has increased significantly. At the time of the objection in 1976, it was estimated that the minority population in the enlarged city was about 38 percent. According to the 1980 Census information it is now 46.8%. Thus, in the intervening years it is possible that some portion of the apparent dilution discerned in 1976 has been cured by unrelated population movement.

For all of the above reasons, this case is, in many respects, an atypical one. On balance, it is concluded that the most appropriate disposition of the matter is for the Attorney General to withdraw the 1976 objection to the annexation.

I should point out, however, that this should not be construed in any way as a determination that the at-large commissioner system in Jackson satisfies federal constitutional requirements. That issue is pending on appeal before the Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit in Kirksey, et al. v. City of Jackson, Mississippi, et al. The United States' brief as amicus curiae in that case maintains that the at-large commissioner form of government was originally designed and has been maintained to prevent black citizens from enjoying full participation in Jackson's city government in violation of the Constitution. Under the unique circumstances presented in Jackson, we have concluded that the better means of addressing needed reforms in city governance is through a judicial decision in the pending constitutional litigation.

Sincerely,

James P. Turner

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS ON THE SECTION 2 "RESULTS" STANDARD OF S. 1992

INTRODUCTION

Section 2 of S. 1992 would amend Section 2 of the Voting Rights Act of 1965 as follows:

> No voting qualification or prerequisite to voting, or standard, practice, or procedure shall be imposed or applied by any state or political subdivision in a manner which results in a denial or abridgment of the right of any citizen of the United States to vote on account of race or color, or in contravention of the guarantees set forth in Section 4(f)(2). The fact that members of a minority group have not been elected in numbers equal to the group's proportion of the population shall not, in and of itself, constitute a violation of this section. [New matter underlined.]

This section is identical to Section 2 of H.R. 3112 which was overwhelmingly passed by the House of Representatives on October 5 by a vote of 389-24. The amendment was strongly supported by a bipartisan coalition in the House, and efforts to delete it were rejected on the House floor by a voice vote. The House bill, on final passage, received a unanimous vote from the South Carolina, Louisiana, and Florida House delegations, and received a majority of the votes of the House delegations from Alabama, Georgia, Mississippi, North Carolina, and Texas.

1. WHAT IS THE PURPOSE OF THE SECTION 2 AMENDMENT?

The Section 2 amendment is designed to resolve the uncertainty and confusion caused by the Supreme Court's decision in City of Mobile v. Bolden, 446 U.S. 55 (1980), and to restate the original legislative intent of Congress that proof of discriminatory intent is not required to establish a violation of Section 2 of the Voting Rights Act.

Prior to Mobile, courts held that Section 2 of the Voting Rights Act > prohibits the imposition of any practice or procedure which has the effect of denying or abridging the right of any citizens to vote on account of race or color.

Toney v. White, 476 F.2d 203, 207 (5th Cir. 1973) (emphasis added).

In City of Mobile v. Bolden, a plurality of the Supreme Court, but not a majority, construed Section 2 of the Voting Rights Act to require proof of discriminatory intent. Justices White, Blackmun and Stevens did not discuss the statutory issue, and Justices Marshall and Brennan expressed the view that Section 2 would prohibit voting practices which were discriminatory in purpose or effect. A majority of the Mobile court did, however, rule that the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments prohibit only those voting practices adopted or retained for a racially discriminatory purpose.

As indicated by the House Judiciary Committee report (H.R. Rep. No. 97-227, pp. 29-30), the purpose of this amendment is to restate the original legislative intent of Congress that proof of discriminatory intent is not required to establish a violation of Section 2 of the Voting Rights Act. As Attorney General Nicholas deB. Katzenbach, who played a key role in drafting the 1965 Act and explaining the operation to Congress, testified in the 1965 hearings, Section 2 of the Act was designed to prohibit "any kind of practice . . . if its purpose or effect was to deny or abridge the right to vote on account of race or color." Senate Hearings, p. 191 (1965).

The original understanding was reiterated by congressional leaders when the Voting Rights Act was extended in 1970 and 1975. For example, in 1970 Attorney General John Mitchell supported a bill to repeal the Federal preclearance requirement of Section 5 and substitute a provision allowing the Justice Department to bring suit to enjoin any voting law which was racially discriminatory in "purpose or effect." This proposal was defeated after a number of Senate leaders, including several who had been co-sponsors of the original Act in 1965, explained that the Justice Department already had this authority under Section 2 of the 1965 Act. 116 Cong. Rec. 5523, 5527 (1970).

2. WHAT WOULD MINORITY VOTERS HAVE TO PROVE TO SATISFY THE NEW SECTION 2 "RESULTS" STANDARD?

As indicated in the House Report (H.R. Rep. No. 97-221, pp. 29-30), the proposed "results" standard is designed to restore the pre-Mobile understanding of the proper legal standard which focuses on the results and consequences of an allegedly discriminatory voting law rather than on the intent or motivation behind it. The application of this standard is illustrated in Whitcomb v. Chavis, 1/ White v. Regester, 2/ and Zimmer v. McKeithen. 3/ Merely a discriminatory effect measured by the absence of minority office holders would not be sufficient. Minority voters would have to prove that the challenged electoral law or practice denied minority voters equal access to the political process.

Some have erroneously charged that the new Section 2 "results" standard would lead to the wholesale elimination of all at-large election systems everywhere in the Nation. They contend that it would be difficult to imagine a political entity containing a significant minority population without proportional representation that would not be in violation of the Section 2 amendment. This is simply incorrect and grossly distorts the intent of this amendment. The House Report clearly states (p. 30):

> Not all at-large election systems would be prohibited under this amendment, however, but only those which are imposed or applied in a manner which accomplishes a discriminatory result.

In Whitcomb v. Chavis black voters challenged at-large voting in multi-member legislative districts in Marion County, (Indianapolis) Indiana. The Supreme Court held that the mere fact that black "ghetto" voters were not proportionately represented, did not show invidious discrimination > absence evidence and findings that ghetto residents had less opportunity than did other Marion County residents to participate in the political processes and to elect legislators of their choice. 4/

In White v. Regester, on the other hand, the Supreme Court held that multi-member districts in Dallas and Bexar Counties denied minority voters equal access to the political process on findings of the District Court which showed:

1/ 403 U.S. 124 (1971).

2/ 412 U.S. 755, 765-70 (1973).

3/ 485 F.2d 1297 (5th Cir. 1973) (en banc), aff'd on other grounds sub nom. East Carroll Parish School Board v. Marshall, 424 U.S. 636 (1977).

4/ 403 U.S. at 149.

--A "history of official racial discrimination in Texas, which, at times, touched the right of Negroes to register and vote and to participate in the democratic processes."

--A majority vote requirement for party primaries and a "place" or post requirement limiting candidates to a specified "place" on the ballot, which were not "in themselves improper nor invidious, [but which] enhanced the opportunity for racial discrimination."

--No subdistrict residency requirement for candidates, meaning that "all candidates may be selected from outside the Negro residential area."

--Since Reconstruction, only two black candidates from Dallas County had been elected to the Texas House of Representatives, and these two were the only blacks ever slated by the Dallas Committee for Responsible Government, a white-dominated slating group.

--The slating group did not need the support of the black community to win elections, and did not exhibit good-faith concern for the needs and aspirations of the black community.

--The slating group had employed "racial campaign tactics in white precincts to defeat candidates who had the overwhelming support of the black community."

--The Mexican-American community of San Antonio had long "suffered from, and continues to suffer from, the results and effects of invidious discrimination and treatment in the fields of education, employment, economics, health, politics and others."

--Mexican-Americans suffered "a cultural and language barrier that makes [their] participation in the community processes extremely difficult . . ."

--A history of a discriminatory poll tax and restrictive voter registration procedures which continued to have a residual impact reflected in disporportionately low voter registration levels.

--Only five Mexican-Americans had served on the Texas Legislature, and only two were from the barrio area.

--The Bexar County legislative delegation in the House "was insufficiently responsive to Mexican-American interests."

--A pattern of racially polarized voting showing that "race is still an important issue in Bexar County and that because of it, Mexican-Americans are frozen into permanent political minorities destined for constant defeat at the hands of the controlling political majorities."

These findings showed that based on "the totality of the circumstances" Mexican-Americans were "effectively removed from the political processes . . ." 5/

This equal-access-to-the-political-process standard was then implemented and applied by the Fifth Circuit in Zimmer. The Court correctly noted that disproportionate minority representation was not sufficient to show a violation:

> Clearly, it is not enough to prove a mere disparity between the number of minority residents and the number of minority representatives. 6/

The Zimmer court also correctly held that the existence of two or three of these factors would not suffice:

> The fact of dilution is established upon proof of the existence of an aggregate of these factors. The Supreme Court's recent pronouncement in White v. Regester, supra, demonstrates, however, that all these factors need not be proved in order to obtain relief. 7/

Applying this pre-Mobile standard, courts in numerous cases--both in the South and in the North--rejected challenges to at-large election systems alleged to dilute minority voting strength. See, for example, Whitcomb v. Chavis, 403 U.S. 124 (1971) (Indianapolis, Indiana); McGill v. Gadsden County Commission, 535 F.2d 277 (5th Cir. 1976) (Gadsden County, Fla.) (only four Zimmer elements proven); David v. Garrison, 553 F.2d 926 (5th Cir. 1977) (Lufkin, Texas) (no proof of denial of equal access to the political process); Blacks United for Lasting Leadership, Inc. v. City of Shreveport, 571 F.2d 248 (5th Cir. 1978) (Shreveport, La.) (District Court findings inadequate to meet the standard); Dove v. Moore, 539 F.2d 1152 (8th Cir. 1976) (Pine Bluff, Ark.) (burden of White v. Regester not met); Black Voters v. McDonough, 565 F.2d 1 (1st Cir. 1977) (Boston, Mass.) (no denial of equal access proven).

3. WHY SHOULDN'T PLAINTIFFS CHALLENGING DISCRIMINATORY VOTING LAWS BE REQUIRED TO PROVE DISCRIMINATORY INTENT?

In some areas of the country, black and Hispanic voters are denied equal access to the political process by racial gerrymandering, discriminatory at-large elections, and other electoral devices which minimize and cancel out minority voting strength. In Mobile, Alabama, for example, blacks constitute 35 percent of the population, but no black person has been elected to the all-white city council since at-large voting was adopted in 1911. Unless minority voters are able to overcome these discriminatory barriers to equal participation, these communities can continue to cling to these unjust voting schemes.

So debate over the "intent" requirement is not merely a matter of losing or winning lawsuits, as some have contended. Instead, it involves the critical issue of whether racially discriminatory voting laws not covered by the Section 5 preclearance requirement can ever be eliminated, or whether black and Hispanic voters should continue to be shut out of the electoral process.

For minority citizens whose votes are diluted or cancelled out by discriminatory voting laws, proving discriminatory intent is extremely difficult, and in most cases, impossible. Proving intent ultimately requires a determination of what was in the minds of legislators who enacted or maintained a voting law alleged to be discriminatory. And, in most cases, the best sources of evidence of discriminatory motivation are cut off by practical and legal barriers:

--Many discriminatory voting and election laws were adopted years ago by legislators who are now dead. As the Birmingham (Alabama) Post-Herald noted in an editorial supporting the House-passed bill, "It would be a neat trick to subpoena them from their graves for testimony about their racial motivations."

--Testimony from live legislators who authored or supported discriminatory legislation generally is prohibited by the "legislative privilege" rule, which prevents litigants from cross-examining legislators concerning their motivation. 1/

--Recently, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit, where most voting rights cases originate, ruled that the motivation of the voters in adopting and retaining election procedures by popular referendum is immune from judicial inquiry. 2/

1/ Village of Arlington Heights v. Metropolitan Housing Development Corp., 429 U.S. 252, 268 (1977).

2/ Kirksey v. City of Jackson, 663 F.2d 659 (5th Cir. 1981).

In the absence of a "smoking gun," litigants must resort to circumstantial evidence producing "inferences," "suspicions," and "likelihoods" of discriminatory intent. Here, judges and legal commentators frequently disagree, often strenuously, on what constitutes sufficient proof. The nine Justices of the Supreme Court in the Mobile case itself were unable to agree on a majority opinion setting forth the proper legal standard for proving discriminatory intent. The plurality opinion in Mobile was strongly criticized by the Harvard Law Review as "disappointing because it refused to draw inferences [of discriminatory intent] that are reasonable in light of the Court's intent decisions . . ." 3/

Opponents of the Section 2 amendment argue that the Supreme Court repeatedly has held that direct evidence of discriminatory intent is not required, and that intent can be proved by circumstantial evidence. However, in all those cases, 4/ the plaintiffs lost and the Supreme Court held that the circumstantial evidence presented was not sufficient to show a constitutional violation.

4. HASN'T THE SUPREME COURT ALWAYS REQUIRED PROOF OF DISCRIMINATORY INTENT?

City of Mobile v. Bolden represents a radical departure by the Supreme Court from prior voting rights cases. In prior cases, the Court had said that unconstitutional dilution of minority voting strength could be proved by "an invidious result" and "totality of circumstances" showing that a challenged practice denied minorities equal access to the political process, regardless of motivation. Both the District Court and the Court of Appeals held in Mobile that, under this prior standard, a constitutional violation had been shown. However, a slim majority of the Court reversed, applying instead a new standard requiring strict proof of discriminatory intent.

Under Mobile, as the courts have said in vacating and remanding cases decided under this prior standard for reconsideration in light of Mobile, "the rules of the game are changed;" 1/ the prior standard has been "declared to be improper." 2/

This abrupt reversal was most dramatically illustrated in McCain v. Lybrand, a challenge to at-large elections for the Edgefield County (South Carolina) Council. In April, 1980 the District Court, applying the prior cases, held that the black voter plaintiffs had proved that at-large voting unconstitutionally diluted black voting strength. Five days later, the Mobile decision was handed down, and the District Court abruptly reversed itself, vacated its prior judgment, and sustained the constitutionality of the discriminatory at-large scheme.

Here's how this change occurred:

(1) In two of the earliest vote dilution cases, Fortson v. Dorsey (1965) 3/ and Burns v. Richardson (1966) 4/, the Supreme Court indicated that multi-member districts would be unconstitutional if it could be shown that > designedly or otherwise, a multi-member constituency scheme, under the circumstances of a particular case, would operate to minimize or cancel out the voting strength of racial or political elements of the voting population. 5/

1/ Jones v. City of Lubbock, 640 F.2d 777, 778 (5th Cir. 1981) (Goldberg, J., concurring).

2/ Kirksey v. City of Jackson, 625 F.2d 21 (5th Cir. 1980); accord: Corder v. Kirksey, 639 F.2d 1191, (5th Cir. 1981).

3/ 379 U.S. 433 (1965).

4/ 384 U.S. 73 (1966).

5/ 379 U.S. at 439; 384 U.S. at 88.

The court indicated that this standard would be satisfied by proof of "an invidious result." 6/

(2) Then, in the Jackson, Mississippi, swimming pool closing case decided in 1971, Palmer v. Thompson, the Supreme Court held that proof of discriminatory intent was not relevant to showing a constitutional violation because of the inherent difficulties in proving discriminatory intent:

> . . . [N]o case in this Court has held that a legislative act may violate equal protection solely because of the motivations of the men who voted for it. * * * First, it is extremely difficult for a court to ascertain the motivation, or collection of different motivations, that lie behind a legislative enactment . . . . It is difficult or impossible for any court to determine the "sole" or "dominant" motivation behind the choices of a group of legislators. Furthermore, there is an element of futility in a judicial attempt to invalidate a law because of the bad motives of its supporters. If the law is struck down for this reason, rather than because of its facial content or effect, it would presumably be valid as soon as the legislature or relevant governing body repassed it for different reasons. 7/

Prior cases, including the Tuskegee gerrymander case, Gomillion v. Lightfoot, 8/ were held not to rest on proof of discriminatory intent:

> But the focus on those cases was on the actual effect of the enactments, not upon the motivation which led the States to behave as they did. 9/

(3) In Whitcomb v. Chavis (1971)10/ and White v. Regester, (1973)11/ two cases challenging multi-member legislative districts, the Supreme Court held that the focus should be, not on the motivation of the legislators, but on the "totality of the circumstances:"

> To sustain such claims, it is not enough that the racial group allegedly discriminated against has not had legislative seats in proportion to its voting potential. The plaintiffs' burden is to > produce evidence to support findings that the political processes leading to nomination and election were not equally open to participation by the group in question--that its members had less opportunity than did other residents in the district to participate in the political processes and to elect legislators of their choice.12/

The principles declared in those cases were implemented and followed by the lower courts in Zimmer v. McKeithen 13/ and other cases. Indeed, the Zimmer court carefully paid heed to what the Supreme Court said in the Jackson swimming pool case:

> In Palmer v. Thompson [citation omitted] the Supreme Court stated that although its past decisions contain language which suggests that motive or purpose behind a law is relevant to its constitutionality, these decisions, including Gomillion v. Lightfoot [citation omitted] focused on the actual effect of the legislation being challenged, and not the reason why the legislation was enacted.14/

(4) Then the Supreme Court reversed itself in Washington v. Davis (1976)15/, an employment discrimination case, and Village of Arlington Heights v. Metropolitan Housing Development Corp. (1977)16/ a discriminatory zoning-fair housing case, and held that "[p]roof of racially discriminatory intent or purpose is required to show a violation of the Equal Protection Clause."

(5) In Mobile, the slim majority chose to apply the Washington v. Davis/Arlington Heights standard requiring strict proof of discriminatory intent, rather than the White v. Regester/Zimmer v. McKeithen "totality of the circumstances" approach. Moreover, in doing this, Justice Stewart, writing for the plurality, openly acknowledged the prior understanding (now called a "misunderstanding") that proof of intent was not required:

> [Zimmer v. McKeithen] was quite evidently decided upon the misunderstanding that it is not necessary to show a discriminatory purpose in order to prove a violation of the Equal Protection Clause--that proof of a discriminatory effect is sufficient.17/

13/ 485 F.2d 1297 (5th Cir. 1973) (en banc), aff'd on other grounds sub nom. East Carroll Parish School Board v. Marshall, 424 U.S. 636 (1977).

16/ 429 U.S. 252, 265 (1977).

17/ 446 U.S. at 71.

The prior standard, in effect at least since 1965, was thus repudiated,18/ and the electoral access of minority voters was conditioned on whether or not they can produce specific evidence of discriminatory intent.

18/ In Mobile and campanion cases, the Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit attempted to fuse these two standards by ruling that the White-Zimmer factors showing denial of equal access to the political process provided "acutely relevant" circumstantial evidence of discriminatory intent. See Nevett v. Sides, 571 F.2d 209 (5th Cir. 1978), cert. denied, 446 U.S. 951 (1980); Bolden v. City of Mobile, 571 F.2d 238 (5th Cir. 1978), rev'd, 446 U.S. 55 (1980). The Supreme Court condemned this effort as "inconsistent with our decisions in Washington v. Davis and Arlington Heights" and ruled that although the presence of these indicia may afford "some evidence," "satisfaction of those criteria is not of itself sufficient." 446 U.S. at 73.

5. WOULD THE NEW SECTION 2 "RESULTS" STANDARD REQUIRE PROPORTIONAL REPRESENTATION BY RACE OR RACIAL QUOTAS?

The language of the Section 2 amendment itself makes it unmistakeably clear that the "results" test is not intended to create a right to proportional representation by race or racial quotas:

> The fact that members of a minority group have not been elected in numbers equal to the group's proportion of the population shall not, in and of itself, constitute a violation of this section.

The "in and of itself" language means that a court may take exclusion of minority representation into consideration, but it would not be the determining factor.

In light of the bill's plain words, raising the specter of "proportional representation" and racial quotas amounts to nothing more than "obfuscation and dithering" (New York Times, January 29, 1982). "The drafters of the House bill went to some trouble to avoid this misapprehension." (Washington Post, December 20, 1981).

The misleading nature of this charge is further demonstrated by the fact that all of the pre-Mobile cases, which, according to the House Report, are intended to reflect the proper application of this standard, specifically disavow any intent to create a right to proportional representation:

Whitcomb v. Chavis:

> Nor does the fact that the number of ghetto residents who were legislators was not in proportion to ghetto population satisfactorily prove invidious discrimination absent evidence and findings that ghetto residents had less opportunity than did other Marion County residents to participate in the political processes and to elect legislators of their choice. (403 U.S. 124, 149.)

White v. Regester:

> To sustain such claims, it is not enough that the racial group allegedly discriminated against has not had legislative seats in proportion to its voting potential. (412 U.S. 755, 765-66.)

Zimmer v. McKeithen:

> Clearly, it is not enough to prove a mere disparity between the number of minority residents and the number of minority representatives. (485 F.2d 1297, 1305.)

Some have erroneously contended that the proposed language specifically disavowing proportional representation would apply only in circumstances in which minority candidates did not run for office, but would not apply where minority candidates ran and failed to gain proportional representation for the minority community. There is no basis for such a grossly distorted view of the House bill either in the statutory language or the legislative history in the House. The Whitcomb case itself illustrates the point that mere "political defeat at the polls" (403 U.S. at 153) for minority candidates does not establish a violation of this standard.

Senator HATCH. Now, our next witness will be Prof. Michael Levin of the City College of New York.

Senator METZENBAUM. Mr. Chairman?

Senator HATCH. Yes.

Senator METZENBAUM. I am going to have to excuse myself for a bit to go to another meeting, but it is my understanding that the last two witnesses, Ms. Abigail Turner and Mr. Armand Durfner, are both witnesses with respect to being against the intent standard and on the same side of the issue. If you would have no objection, I would ask that you reverse the order of calling them. In other words, call Derfner before Turner. They are both on the same side.

Senator HATCH. We put them in this particular order because of the way in which we received the testimony. We would like to keep this in this order. I don't see any reason to change it at this point unless there is some valid reason of which I am presently unaware.

We have tried to keep our witnesses in the same order that we presently have them. That is the way that we received the testimony. That is the order in which we are prepared to proceed.

Senator METZENBAUM. Well, I think that those who are supporting the opposition would like to make that request. It seems like a reasonable request. I don't see why it would in any way affect the chairman's conduct of the hearing.

Senator HATCH. I don't see any problem with that. We will be glad to do that.

Senator METZENBAUM. Thank you.

Senator HATCH. I did have it set up in the order in which the testimony was received.

Senator METZENBAUM. I appreciate it.

Senator HATCH. That kind of causes me some difficulties, but that is fine with me. We will be happy to accommodate you.

Senator METZENBAUM. Thank you, sir.

Senator HATCH. Our next witness will be Prof. Michael Levin of the City College of New York. Professor Levin has written extensively on civil rights issues including the intent/effects issue.

Now, Professor, if you can wait for a second, I have a Cabinet secretary on the phone and I had better take the call. If you will relax, I will be right back.

[Recess taken.]

Senator HATCH. Mr. Levin, I apologize for the delay. I was speaking with the Secretary of Labor, and now I have got a call from the Director of the CIA. We are involved with some very interesting matters. I may have to interrupt the hearing at any time, but I want to get going.

Let me also say that Senator Metzenbaum asked me to reverse the order of witnesses for the last two witnesses, Ms. Turner and Mr. Derfner. I agreed to do that, but I didn't realize that my staff has not even reviewed Mr. Derfner's remarks yet. I didn't have them because they were not in by 5 last night. Therefore, I am going to have to reverse it because I want my staff, at least, to have read his remarks to help me to be prepared so that I may ask some intelligent questions.

With that, we will proceed with you, Mr. Levin, and then Ms. Turner and Mr. Derfner. I apologize in open hearing to Senator Metzenbaum for not realizing that was the problem.

Go ahead, Mr. Levin

STATEMENT OF PROF. MICHAEL LEVIN, DEPARTMENT OF PHILOSOPHY, THE CITY COLLEGE OF NEW YORK

Mr. LEVIN. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. I am going to summarize my statement and ask that the entire statement be included in the record.

Senator HATCH. Without objection, that will be included at the end of your oral testimony.

OVERVIEW

Mr. LEVIN. In Mobile v. Bolden the Supreme Court reaffirmed the intent criterion for judging racially based violations of the right to vote: "The ultimate question remains whether a discriminatory intent has been proved in a given case." Congress now has before it legislation that would replace the intent standard of section 2 of the Voting Rights Act by an effects standard. Instead of forbidding practices which deny or abridge the right to vote on account of race, the proposed amendment to the Voting Rights Act would forbid practices which are applied "in a manner which results in a denial abridgement of" the right to vote on account of race.

I believe this change would be a catastrophic error. It would lead to enormous mischief and pervert the very meaning of the right to vote and violations of that right.

RIGHTS AND INTENT

Since the issue has become a matter of legislative policy it is necessary, in the words of Jefferson, to recur to first principles. What is a right and what is a violation of a right?

The right to do something or be something is the freedom to do or be that thing. A legal right is simply a freedom protected by law, a freedom protected against coercive interference.

Take the right to free speech which the Government is expected to protect. Clearly, this right is not categorical. Germs which constrict my throat do not violate my right to free speech, since violation is an act of the will of a rational being. The State protects me against the thwarting of my liberty by the will of another. Intent, mens rea, is integral to the idea of rights and their protection and is basic to the Anglo-Saxon legal system.

Intent is not all that difficult to determine. Juries decide every day, without benefit of telepathy or smoking guns, between manslaughter and premeditated murder. A man who purchased a one-way ticket to Brazil on the morning of his crime did not kill his wife in a jealous rage. We read intent off behavior. I know that some of you will ask me questions, even though I can't read minds.

CIVIL RIGHTS AND INTENT

The protection of civil rights applies these ideas to race. No one is entitled to thwart another's choice to vote on account of race. Discrimination is the act of thwarting this and other liberties on the basis of race. Like any act, discrimination requires intent. If I drop a banana peel in front of a polling place, I am negligent. If I drop it to disrupt the election, that is worse. But I discriminate only if I pick my victim by color.

Tay-Sachs strikes only Jews, but chromosomes are not anti-Semitic. To divorce discrimination from intent is to abandon the distinction between human action and blind natural forces.

Senator HATCH. Can I interrupt you for just a second? That phone call from Mr. Casey is here and I will be right back.

[Recess taken.]

Senator HATCH. I apologize to you. Go ahead.

Mr. LEVIN. That is perfectly all right. The point is crucial. In the absence of intent, contentious terms like "discriminatory effect" should be replaced by "differential voting patterns."

Even cases contrived to show intent superfluous actually rely on it. If a precinct with 1,000 voting-age blacks has not enrolled a single one, it is asked, do we really need independent inquiry to show discrimination?

This case is compelling only because we know in any real situation that zero black registration is impossible unless someone planned it. Asking about intent seems pointless, not because intent is relevant, but because it is obvious. But suppose intent absent. Suppose 90 percent of eligible black voters sit out an election because a visiting speaker has persuaded them to in order to protest the two-party system. Here a "disproportionately" low turnout was not caused by interference and it is absurd to call it discriminatory. An effect test would, however, forbid speakers to visit such districts before an election.

FORESEEABLE EFFECT

Foreseeable effect as a supposed compromise also falls back on intent. It is based on the notion that people intend the foreseeable effects of their actions, but suppose in our previous example the responsible officials knew beforehand they were permitting a public rally at which minorities would be persuaded not to vote. In permitting the rally, the officials foresee but do not intend to lower black turnout, but only to allow all views to be heard. They do not discriminate.

In fact, foreseeable effect entails liability only when it thwarts the will of another. When Congress passes a bill it knows the President will veto, it is the President, not Congress, who is responsible for the veto. So here. The foreseeable effect was produced by the will of those who stayed home. Anyway, using foreseeable effect would press localities to use ever more sophisticated predicting methods, thus making any effect reasonably foreseeable and collapsing the foreseeable effects test into a pure effects test.

THE DOUBLE STANDARD

The House report struggles with the "confusing" and "ambiguous" intent test. Yet it finds other judicial glosses on the right to vote quite clear. It sees no difficulties in the right to "meaningful" and "effective votes" discovered in Allen and White.

Now does the right to "reliable entry into the political process" mean that your candidate must have a good chance of winning? Such problems did not bother the drafters of the House report even though intent caused much furrowing of brows.

ELECTORAL QUOTAS

Since "unintended discriminatory results" is nonsense, a Federal ban on any practice which "results in a denial of the right to vote independently of intent" can only amount to a ban on practices which have differential effects on minority voting.

Free of tortured language, this is a move toward quotas in voting itself. By making sheer numerical outcome "highly relevant" to the legality of a procedure, the House bill moves to replace the outcome of the voting as the final arbiter of an election by another a priori standard, proportionality. This is not consistent with democracy.

The framers of the House bill were aware of this implication, and their amendment promises that disproportionate representation "shall not in and of itself constitute a violation," but experience shows that such promises always foreshadow quotas.

Proponents of the Civil Rights Act promised no remedial quotas but "goals and timetables" are now firmly entrenched.

Indeed, while the House bill disavows any "right to proportional representation as a remedy," a frightening thing even to be mentioned in American legislation, the report approvingly cites Fullilove which did permit set-aside quotas as one of Congress remedial powers.

Since intent is not required, only further objective factors are needed to make disproportionate representation impermissible. The House report gives as an example the failure of the major parties to nominate minority candidates.

Now a popular rationale for quotas is that they prevent discrimination. The Supreme Court has already paved this path to affirmative action elections in City of Rome when it found the Voting Rights Act designed to eliminate even "the risk of purposeful discrimination."

The language of the House bill is a transparently inadequate safeguard against quota elections.

INTERESTS

Still more ominously, the report declares that an election scheme would be illegal if it unintentionally permitted the regular defeat of "minority candidates or candidates identified with the interest of a racial or language minority."

Who shall decide a minority's interest independently of how it votes? Some blocks, like Jews, regularly vote against what others would see as their interests.

The logic of the House bill leads, I think, to runoffs between designated minority spokesmen for reserved positions while the white population votes as usual. Surely, in selectively protecting the so-called interests of groups by color, the House bill violates equal protection.

ONE MAN/THREE VOTES

The effects test, by banning practices which "impede the election opportunities" of blacks, also runs afoul of the one-man-one-vote principle.

Imagine an at-large district that is 50-percent black and 50-percent white with 75 percent of the whites voting but only 25 percent of the blacks. Let us fall in with the myth that voting must follow racial lines and so blacks are never elected to the 10-seat city council. The courts would be empowered to gerrymander the district so that five blacks win seats even though only one-third as many blacks as whites vote, thus giving each black vote the weight of three white votes and purposefully discriminating against whites.

The protection of the opportunity to participate in elections is not a guarantee of equal results. Taken literally, the effects test would ban even registration if only "objective factors" operate and, in plain English, blacks choose to register in numbers deemed too low. Does the Senate want to discover what will happen should this standard become law?

WHY DIFFERENCES

There are those who will cry "racism" at the suggestion that differential black voting is due to choice, but it is the proponents of the effects test who raise the why question about spontaneous differential patterns. Proponents of the intent test care only that voting be free and leave spontaneous patterns to sociologists, not Government officials, to ponder.

However, if the question must be raised, let us address it honestly. Thomas Sowell has amassed considerable evidence that different value traditions, not discrimination, explain group differences in economic success. A parallel explanation for differential voting is as plausible as any ad hoc hypothesis about ever more subtle forms of discrimination and should be carefully weighed before differential voting is made "highly relevant" to bringing voting procedures under Federal scrutiny.

We can begin to open our minds by not calling low black voting disproportionate. No one calls the large number of Japanese Nobel laureates in physics disproportionate.

SUMMARY

Demagoguery and misrepresentation ought not to cloud the basic issue, which is only the retention of the intent test. The Voting Rights Act forbids racially-motivated interference with the freedom to vote. The presence of intent, mens rea, is inseparable from the act that the Voting Rights Act forbids. Replacing the intent standard by an effect standard would change the right to vote into a wholly different and a wholly antidemocratic presumptive right to a racially predetermined result.

It is not the tyranny of the majority we are so often warned against but the tryanny of the minority, which is tryanny pure and simple. I urge the Senate to retain the intent test.

INTENT THROUGH THE BACK DOOR

Since I see that I have a moment extra, I call attention to the fact that the previous speaker's testimony in every significant case did refer to intent. In citing the difficulties he had in Mississippi, he in every case referred to efforts by whites to enhance their power to dilute the effect of white voting—all verbs which imply the presence of intent. Even those who say that intent is superfluous tacitly rely on it.

Thank you.

Senator HATCH. Thank you. Let me just ask one question and then I will turn to Senator Thurmond.

Are you telling us that if there is no intent to discriminate there is no discrimination?

Mr. LEVIN. Yes.

Senator HATCH. In your opinion then is S. 1992 aimed solely at procuring the desired results, of an election system based on quotas?

Mr. LEVIN. I am sorry; I didn't hear the question.

Senator HATCH. In your opinion then is S. 1992 aimed solely at producing the desired results, which appears to me to be the election system based on quotas?

Mr. LEVIN. I can see no other interpretation to put on that bill.

Senator HATCH. Thank you.

Senator Thurmond.

Senator THURMOND. If the proposed change in section 2 is adopted, could its premise be applied to other groups such as political parties and ethnic groups not presently contemplated by the Voting Rights Act?

Mr. LEVIN. That thought has occurred to me. A natural extension would seem to be, for example, to women who traditionally—political scientists tend to think this so—vote for the incumbent. One could construe this as an advantage to the incumbent created by votes for women. Certainly, I certainly see the extension of it as unlimited in possibility.

Senator THURMOND. What is the biggest danger that you can conceive in the House bill?

Mr. LEVIN. The biggest danger by far, I think, is the change in section 2 to make intent irrelevant.

Senator THURMOND. In other words, the effects might make intent irrelevant?

Mr. LEVIN. Yes.

Senator THURMOND. Do you feel that if any State or political subdivision has been under this bill for 17 years it should be allowed to go into court and show that it has not been discriminating if it can do so?

Mr. LEVIN. I was asked to testify about the intent section. I am not a lawyer, and the bailout provisions are not my area of expertise.

Senator THURMOND. I see.

Mr. LEVIN. So I would prefer to leave that to others.

Senator THURMOND. I see. Thank you very much. I think that you are very kind to come and testify. We appreciate your presence here.

Senator East may have some questions that he wants to ask you.

Senator EAST. Thank you, Senator Thurmond.

As always, I like to thank the witnesses for coming and helping us with their testimony, whether it be pro or con to my own position. I think your testimony has been very valuable and very cogent.

I would just like to briefly state my own rationale on what this change in section 2 would mean in going from an intent test to an effects test. I would appreciate your reaction to it.

It seems to me, as I have noted with some other witnesses—and sometimes we have to retrace some ground here, which I suppose is valuable because we keep coming back into what seems to be our fundamental problems—that all of this, of course, commences with congressional authority and power under the Constitution, and particularly under the 15th amendment. That is where the Voting Rights Act of 1965 came from. Any alteration, extension of it, modification of it, or building upon it, whatever we are doing, must be based upon the basic power grant of the 15th amendment, it occurs to me.

Now I would contend that the 15th amendment—and, again, I am going to just explain my position and I would appreciate your response to it as to whether you think that it holds together or it is a house of cards—the 15th amendment, as I understand it and as I thought was conventionally and traditionally understood, guarantees the right of a citizen to vote, as it states, regardless of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

Interestingly, at the time the 15th amendment was debated the question of the right to hold office came up and was rejected.

It seems to me in a fair reading of the language, and I would suspect a reasonable man's understanding of it, what the 15th amendment means is that each individual in this country, regardless of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, should have the right to register to vote and have that vote counted, or sometimes, as it is put, to have access to the voting process in this county

Now it does occur to me that if you go from an intent test to an effects test—as so much of this testimony has been bringing out and yours seems to underscore it once again—though the proponents claim to the contrary, they end up giving us proportional representation because they don't give us any other criteria by which you would determine there is discrimination based upon race; that is, back to the 15th amendment, denied the right to vote because of race, color or previous condition of servitude.

The point is that you will look at the results, the effects, as they are called. I don't see how one can strain out of that anything but proportional representation, which I do not see is the right that is guaranteed in the 15th amendment. As Senator Thurmond has suggested, and I think you are useful here as a philosopher, if proportional representation is a good concept as a matter of democratic political theory—I question whether it is because in my judgment it would lead to a fragmenting of American politics and make consensus-building and coalition-building extremely difficult, as proportional representation always does.

Note, for example, the varied divisive-party/multi-party arrangements in European politics where you are encouraged to accentuate differences, philosphical and otherwise, rather than have a candidate have to run and build a broad base of consensus. It is an interesting philosophical point.

It might be that the American people would decide that democracy is better served with proportional representation. Race would be a component. Sex would be a component. Political party would be a component. Physical ability or disability might be a component and ad infinitum. It is a very interesting and fascinating subject.

I think as a matter of democratic political theory one might raise the question—it is appropriate in this context—why would you confine it to racial proportional representation?

Mr. LEVIN. Absolutely.

Senator EAST. I don't quite see why as a philosophical premise one would do that. However, if we are going to walk down the road of proportional representation—and I submit with an effects test we would—why would we stop there?

I guess, rather fundamentally as a legal point at this juncture, it occurs to me we really don't have the authority under the 15th amendment to do that. If we wish to do that, we ought to amend the Constitution to allow Congress and other entities of the American federal systems to so alter the election laws of this country to facilitate the concept of proportional representation. We might decide to do it on the basis of race, political party, or whatever it may be.

I come to rest here then—and you as a political philosopher I think would at least follow my rationale, whether you agree with it or not—the two fundamental tenets of democratic political theory at stake here are, and I think they are fundamental, and proportional representation is not one: The right to register to vote, to have your vote counted, to have access. Where that is denied to you on the basis of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, it violates the 15th amendment, and it should be violative of any law that is reasonably based upon a proper understanding of the 15th amendment.

The fundamental tenet being protected here that we are talking about is the right to vote irrespective, again, of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. That is the fundamental tenet of democratic theory—the access of each and every person irrespective of those.

Second, a fundamental tenet historically has been in this country—and I think we are up against up-ending it perhaps indirectly and without consciously understanding that is what we are doing—the concept of Madisonian democracy, of the need in a great federal system to build consensus. That means that a candidate has to go out and build coalitions.

Under proportional representation the accent is upon divisiveness and exclusiveness, upon being particular and provincial. If that is a healthy premise of democratic politic theory, it certainly is contrary to the great Madisonian contribution. It occurs to me before we go that road we ought to think it through very carefully and make sure we want to do it. If we do want to do it, I submit we ought to do it by constitutional amendment.

I have been a little expansive on this. Does the scenario here make some sense? Maybe you would be critical of it or maybe you would like to expand on it.

Mr. LEVIN. Yes. I would, of course, accept the submission. I think you are entirely right. I would only expand on it in a couple of perhaps even more pessimistic ways.

It did cross my mind that the section 2 amendment might not be legislation appropriate to the 15th amendment. After all, anything which moves in the direction of proportional representation does not guarantee what the 15th amendment does. However, unfortunately, there is no saying what the courts will and won't decide is appropriate.

I also agree that ultimately this is a matter for Congress. Congress is the deliberative body and it has to decide questions of policy like this. With you, I think it would be a very unwise decision even if legally possible.

I suppose the underlying error, the underlying departure from the democratic tradition, has been a misunderstanding of what opportunity is. It used to be thought, correctly, that the opportunity to do something like vote was simply freedom from interference to do it. Unfortunately, opportunity and equality of opportunity have come to be confused not only with equality of result, but even equality of enabling means.

It is sometimes argued that, "I don't have an equal opportunity to buy shares in IBM when they go on the market because I don't have the money." This is not true. I do have an opportunity. I simply don't have the means to buy it.

Similarly, I think that the opportunity to vote does not at all entail having the means to wage a successful campaign for your candidate. It simply means and only means the absence of interference. I think that is where the fundamental departure from democratic traditions has taken place. Otherwise, I quite agree with your diagnosis.

Senator EAST. As you see it then in this proposed bill from the House of Representatives, above all other things, as I understand it, you think this probably is its fatal flaw, acknowledging you are not here as an expert witness to concentrate on the bailout problem, which we take care of later.

Our time is up. I have no further comments.

Again, I thank you for coming.

PREPARED STATEMENT OF MICHAEL LEVIN

WHY THE VOTING RIGHTS ACT MUST RETAIN THE INTENT STANDARD

Overview: Rights and Intent

In Mobile v. Bolden (1980) the Supreme Court reaffirmed the intent criterion for judging racially based violations of the right to vote: "The ultimate question remains whether a discriminatory intent has been proved in a given case." Congress now has before it legislation that would replace the intent standard of sec. 2 of the Voting Rights Act (VRA) by an effects standard.[1] Instead of forbidding practices which "deny or abridge" the right to vote on account of race, the proposed amendment to the VRA would forbid practices which are applied "in a manner which results in a denial or abridgement of" the right to vote on account of race.

I believe this change would be a catastrophic error. It would lead to enormous mischief and pervert the very meaning of the right to vote and violations of that right.

Since the issue has become a matter of legislative policy -- proponents of the amendment having found Mobile v. Bolden an insufficiently clear guide -- it is necessary, in the words of Jefferson, to recur to first principles. What is a right, and what is a violation of a right?

The right to do something or be something is the freedom to do or be that thing. A legal right is simply a freedom protected by law -- a freedom protected against coercive interference. Take the right to free speech, which the government is expected to protect. Clearly, this right is not categorical. If a meteorite hits me on the head and knocks me out just as I am about to begin a speech, the government has not fallen down on the job. My legal right to speak freely has not been violated, since violation is an act of will which meteorites are incapable of. In short, the protection of rights afforded by the state is protection against the thwarting of my liberty by another rational being, a being with a will. A meteorite cannot wrong me, nor be held accountable for preventing me from speaking. But if you gag me as I am about to speak, you violate my rights and are liable to the law's retaliation.

Clearly, what guides our judgement in all such cases is whether my inability to exercise my will was caused by the will, the intent, of another ~~wwa~~. It is this constraint by the will of another that the law protects me against; it is such constraint, and such constraint only, that I have a right against. Intent is thus integral to the very idea of "rights" and their legal protection. The very language of rights ~~w~~ their invasion, interference, abridgement, thwarting, of conspiracies to deprive -- presupposes intent. Even when we say "circumstances conspired against him," or "the situation prevented him from saying anything," we are metaphorically extending words whose literal meaning requires intent, the exercise of a will. Rights are protected against acts of violation, acts being the result and manifestation of intent. This is the basis of the Anglo-Saxon legal system.

The law virtually always proportions degree of liability to intent. There is a moral and legal difference between premeditated murder and manslaughter, a difference which corresponds precisely to the presence and nature of the intent, mens rea. If I kill you in cold blood I more seriously violate your right not to be murdered than if I drunkenly run you down. It would be absurd to punish an animal that has killed, since animals lack a rational will.[2]

People bent on subverting the intent standard in particular cases often raise the objection that intent is "too difficult to determine" to be part of a working legal system. They say it requires mindreading or smoking guns or written declarations of intent. Curiously, those who bemoan the difficulty of ascertaining intent are often the very people who deplore the use of measures like wiretapping which would help the law meet their very demanding standards. But in any case, the supposed difficulty in ascertaining intent is all nonsense. Juries determine intent in murder cases every day of the week, and have no trouble doing so. They do not have to read minds or written declarations of intent. A man cannot claim to have killed his wife in a fit of jealous rage if he purchased a one-way ticket to Brazil that morning.

We read intent off behavior -- not necessarily the effects, but behavior itself. If I see a jack next to a disabled vehicle, I conclude that someone intends to do some repair work. Someone fingering a garment in a clothing store is probably thinking about buying it. None of this is at all mysterious. Most scholars now agree that Shakespeare intended Hamlet's ghost to be real; Elizabethans believed in ghosts, and Shakespeare's contemporaries often used ghosts in realistic plots. If we can make reasonable conjectures about the intentions of a man who died 350 years ago, we can certainly hope to ascertain the intentions of our neighbors.

Civil Rights and Intent

The legal protection of civil rights applies these general precepts to matters of race. The fundamental idea of civil rights legislation is that no-one is entitled to thwart the will of another on account of race. "Discrimination" is the name we give to the act of thwarting someone's liberty to vote, to live where he pleases, or to choose a job freely offered on the job market, because of his race.[3] Discrimination, being an act, requires intent just as much as any other rights violation. If someone slips on a banana peel I drop near a polling place, I am negligent. I am more seriously liable if I wanted someone to slip on it, but my liability is unaffected if the luckless passerby happens to be black. If my intent was actually to disrupt the election, I am more liable still. Nonetheless, I discriminate only if I intended that my victim be black, or if I selected a particular target because of his color.

Suppose that, lying unconscious in the emergency room, you cannot vote because you slipped on my banana peel. Whether I have violated your right to vote hinges entirely on why I dropped the banana peel. Only if it was to prevent you from voting have I violated your right to vote. Only if I intended to stop my victim because of his color have I discriminatorily violated his right to vote. Once again, intent is all.

Sickle-cell anemia strikes only blacks, but blood chemistry does not discriminate. Only Jews get Tay-Sachs disease, but chromosomes are not anti-Semitic. Discrimination must be construed as the manifestation of the will to interfere with another's action on the basis of race, or we abandon the distinction between human will and the blind workings of nature. This point is so critical that I suggest we use the term "differential voting pattern" instead of the contentious and question-begging terms "discriminatory pattern" or "discriminatory effect" when describing racially linked numerical discrepancies in voting which have not been shown to be intentional.

Hard Cases

Even cases that supposedly show the intent test to be superfluous for determing civil rights violations actually show the reverse. If a precinct with 10,000 voting-age blacks has not enrolled a single black voter, it is said, an independent inquiry into intent is surely not needed to show that discrimination, or at least something impermissible, is taking place. Now, why do we find this case so compelling? We find it compelling precisely because we know that, in any real situation, the only way there could be 0% black registration is if someone planned it that way. We simply do not believe that such a situation could come about without intent. We demand no independent inquiry into the presence of intent, not because intent is irrelevant, but because its presence is so obvious. We are confident that a little poking around would turn up direct evidence of intent. But this concedes that it is intent, after all, that counts. The force of such hypothetical examples, which are always being thrown up to defenders of the intent test, consistently rely on tacit retention of the intent test.

The whole point of looking at the effect of a practice is that its effect is a useful though fallible guide to the intent behind it. Subtract intent, and examination of effect loses its point. This is best seen in more fully described hypothetical cases of differential voting in which intent is assumed absent. Suppose that only 10% of the eligible black voters in a township turn out for an election because the previous week a visiting activist persuaded the other 90% to stay home on election day as a protest against the hegemony of the two-party system. Here the "disproportionately low" turnout is not caused by interference with the will of any black voter. The black voters who stayed home did so because they chose to. It would surely be absurd to say that discrimination had occurred, or that blacks had been prevented from voting, or that numbers or proportionality had anything at all to do with whether a wrong had occurred. Yet if effect were relevant independently of intent, the numerical facts would count as prima facie evidence of discrimination. The subsequent hunt for the discriminatory practice might result in a ban on permitting outside speakers to address the electorate within a week of the election!

Foreseeable Effect

"Foreseeable effect," a supposed compromise between effect and intent, also depends on intent. It is based, in the words of its advocate the Hon. M. Caldwell Butler "upon the assumption that decisions on voting changes are made by reasonably prudent individuals who intend the reasonably foreseeable effects of their actions" (House Report 97-227, p. 72; see below). These very words betray the compromise; foreseeable effects count because they evidence intent. Subtract intent and foreseeable effect ceases to be a rational basis for ascribing responsibility. Suppose, in our previous example, that the responsible officials knew beforehand they were permitting a public rally at which minorities would be persuasively urged to boycott the election. In permitting the rally the officials foresee but do not intend a lower black turnout, their intention being to allow all views to be heard. They do not discriminate.

Or suppose the mayor of a township discovers on election eve that the gas main beneath the central polling place is leaking. The only other place with suitable facilities that can be readied in time is in an accessible but mostly white neighborhood. Suppose further that postponing the election will give one candidate an advertising monopoly. They mayor recognizes that blacks may feel uncomfortable about going to the new site, but he prefers that outcome to postponing the election or risking diaster. The mayor has not discriminated if he moves the polling place, because his intent was to get the best election possible. Had the racial tables been turned, we are supposing, he would have moved the polling place in a way that would have lowered the white turnout. Telepathy is not needed to show that a lower black turnout was a foreseeable result but not the intent of the mayor's action. A foreseeable result test would, unreasonably, find it discriminatory.

In any case, the theory on which liability for foreseeable effect rests applies only when the foreseeable effect of an action is interference with the volition of another. Congressman Butler himself recognizes this, since his example of justified liability for foreseeable effect involves opening a door and hitting someone on the other side. Now in this case the body of the person on the other side of the door was affected without the consent of that person, and the door-opener could reasonably have foreseen that his action would thus bypass the will of another person. But when the foreseeable effect of an action takes place via the will of another person, the foreseeable effect test for liability is inapplicable. If Congress passes a bill that it knows the President will veto, it is the President, not Congress, who is responsible for the demise of the bill. And in the examples given in the previous paragraph and other cases as well, the foreseeable effects of a voting practice would take place via the voluntary decisions of minority voters. The foreseeable effect test would fail to discriminate these cases, in which there is no conceivable wrongdoing, from cases in which, arguably, there might be.

A further problem with the foreseeable effect test is that one man's "reasonably foreseeable" is another's "unexpected." Is being stranded at the end of a long line a foreseeable result of deciding to lunch at the Air and Space Museum? It is if I am sufficiently familiar with the crowds there. How familiar is that -- two visits? Ten visits? Knowledge of probability theory? Since mass statistical effects of a partciular practice are especially difficult to foresee, a "foreseeable effects" test for discrimination will inevitably force localities to use increasingly sophisticated methods for predicting the racial effects of their decisions, and hence hold localities accountable for any effects that are unforeseen. This will transmute the foreseeable effect test into an effect test pure and simple, thereby destroying the compromise between intent and effect that foreseeable effect was supposed to accomplish.

Strict Liability?

Law does not always demand proof of intent. It sometimes disconnects liability from intent. Since the effect test would amount to holding political units strictly liable for differential voting results, its proponents might hope to justify strict liability in the present instance by whatever justifies it elsewhere. However, strict liability is very limited in scope. It is permissible when the harm and penalty are both relatively trivial, as in ticketing illegally parked cars. It is permissible when the harm to be prevented is so grave and immediate that the threat of strict liability keeps interested parties more vigilant than they would otherwise be. This is why restaurant owners are strictly responsible for food poisoning suffered by their patrons.

Differential voting patterns fit neither case. If differential voting were a trivial matter, Congress would not be agonizing about it. Nor is differential voting the grave and immediate threat to life that food poisoning is. Certain fanatics might indeed believe that differential voting patterns are in and of themselves so evil that local authorities should guard against them as vigilantly as restaurant owners should guard against botulism, but I trust that that is not the view of Congress.

The heightened vigilance theory may not be a sufficient defense of strict liability for serious penalties -- I have mentioned it only because it is the best defense available of what may well be an indefensible standard. But let it be clear that, defended by appeal to heightened vigilance, even strict liability ultimately looks to mens rea. Vigilance being something within an individual's power, failure to be maximally vigilant is something willed even if not normally a cause for blame. The law never holds anyone responsible for occurrences recognizably beyond the control of any human will, so it is not clear that the law does really acknowledge a special kind of liability divorced from intent. If so, there can be no basis at all for holding local authorities "strictly liable" for voting patterns beyond human control.[4]

The House V.R.A. Extension and Report

The intent test is unavoidable, embraced even by its opponents when they are not explicitly rejecting it. The best and most pertinent instance of this is House Report No. 97-227 on H.R. 3112 -- the House version of the V.R.A. Extension which amends sec. 2 of the V.R.A. so as to replace the intent standard by the effect standard. (Hereafter, House Report No. 97-227 will be "the House Report".)

The House Report lists various incidents which show the persistence of discrimination in registration and voting, and hence the need to extend the V.R.A. Every such incident involves intent. It reports a case in Georgia in which white men congregated around the polling place conspicuously displaying firearms (p. 15). This is deemed "evidence of intimidation and harassment" of black voters -- and rightly so, since it was obviously done with the intent of keeping black voters from voting. One person cannot inadvertently harass another. The House Report notes "that literacy tests and other devices have been used to prevent blacks from voting" (p. 23, my emphasis) and betrays itself further when it says its hearings "reflect the continuing existence of activity aimed at the intimidation of racial and language minority persons seeking to register and vote" (p. 21, my emphasis). Obviously these practices must be stopped, but equally obvious is the House Report's reliance on intent. "Aiming at" something is just another way of saying "done with the purpose of achieving" that thing.

Take, finally, the vexed question of "diluting" minority votes. Whether "diluting" a bloc's vote actually violates the right to vote is itself debatable (see below), but in any case every citation of this practice in the House Report involves intentional dilution, the use of devices like annexation and at-large voting for the purpose of minimizing the impact of minority votes.

Since "unintended discrimination" is a contradiction in terms, and "unintended discriminatory effects" sheer double-talk, language which seeks to define and forbid discrimination while avoiding an intent test is bound to tie itself in knots. The House Report fulfills this expectation. It explains that its amendment to sec. 2 is designed to prohibit any practice which "accomplish a discriminatory result" (p. 30). The amendment itself replaces the phrase "to deny or abridge" in the current V.R.A. with the phrase "in a manner which results in a denial or abridgement of" the right to vote. But "denial" and "abridgement" name acts, and hence involve intent. Mere events cannot be "denials or abridgements"; only human behavior can be. If we are talking English, there is no difference between my performing an act which results in denying you something, and my simply denying you that thing. On the face of it, the House replacement redundantly forbids what the old phrase did: denial of the right to vote on account of race. Consider the following instructions: "You must not prevent me from speaking, or do such things as have the effect of preventing me from speaking." The second alternative is just a cumbersome way of repeating the first. Doing something which has as an inadvertent and unintended result my failure to speak neither prevents me from speaking nor has "the effect of preventing me" from speaking.

Affirmative Action Elections

Since Congress is not likely to be spinning empty distinctions, something more must be intended by the House amendment. That something more is clearly the proscription of differential voting effects. Cleared of its tortured and deceptive language, the House V.R.A. Extension forbids procedures which have, intentionally or inadvertently, a differential effect on minority populations.

The House amendment to sec. 2 is plainly driving toward affirmative action, quotas, in voting itself. By making numerical outcome "highly relevant" (p. 30) to the permissibility of a procedure, the House V.R.A. Extension would begin to impose a test on the outcome of an election other than its fidelity in recording and expressing the free choice of the electorate. This undermines the very idea of what a democratic election is supposed to be.

That the framers of the House V.R.A. Extension were all too aware of this implication of their language is manifest in the pains they take trying to block it. Disproportionate representation, the amendment concludes, "shall not, in and of itself, constitute a violation." Well, as I've labored to stress, the shift from "denial" to "result in denial," bf it is not just empty verbiage, does indeed suggest the use of arithmetical proportionality as a test for a procedure's being discriminatory. Even as it stands, the amendment clearly demands that arithmetical disproportion be prima facie evidence for a finding of discrimination instead of the irrelevancy it ought to be in the absence of a showing of intent. The House Report contains assurance that the amendment does not "create a right to proportional representation as a remedy" (p. 30). It is distressing that this possibility should even be mentioned in legislation passed by one House of Congress. Nor should we assume that this idea is being broached only to be repudiated. "Section 2, as amended, is an exercise of the broad remedial power of Congress," says the report, and as the drafters of the House Report explicitly note, Pullilove v. Klutznick (1980) recognized set-aside quotas as one of Congress's remedial powers.

Let us recall some unpleasant facts. Proponents of the 1964 Civil Rights Act proclaimed with equal solemnity that the Civil Rights Act would not justify the use of compensatory quotas. The plain truth is that our public officials seem bent on drawing quotas from civil rights legislation, on replacing equality of opportunity by equality of result, and it is unwise to give them any further legal leverage. 1964 saw discrimination in employment banned. Then an "affirmative duty" to ban discrimination was laid on employers. Then "goals and timetables" for hiring were laid down. Then "target" populations became "protected" populations. Quotas have thus become entrenched, presumably forever.

The democratic process itself has so far been shielded from this transmutation of equality of opportunity into equality of result. The House V.R.A. Extension will pierce that shield. Sheer numerical "underrepresentation" becomes grounds for federal intervention and Congress's "broad remedial powers." Since intent need not be shown, virtually any other consideration, however flimsy, can be construed as sealing the case. Quotas are now routinely grounded on the supposed need to "prevent" discrimination. Already, in City of Rome v. U.S. (1980), the Supreme Court laid the groundwork for applying this idea to voting when it interpreted the V.R.A. as designed to eliminate "the risk of purposeful discrimination." It is not unduly alarmist to fear that Congress and the courts will take the path of "preventive discrimination" if the House V.R.A. Extension becomes law.[5]

"Interests" Putting [redacted] Beyond the Ballot

The basic idea of democracy is that if people don't like what their rulers are doing, they can always throw the rascals out. In particular, as things stand now, if enough people get tired of a government that plays favorites toward certain groups, it can always dismiss that government. So long as no basic rights are at stake, the group which advocates its preferences and interests most effectively and intensely gets to put its candidates into office. The House V.R.A. Extension represents a complete break with this tradition: Minority groups would effectively be assured "proportional representation." In the explicit language of the House Report, "It would be illegal [for example] for an at-large election scheme for a particular state or local body to permit a bloc voting majority over a substantial period of time consistently to defeat minority candidates or candidates identified with the interests of a racial or language minority" (p. 30). This crucial and mischievous sentence demands the closest scrutiny.

A) Notice how coyly and evasively this sentence uses "identified" in the passive. Who is supposed to identify the interests of a racial minority? Federal officials? Self and media-appointed spokesmen? Remember, the leading lights of the civil rights movement remain adamantly behind busing and quotas, even though every poll shows that most blacks oppose both. The drafters of the House Report knew that to specify a method for identifying the interests of a voting group independently of how they vote is to advocate bypassing elections themselves. If we can identify the interests of a voting bloc, and it is illegal for those interests to be suppressed by whatever cause, why not simply appoint spokesmen for those interests, or hold intra-group runoffs for the position of spokesman? Once a test of the outcome of a vote threatens to displace voting as the final court of appeal, democracy is undermined.

B) There are many racial and voting groups whose interests the House V.R.A. Extension will not protect. Is it fair to take the failure of one group's interests to be "proportionately represented" as an impermissible wrong, while taking the failure of another group's interests to be "proportionately represented" as just the luck of the ballot box? In footnote 69, the House Report stresses the high voter registration of, e.g. German and French speaking minorities, the purport of this remark being that since these groups participate actively in the democratic process on their own, they don't need government protection. But surely it is unfair to demand one group play by a stricter set of rules just because its members more actively get out the vote. Remember, since the House V.R.A. extension abandons intent, no claim is being made that group differences in registration must be due to anyone preventing members of "protected" minorities from registering. Surely we have here a potential violation of the equal protection clause of the 14th Amendment. Taken to its logical conclusion, the House Report's reasoning again justifies 11% legislative set-asides for blacks, while letting whites elect their own representatives.

C) The House Report's evasiveness on how one should determine the "interests" of minority voting blocs reveals as well its profound confusion about what a bloc's interests are and are perceived to be. There is a tendency to assume that voters always choose advocates of policies beneficial to themselves, and that blocs will always vote for one of their own, but this is not always so. For example, Jews have been harmed by affirmative action, yet Jewish voters consistently support proponents of that policy. 60% of the Jewish vote went to Jimmy Carter in the 1980 Presidential election despite Mr. Carter's vigorous advocacy of affirmative action and Mr. Reagan's oft-stated opposition. Nor is Jewish representation in elected office as "disproportionate" to the number of Jews in the population as is Jewish participation in such other high-status activities as college teaching. Jews typically vote for "progressive" candidates whose policies do not benefit Jews and who need not be Jewish. Any attempt to identify Jewish "interests" with what helps Jews, and to gauge an election by how "fairly" it furthers these putative interests, would actually disenfranchise Jewish voters. And what reason is there to think that the "interests" of any other "voting bloc" can be more easily identified?

Even if the interests of the groups covered by the V.R.A. coincide with their self-interest, is it not bias to guarantee their interests and not those of other groups? In any case, anyone who thinks that voter interest follows color -- as if German, Jewish, Italian and W.A.S.P. blocs will automatically coalesce into a unifying whiteness just to oppose blackness -- is attributing to the ordinary voter a preoccupation with race more usually found in Nazi propaganda.

Judicial Review and the Double Standard

The House Report further reveals a troubling double standard about legislative policy as a response to Supreme Court decisions and past legislation. It lets pass without question Supreme Court decisions that at least stretch the letter and spirit of past civil rights legislation, and prepares new legislation to ratify these judicial inventions. At the same time, the House Report repeatedly finds "unclarity," "confusion" and "ambiguity" in Mobile v. Bolden, an exercise in judicial moderation.

The intent criterion, as enunciated in Mobile v. Bolden, is clear as crystal. It contains "ambiguities" (see House Report, p. 2) only for those who want the right to vote to mean more than freedom from interference in voting. The "confusion" (p. 29) the House Report professes to find in Mobile v. Bolden is entirely of its own making. (I note parenthetically that those who shriek loudest when legislators contemplate circumventing Supreme Court decisions on busing or abortion have remained silent on the present attempt to override the Court's interpretation of the 15th Amendment.)

The House Report experiences no comparable trouble with other decisions that might seem more perplexing. It worries at length about the "effectiveness" of minority participation and about "procedures that effectively exclude minority participation from all stages of the political process" (p. 14; my emphasis). The House Report bases these concerns on the Supreme Court's finding in Allen v. State Board of Education (1969) that "the right to vote can be affected by a dilution of voting as well as by an absolute prohibition on casting a ballot," and the Court's finding in White v. Regester (1973) that the right to vote entails a right "to enter into the political process in a reliable and meaningful manner." It never occurs to the drafters of the House Report that these decisions may be "confusing," that the 15th Amendment and the V.R.A. which implements it, may not confer the right to "meaningful" or "effective" participation. On the face of it, the right to vote is right to participation, period. Astonishingly, the House Report can discern a clear right to a "meaningful" vote and "reliable" entry into the political process, while balking at the idea that discrimination must be intentional.

Equally puzzling is the House Report's attitude toward Fullilove v. Klutznick and, implicitly, the legislation which created the case. In Fullilove the Court conceded to Congress the right to legislate racial set-asides in federal contracting as part of Congress's power to enact "remedial" legislation which goes beyond but is still "appropriate to fulfill the purposes of" the 14th Amendment. Yet instead of being at all troubled about the wisdom of exercising remedial power by enacting racially specific legislation, the House Report uncritically cites Fullilove as a virtual blank check for using an effect test for remedying and "overcoming the effects of...past purposeful discrimination" (see House Report, p. 31). Surely there is greater unclarity in how to trace and overcoming the effects of past discrimination than there is in the idea that discrimination requires intent. Surely legislative policy designed to achieve the former really requires near-omniscience. Yet the House Report endorses the "overcoming" of the effects of past discrimination as something legislators can do as a matter of course, while making extraordinarily heavy weather about the simple intent test. The House Report's standard of clarity does not bear scrutiny.

The Effect Test in Action

The House V.R.A. Extension sets the stage for contention and aggrevated racial animosity. Consider a political unit with 10 City Council seats elected at large, and which contains one subgroup, say Jews, whose voter turnout has historically been high. Suppose 50% of the voting population is Jewish, of whom 75% vote, while the other 50% of the population is black, of whom only 25% vote. The Jewish vote is thus three times heavier than the black vote and -- falling in with the myth that voting interest always follows color lines -- no black candidate ever wins a Council seat. The House V.R.A. Extension sees this fact as "highly relevant," not to say suspicious. If there are other "objective factors" that "impede the election opportunities" of blacks (see House Report, p. 30) -- intent not being required, the failure of blacks to win party nominations might be one such "objective factor" (ibid) -- we have an impermissible discriminatory effect. Suppose the court demands gerrymandering of the political unit into 10 racially defined precincts so that, in the court's judgement, even a 25% black turnout will send 5 blacks to the City Council. What has happened is that the blacks who vote have been given as much say as the Jews in the composition of the City Council, even though only a third as many blacks as Jews voted. The court has given each black the equivalent of three Jewish votes!

This prospect is not acceptable. The NAACP has a slogan, "At the voting booth each vote counts as one." This is precisely what would cease to be true if the House V.R.A. Extension becomes law. The value of individual votes of the minorities who fall under it would grow in direct proportion to their "underrepresentation." The value of non-protected votes would shrink in proportion to their number. This penalizes members of assiduous voting populations, voters who have done nothing wrong,[6] and subverts the very democratic process. This is not the tyranny of the majority we are so often warned about, but tyranny of the minority, tyranny in its purest form.

There is simply no avoiding the fact that replacing intent by effect has invariably led to score-keeping. Busing became an integral feature of public education when de facto segregation replaced de jure segregation as the trigger. Quotas came into being as "discriminatory effect" replaced "discriminatory intent" as the standard for "denial of equal opportunity." It is entirely unrealistic to deny that, in making intent at best peripheral to violations of the right to vote, the House V.R.A. Extension carries us a giant step closer to electoral quotas.

It does not require great imagination to see how the effect test would effectively destroy the present system of voting. Suppose that blacks simply choose not to register in proportion to their number in the population. This in itself would make the process of registration impermissibly discriminatory. Imagine elections conducted without registration. Would political units have to adopt instant registration on election day and incur all its predictable abuses? How about automatic registration by birth records? And what if that didn't produce the "right" turnout? I suggest that retaining the intent test will spare us the hazards of finding out.

Why Discrepancies?

Many will object that all these considerations are moot because the only explanation there could conceivably be for significant differential effects in registration and voting is real, purposeful discrimination. Replacing the intent test by the effect test, they say, will simply streamline the evidentiary process. But quite apart from the fact that we should explicitly retain the intent test if intent is really what counts, there just is no reason to assume a priori that persistently low minority voting must be due to increasingly subtle forms of discrimination. Thomas Sowell has argued convincingly that different minority groups have different "value traditions," and that it is these value traditions which explain group differences in economic success, not discrimination. These same value traditions may well account for group differences in political participation. Such a suggestion is certainly more plausible than increasingly fantastic hypotheses and assumptions about increasingly subtle forms of discrimination, and should be weighed carefully before differential voting behavior is made "highly relevant" to bringing any and all voting procedures under federal scrutiny.

Let those who reflexively cry "racism" at this suggestion reflect that it is the proponents of the effect test, not its opponents, who cause such issues to be raised. Those who believe in guarding everyone against coercive interference, and letting all vote if and as they please, are uninterested in numerical results. Let sociologists investigate spontaneous voting patterns, not public officials. All that matters is that the voting is spontaneous. Any result is fair which is the result of free choice. Only someone who distrusts free choice and gauges its results against some preferred standard must explain why democracy "fails." Certainly, anyone who insists on raising the issue of "disproportionality" should be prepared to address it honestly, and keep his mind open to the possibility that black voting is "too low" simply because, for one reason or another, "too many" blacks choose not to vote. We might begin the process of opening our minds by ceasing to call low minority voting "disproportionate," a word which needlessly implies inherent badness. No-one calls the large number of Japanese who win Nobel Prizes in physics "disproportionate."

A Final Question

A switch from district to at-large representation is an example often cited, in the current V.R.A. debate, of a discriminatory technique used to "dilute" minority votes. Now many political scientists believe that such a switch might often be advantageous for minorities -- as well as non-discriminatory.--By making every elected official at least somewhat heedful of the demands of minority voters. But let us assume that such a switch invariably blunts a minority's impact, and even that there is a genuine right to a maximally concentrated vote that such dilution violates. One problem remains. If switching to an at-large system thus dilutes the votes of former precinct residents, then if my City Council switches to an at-large system, my vote will be diluted. Now such a switch and consequent weakening of my vote would be consistent with the House V.R.A. Extension, since I am white. My vote is not protected against dilution in the way a black man's is. Is this fair? Should the law decide on the basis of color whose vote to protect from dilution? I think the answer must be a resounding "No." Surely, color-based selective protection against vote dilution violates the equal protection clause of the 14th Amendment. Not only is the House V.R.A. Extension not "appropriate legislation" for enforcing the 15th Amendment, replacing the intent test by the effect test, and using the effect test only for minorities, appears inconsistent with the 14th.

I mention this problem in passing. There is no way of knowing whether a color-conscious effects test would in fact pass muster before the present or any other Supreme Court. My main objections to the effect test remain its regression to a primitive idea of responsibility, and its clear malign consequences.

Summary

The 15th Amendment and the V.R.A. proscribes discrimination, which is the racially motivated act of interfering with the liberty to vote. The presence of intention, mens rea, is inseparable from the notion of an act and hence from discrimination. Replacing the intent standard by an effect standard would change the right not to be interfered with in the exercise of the franchise into a quite different, wholly undemocratic presumptive right to a racially predetermined result.

Apart from the intrinsic absurdity of finding discrimination without discriminators, such a change would bring irresistable pressure on localities to turn voting into a quota system. The language of the proposed amendment that would change the intent test for discrimination into an effect test offers transparently inadequate safeguards against this consequence. Adopting the effect standard would confer undue power on those who manage to identify themselves with the "interests" of minorities, and pit race against race even more bitterly than busing and quotas have done. It is questionable whether democracy itself could survive this perversion of the electoral process.

It would be unfortunate if demagoguery and misrepresentation beclouded the basic issue. No-one disputes that the right to vote must be protected at all costs. No one advocates a return to grandfather clauses, poll taxes and discriminatory literacy tests. What is at issue is only the use of the intent test or the effect test in judging when the right to vote has been violated. I urge the Senate to retain the intent test.

NOTES

1. In what follows I will generally refer to this replacement as "the amendment." I will be ignoring other changes in the V.R.A. contained in H.R. 3112.

2. There was indeed a time when men tried animals and punished them, and cursed stretches of land on which a hero died. We regard such practices as barbaric and barely comprehensible, as resting on an animistic view of nature in which the world is filled with quasi-human forces and spirits. All legislation which detaches guilt from intent moves us back toward that archaic state.

Remarkably, even quite bizarre evidentiary proceedings turn out to rest on intent. Thus trial by combat, even the combat of designated champions, was based on the belief that God, knowing which side was in the right, would see to it that the right side won. Trial by combat is distinguished mainly by a curious view about how intent is manifested. Similarly, trial by submersion for witchcraft were based on the belief that women who knowingly consorted with the devil had the ability to float.

A purely philosophical question, which fortunately need not be answered here, is why intent is so central to the notion of responsibility, and hence any rational legal system. The utilitarian theory explains this by noting that we can control behavior only by rewarding and punishing people for what they will. There is no point in punishing someone for what he does by accident, since so punishing him will not reduce the likelihood that it will happen again. The Kantian tradition sees intent as a direct expression of the self, and notes that selves are uniquely valuable. Whether these two approaches can be completely reconciled is an open question.

3. The theory behind civil rights legislation is that when I put something on the market -- where this includes the job market or the housing market -- it ceases to be completely mine; I have agreed to surrender it to whomever meets my price. Whether a prospective buyer wants to take possession of what I have offered therefore lies completely within his will. If having put something on the market I refuse to deal with someone because of his race, I have thwarted his will because of race, and hence discriminated.

4. Liability completely divorced from intent might have some place when the only malefactor is a legal fiction, such as a corporation, but such cases and the voting case are utterly disanalogous.

5. The doctrine of "preventive discrimination" has all the disadvantages of preventive detention with none of the advantages -- it does not reduce any immediate threat to life or property.

6. If a local practice which has the putative effect of diluting a vote violates the 15th Amendment, federal intervention with the same purpose and without a showing of wrongdoing seems a more serious violation of the 15th Amendment.

Senator EAST. Our next witness is Ms. Abigail Turner of Alabama. She is an attorney from Mobile, Ala. We welcome her this afternoon.

Ms. Turner, thank you for coming and assisting us in evaluating this important matter.

You may proceed with your statement. As you know, your written remarks will be made a part of the record permanently. Therefore, if you would prefer to abbreviate and state the essence of your thinking extemporaneously, that is fine, too—whatever you are most comfortable in doing. However, I would remind you that your written statement will be a permanent part of the record and will be included at the end of your oral testimony.

STATEMENT OF ABIGAIL TURNER, ATTORNEY, MOBILE, ALA.

Ms. TURNER. Yes, sir. I would like to summarize that. I would also like to have placed in the record a report I have done on the Voting Rights Act in Alabama since 1975.

Senator EAST. That shall be done.

Ms. TURNER. I appreciate the opportunity to appear before your subcommittee today to urge your support of S. 1992. I appear on behalf of my clients, black voters in Alabama, who are fearful that their right to vote will be taken from them if the preclearance and bailout provisions as passed in the House bill are weakened or modified.

OTHER REIDENTIFICATION BILLS PASSED IN 1981 TO DISENFRANCHISE BLACKS

In Alabama, a weak bailout provision will mean the same thing as failure to extend section 5. The same devices that were used prior to the Voting Rights Act in Alabama are being used in some counties at this time.

For example, in the 1981 Alabama legislative session, legislators from three majority black counties passed voter reidentification bills. These are actually voter reregistration bills. The same information that is required under the Alabama constitution to register and vote is required under the voter reregistration questionnaires, except citizenship.

That such bills have a discriminatory effect and discriminate against blacks can be seen from what happened in Choctaw County in a similar voter reidentification plan in 1978. Choctaw County, as these other three counties, is also located in the black belt.

Seven hundred eligible blacks who should still be on the voting roles, according to an analysis made by the Choctaw County Voters League, were removed as a result of that reidentification. Members of the league contacted the Justice Department to find out why that was precleared. They were told by the Justice Department that black elected officials had said the bill was all right. Those black elected officials denied that. They said they were not contacted by the Justice Department.

You have to look at this in light of the history of voter discrimination in Choctaw County. The Justice Department itself had brought suit in the early sixties under the Civil Rights Act of 1957 because blacks were being discriminated against in registering to vote. The Federal court enjoined the county from refusing to provide assistance to black voters that had been provided to white voters. That was particularly the case for persons who were illiterate. The county's response was enacting a more difficult literacy test. The judge struck it down again.

In the meantime, the Voting Rights Act passed and was signed into law. Three days after that happened, the county again filed a motion in the court to ask that they be allowed to require all the voters to reregister. By that time a number of blacks had been registered by the Federal referee. The county's petition to the court included a literacy test which at that point obviously had been struck down by the Voting Rights Act. So you see, the same mechanisms that were used prior to and immediately after the Voting Rights Act are still going on in Alabama.

What has happened with the Sumter County voter reidentification act? That was passed in 1981 after a black was elected to be district judge in Sumter County and three of the five members of the board of education were black. The timing is important because major offices are up for reelection this fall in the general and primary elections. Under the Sumter County bill the voters had only 9 months to reidentify to vote. This contrasted with other plans in Alabama where voters had 2 or more years.

The Sumter County act was submitted to the Justice Department. Blacks commented about how it discriminated against them. Judge Hardaway, who is the newly elected black judge, testified about the inequities in the bill before the House subcommitee, but Justice refused to object. They asked for more information. They negotiated with the county and struck a deal, in my clients' minds, that Justice would not stop the reidentification if the county agreed to amend the act in certain respects.

The act was amended in a special legislative session, but the amendments that were agreed on, were not enacted. Once again, Justice did not object. Last week they asked for more information.

At this point my clients have lost faith in the Justice Department's enforcement of section 5. My clients believe that deals were struck—that they were not part of. They believe that, once their complaints about discrimination got above the line level in the Justice Department to those who make the political decisions, the evidence of discrimination was ignored.

STATES SHOULD NOT BE ALLOWED TO BAILOUT UNTIL ALL COUNTIES CAN MEET BAILOUT REQUIREMENTS

I would like to comment very briefly on the question about whether a State should be able to bailout when its counties are still covered. In Alabama, the voting laws are very thoroughly defined by State law. There is no home rule in Alabama. Therefore, everything from how one becomes a candidate, to how one registers, to conducting elections is covered by the State code.

The responsibility to enforce those laws, as well as the responsibility to enforce compliance with the Voting Rights Act, is inextricably intertwined between the State and local governments. To suggest that Alabama as a State could bailout without its counties having to prove that they have met bailout requirements makes no sense.

TO BAILOUT A JURISDICTION SHOULD BE REQUIRED TO SHOW IT HAS ELIMINATED BARRIERS TO VOTING

In Alabama, blacks still face barriers to registration and voting. You had an exchange with the previous witness about people being able to register without problems. That is not the case in Alabama, particularly in the black belt counties. That is documented in the report that I have put in the record.

There are problems that blacks face in registering. For example, the voter registration form in Alabama requires that a person specify his or her social security number. Many blacks who have worked in agriculture or other uncovered employment, and this is particularly true in the black belt area, do not have a social security number.

In Monroe County in 1980, black persons seeking to register, were asked for their social security numbers. When they said that they didn't have one, they were denied the right to register. It is this kind of fact that we think merits the strong bailout provisions that now appear in S. 1992.

Blacks engaged in registration and voting in Alabama in some counties still face intimidation and harassment. In Pickens County, located in the black belt, when blacks appeared in 1980 to register in groups, they were confronted by the sheriff. He and his deputy stood over them while they registered. Ms. Theresa Burroughs from Hale County testified in the House about how she was harassed, and the police were called to her at the polls. Again, we think this is evidence that strong bailout provisions must be enacted.

The Voting Rights Act in terms of providing equal political opportunity for Alabama blacks was only a first step. We still have a long way to go. We think the positive effect of the bailout provisions, as they are now worded, would provide an incentive to Alabama to change its procedures which make voter registration and participation burdensome and dangerous in some respects.

COMPLIANCE WITH PRECLEARANCE PROVISIONS SHOULD BE REQUIRED FOR BAILOUT

I also urge you to retain the bailout requirement that a jurisdiction must show that it has complied with the act by submitting voting changes for preclearance.

Jurisdictions in Alabama have escaped the effect of the act by not preclearing. For example, in 1968 the town of Hayneville incorporated. Hayneville is located in Lowndes County, which has a majority black population—77 percent. The boundaries of the town of Hayneville were drawn in the shape of a cross, and the blacks were kept out because they were located outside the corners of the cross and were not included in the town.

We represented some blacks in 1978 who wanted services from the town, and we made an inquiry about whether the incorporation had been precleared. It had not even been submitted. Blacks who lived close to Hayneville were denied services and the opportunity to participate in that town's government for 10 years simply by the town's ignoring that provision of the act.

This is not an isolated example. In 1975, the Alabama Legislature passed 81 acts that relate to registration, voting, and election matters. As of last June 1981, 38 of those still had not been submitted for preclearance under section 5.

We plead with you not to allow jurisdictions that have avoided the effects of the act by refusing to submit things for preclearance to bailout, to exercise a bailout loophole, if you will, and to argue that they are in compliance with the act.

In short, I encourage your support of S. 1992. A weaker bailout will mean that hard-won rights to vote and to elect candidates of their choice by blacks in Alabama have been eroded.

Senator EAST. Thank you, Ms. Turner. I appreciate your abbreviating your remarks, which will give us some time here for discussion.

I would like to probe here on several points with you. It is sort of a confusing day on the Judiciary Committee. They have another meeting going on over at the Capitol at 4:30. The operation of the U.S. Congress is an uneven business, as you probably have known and gathered.

Ms. TURNER. Yes, sir.

Senator EAST. As you are aware, the two things that seem to be the greatest bones of contention under this proposed law from the House—and you have touched upon both of them, properly so—one is the effects test question and the second is the bailout matter, both of which you have touched upon.

First, let me just give you my response to your comments on the need for the effects test. It strikes me you are citing examples of continued voter discrimination based upon race in Alabama with your clients, as you have noted. I am really not, of course, in a position to contest that. I obviously am not saying it is so or it is not so. My point would be what you are describing by the very facts you give us is a denial of the right to vote of specific individuals, of either registering or voting, having that vote counted, or participating meaningfully and with access to the voting apparatus, with which I have no quarrel. I don't know that those of us on the committee who have been opposing the effects test are really quarreling over that. We are quarreling over upping the ante whereby you determine that there is discrimination based upon effect or result, not upon specifics or concretes.

I think that what you describe, legislation that deals in a reasonable, fair, and effective way with abuses of that kind, is very consistent with the 15th amendment. However, what troubles me is where legislation goes way beyond what I think is the constitutional mandate in the 15th amendment and is in effect mandating decreeing effects. I will not retrace all that ground because you were here earlier and I think it gets you into proportional representation.

I think it is a wholly different proposition than the problem that you raise, and I don't make light of the problem you raise. However, the intent test would clearly be applicable there and legislation could be designed and utilized to deal with that, but our contention is this again is not that situation. It is not that kettle of fish. It is a totally new proposition spun out of wholly new constitutional cloth. Let me just state that proposition on the effects test.

Then on the bailout provision, we haven't really been getting into this but you are very right in suggesting this and you are very concerned about it. My concern with the S. 1992 bailout provision is that really in effect I would say it is a misnomer. There really isn't any bailout.

It is so devised and constructed in ways that as a practical matter in the real world of voting and politics jurisdictions could never get out from under it. They are consigned in perpetuity to coming to Washington to the Federal district court. Frankly, there really is not a whole lot of incentive to try to have a constructive and effective record on this question of eliminating all vestiges of discrimination based upon race.

For example, you get this requirement that a jurisdiction has to show "that it is engaged in constructive efforts to eliminate intimidation and harassment of persons exercising rights protected under this act."

When you look at the total bailout provision here, as does Congressman Hyde, the ranking minority member of the House Judiciary Committee, in fact, it is not a bailout. What we really would be putting in place is a very novel piece of legislation, one permanently fixed upon these affected areas where they in fact as a practical matter could not get out from under it. The bailout provisions are not clear and precise. It is hopeless. It is hopeless.

You would look at it and you would say there is not any way. We will always be boxed in. Just shrug your shoulders and forget it and live with it permanently.

I don't think that is good legislation. I don't think that it is healthy. I don't think it sets a good goal for wanting to have a good record.

And then, again, another major flaw in it is this effects test, which again we think leads us down this troubled road of quotas and proportional representation. It seems to me a piece of legislation that is going to saddle the American democratic electoral process with these two things is frankly fatally flawed.

The intent test is one thing. A fair, equitable, and reasonable bailout; a specific concrete rule of law clearly defined is another. We, the legislative body, as I see it, would be just dumping all of this right back into the courts. There are no guidelines. We haven't really done anything in terms of setting legislative policy, direction, or course. The rule of law is going to be trampled on here because you are just back to bureaucratic and judicial control of these affected areas and looking for such vague and elusive things as effects.

I don't wish to overreact to it, but you are a lawyer. I suppose the thing that has been frustrating to those who have suffered discrimination in voting based upon race, as you suggest in some of the litany you went through, there is always some sort of vague objection, always some sort of—perhaps where it was practiced—some sort of procedural dreamed-up-out-of-whole-cloth objection thrown in the way.

I submit that it isn't a healthy practice where the cure for that practices the same thing. It promises bailouts, but in fact it won't give bailout. It promises that it is giving individuals the right to vote, but in fact it is designed to guarantee results, quotas, proportional representation, et cetera. It smacks me as a little bit of the old con game. We contend we are giving you good folks this, that, and the other thing, but as a matter of fact we aren't. I wonder if it isn't violating the same spirit of the law that it found in the older practices of the type you are suggesting.

Let me get specific on one thing. I have just given you my own reaction to it. I would be happy to have you comment on any facet of that, but let me just ask you this question.

You bring up the question of bailout. You already know my position on effects, but if you want to comment on that that would be fine because you heard me with the earlier witness.

What would you consider a reasonable bailout? Do you think I misstate the character of the bailout in the House act? Is there some validity to what I am saying about as a practical matter it isn't there? You run the risk—and I am not faulting you, but in the Judiciary Committee you have lawyers come, and they always like to skew the law to help their clients. You have clients in your case. That is fine. You have people who want to make the law as malleable as they can to serve their ends. To the extent you can get us to modify or change the law, that will make it easier for these people to prevail; naturally they want it.

Prosecutors always, I presume, would like to come in and say, "Gosh knows, let's get rid of intent. That's very hard to show. Let's make it easier to prosecute and convict."

I don't mean that taints your testimony, but we have to look at it in a little broader perspective as to all the parties involved. You do have the problem here of giving some reasonable assurance to State and local government officials that what you are saddling them with here is fair and equitable; that there is some light at the end of the tunnel; that the key is to let people register, vote, and participate and to have it counted.

The key is not to guarantee some particular result. The key is, if they do a good job and if they keep their own house in order, they could in fact get release from this on a permanent basis. That would be a badge of distinction and progress.

After all, the law ought to give some incentive. Is it not a good characteristic of the law to encourage that kind of positive result? I don't see that it is here.

Ms. TURNER. Senator, I think you have some measures to determine that here in S. 1992. In my report that I had submitted for the record, we had done a chart on the jurisdictions in Alabama where Justice had objected to changes under section 5. It is far less than all of the counties. I would say that it is probably far less than 50 percent of the counties. In the rundown of counties that had failed to submit, there were very few counties. There are measurable ways to determine whether counties in Alabama will be eligible for bailout.

With respect to the intimidation question, it is my understanding that the bill is constructed where both sides will be able to present evidence to a court about whether there has been intimidation. As I said in my testimony, I think you need to give States like Alabama and counties like the ones I talked about incentives to clean up their acts, to remove barriers to registration and voting. I think this bill does that.

In my view, the way section 5 is being administered at this point it is not the jurisdictions who are having such a hard time; it is the blacks who are complaining about the discrimination. Section 5 as it is being administered at this time bends over backward for the submitting jurisdiction. I think the Sumpter County litany that I went through proves this. The balance is not with the blacks who are complaining. The balance is with the jurisdictions.

I am not an expert on section 2. I can make one comment, but I think Mr. Derfner is better prepared to answer your questions about that.

My understanding is the effects test in section 5 is very different from the results test in section 2. The burden of proof is different, and that makes a lot of difference in the burden of proof for parties in lawsuits.

Senator EAST. Thank you. I think my time is up. Senator Hatch?

Senator HATCH. Thank you, Senator East.

Ms. Turner, first, I apologize to you for not having been here but I was on the phone. We appreciate having your testimony. Thank you for coming.

[The prepared statement of Ms. Turner and additional material follow:]

Prepared Statement of Abigail Turner

Mr. Chairman, and members of the Subcommittee, I am Abigail Turner, an attorney in Mobile, Alabama. I appear before you today to urge your support of S-1992, the bill to extend the Voting Rights Act. I appear on behalf of clients I represent in voting matters; my clients, who are black voters, are fearful that if the provisions of S-1992 concerning preclearance and bailout are weakened or modified their rights to vote will once again be taken from them.

In Alabama, the Voting Rights Act finally halted the decades of devices such as the poll tax, literacy tests, and voucher requirements which kept black citizens from registering and voting. Prior to the passage of the Act, only 57,500 blacks had registered. The number had grown to about 417,000 in 1980.

This dramatic increase in black voter registration led to black participation in the political process, especially in counties with large black-majorities. When the white power structures in several of these counties began to lose their monopoly on the political and economic power in these counties, they local bills by the state legislature. Under this custom, called "local courtesy", a legislator outside the local area will not vote against a local act. In essence, these bills were passed under a gentleman's agreement.

The voter reidentification bills violate the Voting Rights Act, my clients contend, because they are simply a device to remove blacks from registration rolls. They have filed suit challenging the act under Section 5, the Constitution, and the laws of Alabama. It is their contention that Alabama laws of statewide application provide sufficient mechanisms to remove dead persons and other disqualified voters from the rolls. These voter reidentification bills repeal protections guaranteed to black voters by the Constitution and laws of Alabama. The Alabama Constitution guarantees that a voter will not have to reregister, unless s/he changes residence or becomes disqualified for another reason and removes that disqualification. Amendment 223 and Code of Ala. §17-4-125.

This so-called reidentification is actually reregistration. Voter registration requirements under the Alabama Constitution are: 1) citizenship; 2) age; 3) residence; and 4) no disqualification because of incompetency or conviction of a disqualifying crime. Amendment 223. That same information is required in the reidentification questionnaires, except for the citizenship developed new devices to disenfranchise blacks and retain control. The white politicians got the Alabama legislature to pass so-called voter reidentification bills, requiring voters to reidentify before the county boards of registrars. The story behind these bills and how the Justice Department has dealt with them illustrates why the bailout provisions of S-1992 should be passed intact by the Senate. The implementation of these voter reregistration bills shows that a weak bailout provision would mean the same thing in Alabama as a failure to extend the Act.

The Voter Reidentification Acts

In 1981 white legislators from three majority-black counties in Alabama's Black Belt introduced so-called voter reidentification bills in the legislature. Each of the counties has a substantial black population: Sumter (70%), Wilcox (69%) and Perry (60%). In each, blacks had for the first time in the 1978 general elections achieved some degree of political success by electing candidates of their choice to countywide offices.

These bills, which were actually voter reregistration bills, were treated as local acts by the legislature. This means that only the local legislative delegation considers them. There is generally no active discussion of these question. In short, black persons, many of whom were registered by federal referees only after federal court orders under 42 U.S.C. §1971 or by federal examiners under the ~~Voting Rights~~ Act, are forced to reregister.

That these bills discriminate against blacks can be seen from what happened in Choctaw County which required voter reidentification in 1978-- the year two black county commissioners were elected for the first time since Reconstruction. After that reidentification, the Choctaw County Voters League has documented over 700 eligible blacks who were dropped from the rolls, a number large enough to spell defeat for a black candidate or for a white candidate supported by or sympathetic to the black community's interests. Anthony Butler, president of the League, characterized many of those who failed to register as elderly people who have vivid and bitter memories of past experiences with registrars.
